PAHR OPPOSED TO TANK EXPORTS TO ARGENTINA

AU061056 Vienna KURIER in German 6 Apr 82 p 3

[Excerpts] The Steyr-Daimler-Puch Corporation will not supply the remaining 27 "Cuirassier" tanks to Argentina for the time being. This was stated on Monday evening by Hans Michael Malzacher, director general of the Steyr Corporation. A few hours earlier Foreign Minister Pahr also declared in an exclusive interview with KURIER that he was "not prepared to consent to further tank exports of the Steyr Corporation to Argentina -- certainly not in the near future."

Permission of the chancellory and the Ministries for the Interior, for Foreign Affairs and for National Defense is required for the exportation of war materials. And it is precisely that permission which Minister Pahr would have strictly refused had it been requested. Pahr told the KURIER: "Argentina is situated in an area that is obviously a hotbed of tensions at present. I do not think that one can supply arms to someone who is just ignoring a world Security Council resolution."

In this context, the foreign minister appealed to the government in Buenos Aires to comply with the UN vote and to renounce the use of force.

Kreisky Comments on Crisis

AU061210 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1032 GMT 6 Apr 82

[Herbert Hutar report]

[Excerpt] We have succeeded in contacting Chancellor Kreisky by telephone at his vacation resort in Majorca. In reply to the question of how he assessed in principle the conflict over the Falkland Islands and what he had to say about the fact that the 27 Steyr tanks will not be delivered to Argentina, the chancellor replied:

[Begin recording] Well, first of all it must be said that this attack by Argentina on the Falkland Islands -- irrespective of what the specific facts of the case may be -- is an expression of the fact that at this time of tensions all over the world everyone believes that he can take the law into his own hands. And, second, it is not so very strange that the Steyr works has called off the delivery [of tanks to Argentina], because we would never have been able to permit such a delivery. The law stipulates clearly that no arms deliveries may be made to countries involved in a war. [end recording]

Actually, the Steyr Corporation has not even applied for an export permit. It is true that the Argentine military have acquired an option for the 27 tank destroyers which is still valid, theoretically, but for the actual delivery a new export permit would have been required which would not have been granted. However, in this context, Chancellor Kreisky criticized the Steyr management for relying too much on the company's arms production.

PRC DELEGATION VISITS, STUDIES BUREAU OF AUDITS

AU021300 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 2 Apr 82 p 2

[Text] A five-member delegation from the PRC visited the Austrian parliament on Thursday. The delegation, which was accompanied by Federal Bureau of Audits Chairman Broesigke, was welcomed by Deputy Nationalrat Chairman Minkowitsch. Broesigke declared that the delegation had come to Austria and was going to visit Spain to study the institution of the Bureau of Audits. The PRC intends to set up a similar supreme auditing control authority.

GOVERNMENT RESPONDS TO CARRINGTON'S RESIGNATION

[Text] Bonn. 5 Apr (DPA) -- The resignation of British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington is "very much regretted" by the Federal Government, Government Spokesman Kurt Becker told the press in Bonn on Monday. Becker pointed out that Carrington has had a very close working relationship with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

The Federal Government has always regarded Carrington as an extremely important representative of the British Government whose work the FRG has very much appreciated, especially in connection with the problems to be solved within the European Community.

As did the Foreign Office, Becker said that the Federal Government is following with concern developments in the Argentine-British conflict over the Falkland Islands. Becker said that Bonn shares London's assessment of the events in the light of international law and condemned the Argentine invasion. Argentina has violated the "basic policy" advocated by all states -- to abstain from all forms of coercion and to exercise moderation in international politics.

Becker denied that Bonn might mediate in the Argentine-British conflict. The Federal Republic is not a world power; it is a medium-sized European one, he said. This is, above all, a matter for the United Nations.

Foreign Minister Genscher today expressed great shock at Carrington's resignation. In a telegram to the British politician, he wrote that he would be missed in German-British relations, the EC council and the NATO council. A Foreign Office spokesman said that the Federal Government is in close contact with the British Government over the developments concerning the Falkland Islands. Genscher had two lengthy telephone conversations with Carrington on Friday and Saturday prior to his departure for Brazil, where he is accompanying the Federal President on a state visit.

From Brazil Genscher has been in constant touch with Bonn's representative at the United Nations, Guenther van Well, and with the ambassador to Argentina, Paul Verbeek who was the first European ambassador to be received, at the request of the Argentine side, by state President Leopoldo Galtieri. On Genscher's instructions, Verbeek expressed the Federal Government's legal standpoint resulting from the statement by the 10 EC states. Juergen Ruhfus, Bonn's ambassador in London, informed the British Government about the talk on Sunday.

The Argentine occupation of the Falkland Islands is likely to affect the supply of German submarines and other warships to Argentina. Becker announced that the Federal Government, in accordance with the war weapons control law, would set Argentina a deadline to end the invasion. Should Buenos Aires refuse to meet the request, then the construction of the ships will be stopped.

A spokesman for the Federal Defense Ministry pointed out that the dispatch of a British naval force to the Falkland Islands weakens the NATO presence in the North Atlantic. It is obvious that the 40 ships cannot be replaced quickly from other sources.

SCHMIDT-FALLDIN HOLD JOINT PRESS CONFERENCE

[Excerpt] Bonn, 2 Apr (DPA) -- Bonn and Stockholm, despite different security concepts, intend to jointly support all efforts concerning disarmament and arms control.

This was stated by Swedish Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin and Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on Friday at the end of a 3-day official visit by Falldin to Bonn. Speaking to journalists, the Swedish head of government made a point of praising the federal chancellor's part in bringing about the American-Soviet disarmament negotiations in Geneva.

Falldin also made plain that he, like the Bonn government, views the proposals for a nuclear-free zone in Scandinavia with skepticism. This would not be a satisfactory solution, but at least a step in the direction of a nuclear-free Europe. Joint solutions would have to be found for "such important questions for mankind's survival" as peace and disarmament.

The two heads of government resolutely called for an international convention against world-wide pollution through industrial acid rain. Swedish lakes and forests are suffering increasingly from waste gases from West European industries which -- carried by the wind -- rain down onto the country. They underlined that since all measures involve expenditure, international arrangements are necessary to avoid distortion of competition between the individual countries.

Schmidt and Falldin both emphasized the good and friendly relations between neutral Sweden and the NATO- and EC-member country, the Federal Republic. There are no problems between Bonn and Stockholm. Schmidt called Falldin's visit a necessary supplement to his meetings with the partners of the community and the Western alliance. Topics discussed included -- apart from East-West relations and developments in Poland -- world economic problems, the situation in the Middle East and the situation in Africa. In all questions "very far-reaching agreement" was noted.

YAMANI, IN BONN FOR LECTURE, PREDICTS PRICE RISE

[Text] Bonn, 5 Apr (DPA) -- The Saudi Arabian oil minister, Shaykh Ahmad Yamani, expects oil prices to start rising again. Yamani pointed out to journalists in Bonn today that the price of North Sea oil has already increased by at least $1 a barrel and that the prices for oil products on the market are also rising. "This does not yet apply to the official OPEC price," Yamani said. "But this is the trend which we have been expecting."

Yamani, who is in Bonn to give a lecture at the "German Society for Foreign Policy," stressed his country's readiness to continue to advocate a moderate oil price policy. "In the past we have fought off sharp price rises," he said. "We are now fighting against a further reduction in prices, because this is a threat to the stability of the market and to the further availability of energy."

Yamani further announced that his country would, if necessary, support sanctions against the major oil companies if they do not lift their boycott of Nigerian oil. "We believe there is a concerted effort being made to isolate Nigeria and to force it to lower its oil prices," the minister said. The question as to whether OPEC will call a special meeting on the Nigerian situation is currently under examination.

"We are not in favor of imposing sanctions, but if it becomes necessary, we will do so," Yamani stressed. "I think the situation will probably become clear by the weekend." It is up to the oil companies as to whether a confrontation will occur as a result of their behavior. The minister added that if Nigeria were to seek Saudi credit, his government would examine this request.

PS, PCI LEADERS HOLD JOINT PRESS CONFERENCE

[Text] The joint press conference given late in the afternoon of 30 March at PS headquarters by [PS first secretary] Lionel Jospin and [PCI secretary general] Enrico Berlinguer, was concluded with an exhortation to the journalists: "I, hope that your commentaries on these meetings will not be inspired by too utilitarian a philosophy. What is at stake is too important for that style," the PS first secretary said. The PCI secretary general said in turn that a large number of the questions discussed "went well beyond domestic policy viewpoints."

It was, therefore, at the level of principles and theoretical philosophy that the two leaders, accompanied by Romano Ledda, PCI Central Committee member and director of the Foreign Policy Studies Center, and Jacques Huntzinger, PS deputy national secretary for international relations, had talks lasting from 0900 hours to 1630 hours. After the communique was read the questions and answers tended to blur the areas of agreement and disagreement.

Although agreeing with the view that Western Europe is a "decisive zone and a strategic locality," Mr Berlinger, questioned on the quarrel with the Soviet party, stressed the fact that "the working class in Western Europe has an important role to play in the development of socialism in the world," adding: "We do not think the CPSU is playing a positive role in that respect."

He also agreed that relations between the two parties, "are not directed against anybody" and "are part of an overall advance by the workers' movement." But the PCI secretary general did not allow himself to be drawn into debating the differences of opinion with the PCF. He referred to the documents which have been published and confirmed that he would return to Paris soon, but on an unspecified date, to see [PCF secretary general] Georges Marchais.

What is the Euro-left? The question did not receive any very clear replies except that it was neither Eurocommunism nor Eurosocialism but a movement of progressive and democratic forces. Moreover differences of opinion were apparent but they were glossed over by reference to the brevity of the discussions.

On Soviet foreign policy Mr Jospin recalled that "the PS has observed that after being characterized by a concern for the status quo after the shock of World War II, that policy had evolved since 1975. After interventions like those in Afghanistan, prompting criticism of that analysis, particular anxiety was seen in the PS" regarding this new course.

Differences or "Slight Differences"

In Mr Berlinguer's view it is "the logic of rivalry between the two superpowers, which have fundamental responsibility" which has sparked off the crisis in detente and increased the dangers. The PCI, he recalled, had vigorously condemned "the disturbing aspects of the superpowers' policy" in the Afghanistan affair and had subsequently expressed its "apprehension at the aggressive nature of U.S. policy."

There are differences of opinion, or "slight differences," to cite Mr Jospin, which are reflected in the examination of the deployment of the Soviet SS-20 missiles. To what extent has the balance of forces on the European theater been disturbed by it? "We have never ruled out the possibility that that is the case," Mr Berlinguer said. "But the whole question is so complex that we are not giving any specific assessment. We must take account of the fact that some democratic forces in the Western world have felt there to be an imbalance."

"It is not a question of a 'feeling' of this imbalance but of its existence," Mr Jospin said. "We advocate detente, have no illusions about its consequences and question the USSR's intentions and its real policy."

But the PS first secretary and Mr Berlinguer said they agreed in their assessment of the dangers of the arms race "which primarily concerns the two superpowers" and on "the analysis of the logic of the ideological and political blocs, on the dangers and the need to question Yalta."

Mr Berlinguer paid greater attention to the pacifist movements in Italy, describing them as "nonunilateral demonstrations directed against the two superpowers." In that respect he stressed that, unlike France, Italy has already seen its territory chosen for a cruise missile base, in Sicily, capable of threatening "not only the Warsaw bloc, but other regions in North Africa or the Middle East."

Various meetings between the two parties and their leaders were envisaged, either at bilateral level or in the context of participation in theoretical colloquiums. For instance, the colloquium on "the left and Europe" in Rome in the fall.

This afternoon, 31 March Berlinguer was to be received at the Elysee by the president of the republic.

GREMETZ VIEWS RESUMPTION OF CCP-PCF TIES

PM0511137 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 31 Mar 82 p 7

[Yves Moreau interview with PCF Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz: "Questions on China"]

[Text] [Question] Last Thursday you reported to the PCF Central Committee on the visit to China by the delegation which you headed. The talks which you had in Beijing are still the subject of comment 3 weeks after your return. When you returned to Paris you stressed the frank nature of the discussions which you had. Were the disagreements which exist between the two parties on such subjects as Vietnam or the arms race in Europe really expressed in the talks?

[Answer] Even before we left we had agreed that there would be no taboo subject in our talks. After such a long break in relations there were many subjects to be discussed. As I said on my return, we exchanged information on our parties' action in our respective conditions. We also had a direct, broad and detailed exchange of views on international problems.

Each fully explained its stances on these different questions without trying to water them down in any way. The aim was neither to win each other over nor, if I may say so, to please each other but to exchange our viewpoints with mutual respect. I am not revealing any secret when I say that there are still serious differences between our two parties in this sphere. However, some interesting shifts were noticed on some questions, for instance, problems which affect us most directly, meaning Europe.

[Question] So on what basis could relations between the CCP and PCF be restored and developed?

[Answer] We had detailed discussions on the concept both sides have of relations among communist parties. We observed an obvious measure of agreement on this question: These relations must be based on independence, strict equality, the right to different viewpoints and, possibly, to disagreement on a particular question.

That concept which we have and which is now shared by a large number of communist parties makes it possible to have a calm, clear debate without creating an obstacle to relations between parties and cooperation on major common objectives. Similarly, we observed that both parties stressed the fact that there can be no world or regional "center" of the revolutionary movement. On that basis, the foundation of relations between our two parties was clearly established and the official invitation to Georges Marchais was the natural result.

[Question] What did our Chinese comrades say to you about our attitude toward them over the past 23 years?

[Answer] When we discussed the past I had occasion to recall the extent to which we were always anxious to maintain our view of the socialist nature of Chinese society, whatever criticisms we leveled at some of their positions, and, so to speak, to leave the door open by constantly inviting the CCP to our congresses. I think the true value of that attitude was appreciated.

[Question] Judging from what you were told in Beijing, what seem to be the main concerns there now? What do people think of Mao Zedong's policy and the cultural revolution?

[Answer] Our interlocutors stressed the scope and complexity of the problems now facing that country which has around 1 billion inhabitants, a population explosion and whose resources are limited. It is a country with 700 million peasants, and its industrial and agricultural development and social life were completely disrupted by the cultural revolution which the Chinese leaders now describe as a "real national disaster."

The approach explained to us is characterized by realism, taking account of all those problems and the country's real possibilities in order to find suitable, original solutions aimed at moderate and more secure development with the will to meet the Chinese people's needs more effectively. In the same connection a major effort is being made to seek greater participation by the workers and peasants, and a reorganization of political life and of the elected assemblies is underway.

[Question] Coming back to international policy, what did the Chinese comrades say with regard to their relations with the United States? Do they think it is possible to talk of a Sino-American alliance?

[Answer] They accuse those who claim such things of questioning their intentions. I was struck by the vehemence with which they rejected that term and stressed the socialist nature of their country. According to them their relations with the United States are part of the search for cooperation and relations with all states whatever their social system.

[Question] Some commentators have said or written that in restoring ties with the PCF, the CCP's intention was to "give a broader signal" (LE MONDE) and that it was "one of the signs heralding a reconciliation between Moscow and Beijing" (FRANCE INTER). What is your view on that?

[Answer] I have read and heard some commentaries which suggested that we were going to Beijing for Moscow's sake. Some people are certainly determined to portray the PCF as an "aligned" party. Is there any need to reiterate that ours is an independent party, both in determining the kind of socialism it wants for France and the path leading to it and in determining its foreign policy and the nature of its international relations? The presence of 112 delegations, including one from the CCP, at our 24th congress, demonstrates the scope and diversity of the relations which we have in the world. Our party accepted the CCP's invitation and we discussed our relations.

Nonetheless, some commentators are attributing wider "significance" to this resumption of relations. They are entitled to do so. A number of factors seem to point in that direction. If that is the case we will welcome it. It would confirm how much future there is in the concept of new interparty relations and the new internationalism which we want to help promote.

[Question] And when will Georges Marchais visit China?

[Answer] We accepted with pleasure that invitation made to us by CCP Deputy Chairman Le Xiannian at the end of our visit. We will have to agree on the date together, taking account of the commitments which both sides have. This visit will take place this year.

PLO REPRESENTATIVE INTERVIEWED ON ENVOY'S DEATH

[Excerpts] The case of the assassination of an Israeli diplomat in Paris. A certain moderation of reaction can be observed in Jerusalem at present. The Israeli ambassador to France refuses to believe the PLO denial, but in Israel caution is the order of the day and the conclusion of the French police inquiry is awaited.

[Unidentified interviewer] Ibrahim as-Sus, you are the PLO representative in France. You have heard that Me'ir Rosenne, the Israeli ambassador to France, does not believe your denial. Questions are also being asked about a revolutionary organization which claims responsibility and which also says it has no links with the PLO. What is your first comment?

[As-Sus] All I can say is that this an outright lie. The Israeli ambassador wants to discredit the PLO and, frankly, to divert the public's attention form the bloody events in the occupied territories. As we have said, the PLO is not involved in this affair in any way whatsoever. It is inconceivable that when there are young secondary school students being killed by the Israeli Army in the occupied territories one should try to make believe that one kind of blood is dearer than another. Why all this indignation? The death of a man is always a matter to be condemned and deplored. But is Jewish blood dearer today than Arab blood? I remind you that a week ago about 10 students were killed in cold blood by the Israeli Army.

[Question] There are questions being asked about the Arab revolutionary brigades, which has claimed responsibility for the killing and which says it has no links with the PLO. Do you know it, and is it not an underground branch of the PLO?

[Answer] Absolutely not, we do not know it, and if I say that we are no involved, it means that I formally declare that we are not involved in this matter. On the other hand, one has to wait for the inquiry, one has to ask the French authorities to go further and find out who is behind the act. But it is certainly not the PLO.

[Question] But there are other movements -- revolutionary or other movements -- which act in the name of the Palestinians, you have to admit this.

[Answer] I represent the PLO. The PLO supports half-a-dozen fighting organizations which all employ armed struggle. It also supports trade unions, institutions and others that have nothing to do with this kind of attack.

[Question] Do you fear Israeli reaction in South Lebanon?

[Answer] I fear that they are engaged in camouflaging or justifying such an action against South Lebanon by using a story such as this. What I fear even more is this story about the closing of the PLO bureau [in Paris]. I am here to contact parliamentarians to explain to them the Palestinian cause, to explain what is happening in the occupied territories. I am here to mobilize the mayors regarding the fate of the elected mayors of the occupied territories. I do not see why today there is talk about the PLO bureau. The PLO bureau in France is conducting political and diplomatic activity. Nothing else. Even the French authorities know this.

CYPRUS' KIPRIANOU CONTINUES CONTACTS IN ROME

[Yiannakis Kareklas report from Rome -- recorded]

[Excerpts] President Kiprianou today conferred with Italian Presient Pertini. During the meeting Kiprianou briefed the Italian president fully on the Cyprus situation. Well-informed sources stated that President Pertini demonstrated a great interest in and emphasized the need for a speedy solution of the Cyprus problem. According to the same sources, President Pertini showed particular sensitivity toward the question of occupation, emphasizing the need for a more dynamic UN role on the Cyprus issue.

Yesterday President Kiprianou conferred with UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar at the UN Information Center in Rome. The meeting lasted 1 hour and 35 minutes. On his arrival, Kiprianou was received by Perez de Cuellar and his special envoy in Cyprus, Gobbi. I will continue, Perez de Cuellar said, to make every possible effort to assist in the solution of the problem. I believe I found exceptional interest on the part of President Kiprianou, who is helping me in my efforts, and I rely strongly on his true honesty and real concern for a speedy solution of the Cyprus problem. I place great importance on the solution of this problem. I am personally connected with Cyprus, and I will do everything possible for the solution of this lengthy problem.

Answering a question on whether he now sees better conditions for solution of the Cyprus problem, President Kiprianou said that there is now a revival of international interest on the Cyprus problem and that the Cyprus Government will do everything possible not only to keep the problem alive but also so that we may press, he said, for a just and viable solution in accordance with the UN resolutions and the summit agreements. I can only add, he said, that I place very much hope in the success of the UN secretary general's efforts.

Generally speaking, the meeting between President Kiprianou and Perez de Cuellar has been a total success. Well-informed sources stated that the UN secretary general considers the Cyprus issue a priority issue despite the existence of many other problems and that it is his resolve to play an active role. According to the same sources, various alternative approaches to the problem were discussed during the meeting. As stated, however, it was agreed to speed up the dialogue with discussions on the basic issues of the internal aspect. The international aspect of the problem was also discussed exhaustively in conjunction with the question of demilitarization. Also discussed was the question of basic freedoms, including the right of the refugees to return to their ancestral homes, a position Kiprianou is not prepared to give any ground on.

Kiprianou is also adamant on the question of demilitarization, as provided for under the relevant UN resolutions and the summit agreement of 19 May between Kiprianou and Denktas, because, as repeatedly stated, the Cyprus problem is basically a problem of invasion and occupation despite its domestic aspects. According to the same sources and irrespective of any other initiatives and efforts, the Cyprus issue will remain within the UN framework and within its resolutions. In reference to the missing persons issue, it was reported that Perez de Cuellar is resolved to promote a solution of this problem.

In conclusion, it can be stated that the Rome meeting may prove to be of a definitive character for Cyprus developments. In the meantime, Italian radio, television and the press have given wide coverage to President Kiprianou's talks with Perez de Cuellar and Italian radio broadcast a special interview with Kiprianou.

ASSESSMENT OF TRADE WITH CUBA COMPLETED

LD040248 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2000 GMT 3 Apr 82

[Text] Portugal and Cuba have decided to continue to develop trade relations at enterprise level, but no official agreement has been signed between the two countries. This was announced at the end of the fifth meeting of the Cuban-Portuguese mixed commission in Havana. The only joint document, which was signed on Friday evening by Portuguese Internal Trade Secretary Antonio Escaja Goncalves and Cuban Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade Amado Blanco, was an assessment of the value of the trade between the two countries.

In 1978 the two countries committed themselves to a 3-year undertaking on mutual trade whereby Portugal would purchase Cuban sugar in exchange for Cuban ships calling at Portuguese ports and Cuba importing 35 Portuguese products, especially cork, textiles and industrial products. In 1981 the trade balance was clearly unfavorable to to Portugal: Lisbon purchased $42 million worth of Cuban goods, whereas Cuba spent only $1.3 million on Portuguese products. For this reason the two countries have agreed to improve their trade relations before the mixed commission meets again, in Lisbon, in January 1983.

MINISTER AFFIRMS SOLIDARITY WITH ARGENTINA

[Excerpt] Let us now turn to the Malvinas [Falklands] conflict and to remarks made by Spanish Minister of Labor Santiago Rodriguez Miranda, who is in Peru on a 4-day official visit accompanied by the director of the Spanish Emigration Institute. In connection with the Malvinas conflict, the minister of labor expressed Spanish solidarity with Argentina in the Peruvian capital, although without approving the use of force to resolve the problem, as did the official government-Calvo-Sotelo communique at the end of the Council of Ministers meeting on Friday.

Rodriguez Miranda said the Spanish Government supports the reestablishment of Argentina's territorial integrity and the safeguarding of the interests and welfare of the population of the islands in a peaceful process of negotiation. We do not approve the use of force, he added, to resolve conflicts between countries. The minister underlined that Spain also has an analogous problem to that of Argentina concerning a part of Spanish territory -- the Rock of Gibraltar -- he added that refusal to engage in dialogue by the colonial powers in terms of proceeding toward decolonization can lead to situations such as that of the Malvinas Islands.

SANTIAGO CARRILLO INTERVIEWED BY YUGOSLAV PAPER

[Text] Belgrade, 2 Apr (TANJUG) -- Spanish Communist Party Secretary General Santiago Carillo has assessed that the Spanish society can overcome the present crisis only through closer cooperation of all democratic forces of the society and the creation of a united front of these forces. "No other road is in favour of the Spanish working class." Carrillo stated this is an interview to the League of Communists of Yugoslavia weekly KOMUNIST. He noted in particular that the Spanish democratic institutions were, not endangered by putschists alone, but by some other groups as well. "A great number of their followers are sitting in other state institutions, in the paraliment, too, and are openly or secretly against democracy."

It is necessary to transcend the concept that the "attitude to the Soviet Union" is the "main test of the internationalist consciousness" of a party, said Carrillo. That is a conservative idea, he assessed. Carrillo stressed that a critical attitude to weaknessess in certain systems does not mean that "we throw doubt upon the ideas of the teachers of Marxism. "It is only that we are confident that some have become estranged from the October Revolution ideas." The Spanish Communists, said Carrillo "simply do not wish their working class to be ruled by its own bureaucracy," Carrillo added.

Carrillo assessed as very positive relations between the Spanish Communist Party and the LCY, and underlined the importance of Yugoslavia's independent and nonaligned policy. "In this respect both sides fully understand each other. The same is true of the experience in the development of self-management which we assess as being the most democratic form realized so far in socialist countries," he said. "It is actually on independence and self-management that the cooperation and mutual understanding between our two parties is based," underlined Carrillo. "Involved are truly sincere relations and here I must underline that President Tito -- that is, his attitude towards both the problems of Spain and the Spanish Communist Party -- played a special role in developing this cooperation," Santiago Carrillo concluded.

NORWAY

KOLA-BASED USSR 'BACKFIRES' SIGHTED OFF LOFOTEN

[Text] On Friday [26 March] morning nine Soviet backfire attack aircraft were seen over international waters around 185 km west of Lofoten. The Soviet aircraft turned around and flew back to their base on the Kola Peninsula after being met and identified by four Norwegian F-16 pursuit aircraft from Bodo Airbase. The supersonic attack aircraft are equipped with missiles which could carry nuclear warheads. The missiles have a range of around 250 km.

Backfire aircraft have been seen so far south off the Norwegian coast once before. In June last year a corresponding formation of nine attack aircraft was identified by Norwegian pursuit aircraft north of Lofoten. The photographs the Norwegian pilots took then caused considerable controversy. Under their wings the Soviet aircraft had some cigar-like containers, and there was speculation that this was some type of Soviet cruise missile.

"The nine Soviet backfire aircraft's presence off the Norwegian coast is a clear expression of the military buildup taking place in the northern regions and on the Kola Peninsula," Eivinn Berg, Norwegian Foreign Ministry under secretary, told NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA.

SWEDEN

GOVERNMENT PROTESTS POLISH EXPULSION OF GYPSIES

PM051331 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 27 Mar 82 p 9

[Text] The Polish ambassador to Sweden, Pawel Cieslar, was summoned to the Swedish Foreign Ministry on Friday [26 March] to receive a strongly worded Swedish protest against what the Swedish Government is calling the "Polish authorities' exile of their own citizens." The background is that a large group of gypsies have arrived in Sweden in recent weeks with travel documents which mean that they have been deprived of the opportunity to return to Poland.

The written protest from Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten which the Foreign Ministry published on Friday does not mention that the individuals involved are gypsies. The protest primarily objects to the fact that the 40 or so persons affected have in practice been sent into exile. "Such behavior conflicts with all the rules of international intercourse. The Swedish Government considers it distressing that individuals should be treated in this deeply offensive manner," Ullsten said. Last fall Polish gypsies were subjected to various kinds of persecution in various places in Poland. These racial disturbances were given quite wide coverage in Polish newspapers.

But last Thursday, the so-called "support committee for Solidarity in southern Sweden" denounced that similar events had also taken place since the military takeover 13 December. Shortly before Christmas there were "pogram-like racial disturbances" in Oswiecim (Auschwitz) against gypsies, who had stones thrown at them. The gypsies are said to have been told by the police that their safety could not be guaranteed and that it would be best if they left the country. When they applied for passports they were instead given Polish travel documents, so-called titres de voyage, which state expressly that the holder is not a Polish citizen.

According to the Foreign Ministry, the Swedish authorities have been able to establish that the gypsies who recently came to Sweden were Polish citizens until they received these documents. Some of them traveled on ordinary Polish passports not valid for a return journey. "In practice, they have all been exiled," a Foreign Ministry comment on the protest note states.

FRANCIS PYM APPOINTED NEW FOREIGN SECRETARY

LD051724 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1718 GMT 5 Apr 82

[Text] Mr Francis Pym was tonight appointed Britain's new foreign secretary. Prime Minister Mrs Margaret Thatcher wasted no time in appointing him as successor to Lord Carrington.

Mr Pym, 60, will, with Defence Secretary Mr John Nott, take overall control of the naval operation aimed at restoring the Falkland Islands to Britain. Mr Pym's former job as lord president of the council and leader of the House of Commons goes to Mr John Biffen, until today secretary of state for trade.

Mr Pym's appointment was widely predicted following Lord Carrington's resignation. Mrs Thatcher has yet to appoint replacements for Mr Humphrey Atkins and Mr Richard Luce.

FALKLANDS GOVERNOR RETURNS, TO BRIEF THATCHER

[By Paul Fuller, PA staff reporter]

[Excerpts] Amid emotional scenes, the governor of the Falkland Islands, Mr Rex Hunt, flew into Britain today to give the prime minister a first-hand account of the Argentinian take-over of the islands. He travelled from the Uruguayan capital of Montevideo aboard an RAF VC-10, which landed at RAF Brize Norton, Oxfordshire, after a 15-hour flight.

Among the 113 passengers on the plane were other Falkland Islands officials and their families, British Embassy staff from Buenos Aires and 77 Royal Marines captured after the fall of Port Stanley last Friday. Pressmen were not permitted to interview any of the passengers, who were hurried into the terminal buildings for an immediate debriefing.

Sir Stuart Pringle [commandant general of the Royal Marines], on crutches, greeted the two Royal Marine officers accompanying the unit, Major Mike Norman, who had recently taken command in the Falklands, and outgoing commander, Major Gareth Noot.

Mr Hunt, 55, and the two majors were later boarding an RAF Andover to fly to the RAF base at Northolt, Middlesex, en route to London for their meeting with Mrs Thatcher. They were due to give a press conference at the Foreign Office this afternoon.

UK MAY ASK U.S., EEC FOR ARGENTINE SANCTIONS

[Excerpt] Ministers seemed today to be seeking to apply pressure on the Argentinian junta in an attempt to reach a negotiated settlement. For both Britain and Argentina a major issue of international prestige is at stake. Neither side will find it easy to back down.

Foreign Office officials said "intense diplomatic activity" was taking place, without spelling out any of the options. It was added, however, that negotiations could not easily take place with Argentina while the islands were occupied.

Britain may ask the United States and Common Market countries to follow the government's lead and freeze Argentinian assets, which could cause the junta severe economic problems. Britain offered maximum support to the United States over the Iranian hostages drama, and has also supported American policy in Central America.

If the EEC countries failed to offer support the idea of European co-operation would be severely damaged. The Falkland Islands office in London said an "Andorra solution" might be looked at again as a long-term way out of the dispute, although the Foreign Office has previously rejected such a solution.

Andorra is a small strip of territory between France and Spain, coveted by both, but by a treaty agreement after the Napoleonic wars it became practically self-governing. Neither country reliquished its claim, but agreed not to intervene.

ROYAL NAVY MAY USE SOUTH AFRICAN NAVAL BASE

PY051241 Paris AFP in Spanish 1142 GMT 5 Apr 82

[Excerpts] Cape Town, South Africa, 5 Apr (AFP) -- South African military experts are preparing for the eventual use of the nearby Simonstown navy base by the ships of the Royal Navy that are heading for the Malvinas Islands. It was noted that the Simonstown navy base was officially handed over to South Africa by Great Britain in 1957.

Western military experts noted that the nearest British port is located in Mid-Atlantic waters, on Ascension Island, which is almost at the same distance as the South African base. Nevertheless, the Simonstown base may offer the Royal Navy war fleet -- in the most powerful navy expedition since the Suez operation in 1956 — an infrastructure, logistic support and docks that the Royal Navy ships may not find at Ascension Island.

Simonstown is the best navy base in the Indian Ocean (along with that at Diego Garcia and the British archipelago Chagos) offering modern port installations able to meet the demands of any combat fleet. Located at the excellent shelter of False Bay, at 30 km east of Cape Town, Simonstown has an arsenal, several repair workshops, dry docks and floating docks for 2,000 ton ships (corvettes or submarines).

Strategically located at the tip of South Africa, Simonstown is ideally situated to control, together with the Silvermine ultramodern electronic listening center, the famous Cape Town route which serves as transportation route for about 60 percent of the oil supplies for Western Europe.

THATCHER INTERVIEWED ON FALKLANDS, CARRINGTON

LD052320 London ITV Television Network in English 2100 GMT 5 Apr 82

[Text] [Announcer] Mathias asked Mrs Thatcher what her reaction was to what was happening.

[Answer] Because I had no alternative, I spent a lot of time on Saturday and on Sunday trying persuade him [Lord Carrington] not to put in his resignation. He felt that he'd been head of the department responsible for the policy, the policy had failed and therefore it was a matter of honor that he should go. If a person says to me: It's a matter of honor and I feel I should go, that's the one ground on which I feel I'm not at liberty to refuse, because it would make it difficult for him. It was with great regret — he's been a marvellous foreign secretary; I've been with him on so many occasions; he's a sturdy and bonny fighter for Britain, a very gallant officer; and we shall miss him.

[Question] Do you accept, nevertheless, that there was a major error of judgment in assessing the intentions of the Argentine regime?

[Answer] I don't know that I could say that there was a major error of judgment. You see, we've had similar sounds from many Argentine regimes, many times in the last year, many, many times. And I suppose you could say that we ought somehow to have known that this one was different. We'd heard a lot of it before. But the fact is, this time the Argentines invaded. We were in charge when they invaded, and that's why Lord Carrington felt so strongly, and indeed I think we all feel deeply about it, but Lord Carrington felt that he was in charge of the Foreign Office at the time and there was not much point in going back and seeing whether we could have perceived that this was different from all the previous occasions. It turned out to be different, and there's no point in refuting that fact, and we now have to stand by the Falkland Islanders and try to secure, indeed to secure that island back.

[Question] Are there any more who feel it's a matter of honor to resign? Mr Nott, for instance?

[Answer] Mr Nott came to me. He was concerned. But his was not the lead department in policy; it's the Foreign Office that decides the policy on these matters. And, as I pointed out to him, his was not the lead department on policy. Also, as we have assembled a major fleet to go and to redeem the Falkland Islands, it was really no time for a secretary of state to resign. And he agreed to stay at his post, and that's where he should be.

[Question] Mrs Thatcher, the crisis to many people seems a little unreal because it's come upon us so quickly. Are we really going to fight a war with Argentina?

[Answer] Our objective is to recover the Falkland Islands. We have to do what is necessary to do that. I wouldn't talk in terms of war. Declaration of war is something different. Let's not get into technicalities. We must recover the Falkland Islands for Britain and for the people who live there, who are of British stock. Let's not say: Is it war, is it not? The declaration of war is technically different and our technicalities do not rest on technicalities. [sentence as heard] We know what we have to do, and there are many different ways of achieving that objective. Let's hope that it is not the worst one.

[Answer] Exactly. I entirely agree, I entirely agree. Therefore, don't say: Is it declaration of war or not? What matters is that we recover those islands. What matters is that the fleet is on its way. It has a lot of people on board, and we shall have to adjudge the precise situation when they are very much nearer than they are now.

[Question] Mr Nott has said yesterday that Britain was prepared to sink Argentine ships, prepared to storm the islands if necessary. Do you agree with that?

[Answer] We have to recover those islands. We have to recover them, for the people on them are British, of British stock, and they still owe allegiance to the crown and want to be British. We have to do what is necessary to recover those islands.

[Question] But the people themselves may suffer from a British invasion. There are already reports that they're terrified about the prospect of a British invasion.

[Answer] When you stop a dictator, there are always risks. That there are great risks in not stopping a dictator my generation learned a long time ago.

[Question] Is there any chance of averting the confrontation? Is there any chance that diplomatic moves may succeed in the meantime?

[Answer] We've been trying for many, many years. The fact is that the Argentines revived their claim of sovereignty -- I think it was about 1966 or 1967. Diplomatic moves have been made until now, and they have succeeded until now. All of a sudden now they have not succeeded. No one's been more active diplomatically than we have in the last 3 years. After all, there was a very, very successful conference in New York about it at the end of February. In a communique it was described as cordial and friendly. There were positive proposals put forward. We always negotiated, with members of the islands' council with us.

What I am saying to you is that those diplomatic moves have failed. And so, of course, we went to the Security Council and did very well to get a stratightforward condemnation by the Security Council of Argentina and a demand for the withdrawal. No one can have been more active diplomatically than we have. It failed. We shall go on diplomatically. But it's difficult to see how it could succeed now, when it failed before.

[Question] Indeed, when it comes to the crunch, can you rely on the support of the United States, when it comes to battle with Argentina?

[Answer] We have to try to recover what is our sovereign territory; we have to recover what is our sovereign territory. That is our problem. In all the diplomatic moves the United States was magnificent. They went in on our behalf diplomatically; Haig was marvellous, and so was President Reagan. And he had a very long telephone conversation with the president of the Argentine -- 50 minutes, and even his pleas fell on deaf ears. They have been marvellous diplomatically.

To recover British sovereign territory is a British problem. We will tackle it ourselves. We hope diplomatically to have the support of everyone else. And so many other people have openly condemned aggression. And this is why I say to you: It is important that aggression does not succeed. We've seen enough of it already. If this one succeeds, there will be other examples of it elsewhere. Therefore, we have a duty to our territory, to our people, also a duty to see that these aggressive moves do not succeed.

[Question] Mrs Thatcher, you've stated your objective very clearly, you've staked your colors to the mast: You're determined to free the Falklands. If you fail, would you feel obliged to resign?

[Answer] I am not talking about failure. I am talking about my supreme confidence in the British fleet, superlative ships, excellent equipment, the most highly trained, professional group of men, the most honorable and brave members of her majesty's services. Failure? Do you remember what Queen Victoria once said? Failure: The possibilities do not exist. That is the way we must look at it. Use all our professionalism, all our flair, every single bit of native cunning, every single bit of professionalism, and all our equipment. And we must go out calmly, quietly to succeed.

LD052252 London BBC Television Network in English 1910 GMT 5 Apr 82

[Interview granted by former Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington to Robert Kee on the "Panorama" program -- live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] Lord Carrington, your eye lost the ball: Is that a fair summary of why you had to resign?

[Answer] This was said, I think by Ted Rowlands [former Foreign Office minister]. I think if he'd ever been foreign secretary, he might have known that you have an awful lot of balls to keep your eye on. And I don't think my eye was off this ball. I think we were taking it extremely seriously. No problem about that.

[Question] There aren't all that many number of signs about that. You were in fact concerned with balls in the Middle East and elsewhere at the time. And this was a fairly large ball. After all, the newspapers based in this country and in Argentina had been talking about possible invasion ever since January.

[Answer] Could I just answer the two questions separately. We got firm information that something might happen on Monday. I flew back from the European Council, had a meeting with the prime minister, made a statement in Parliament on Tuesday and had another meeting with the prime minister on Thursday. So there is only one day on which I was away. I've made all the preparations, I've five other ministers here. I was in telephone communication from Tel Aviv and on telex and diplomatic communications. I knew exactly what was happening and I was sending telegrams back. So there is no question of eye off the ball. Now with regard to the first question about articles in the press...

[Question -- interrupting] Can I just, before you come to that, as you say there is no question of eye off the ball, you are talking about last Monday. The Argentinian-Falkland Island situation has been...

[Answer -- interrupting] I was coming to that.

[Question] Has been around for many years.

[Answer] I was just coming to that. The Argentinian question has been around for 20 or 30 years and in those 20 or 30 years they've been hot and cold. And LA PRENSA has written articles over the years of exactly the same character as were written now. Now what you have to do is to make a judgment about whether there is any particular difference.

[Question] So what you are saying is that it was only on Monday...

[Answer -- interrupting] Just let me finish this. Can I finish the sentence? And therefore you have to make a judgment about whether the LA PRENSA article at the beginning of January or whenever it was, was any different from what it was on all the other previous occasions over the years. Now there were indications that it was not because we were having diplomatic negotiations with the Argentinians in New York and Richard (Luce) was there and there was a very cordial meeting. He came back from New York and there was then a sign that they were dissatisfied. But all the time since General Galtierei had got in, what they were saying was: We must get on quicker with negotiations and it's got to be done by the end of the year. So the indications were that, immediately, there wasn't going to be any military action.

[Answer -- interrupting] For 20 years.

[Answer] For 20 years.

[Question] But President Galtieri was only elected a few months ago. Shouldn't you have realized that he was just the sort of man to exploit a foreign adventure in order to capture support at home?

[Answer] Look at his predecessors. And incidentally General Galtieri, interestingly enough, when he made his inaugural speech, said nothing whatever about using force in The Falkland Islands.

[Question] Well, he wouldn't would he if he was intending to use it?

[Answer] Well, then how were we to know he was going to do it?

[Question] I mean you assumed.

[Answer] You want to have it both ways, if I may say so. What you were saying is we should have known because it was obvious they were going to. When I say it isn't obvious because they didn't say so, you say: He wouldn't, would he.

[Question] But the Foreign Office is meant to have unobvious ways of finding out.

[Answer] Well, the unobvious ways of finding out show that there was by no means a certainty. And, if I may tell you something, that our assessment of it is that they didn't actually make up their minds to do this until about 29 March. Now, it may very well be, of course, that the troops were loaded up, but these exercises -- the Argentine exercises -- take place very, very regularly. And they were a very long way from the Falkland Islands. It was only that time that they turned to the Falkland Islands.

[Question] With modern satellite intelligence, wouldn't it have been possible with the precision which they now possess, to find out exactly what was happening?

[Answer] Now, you put me into a very difficult position, because I really don't think that I -- now I've resigned, I'm not entitled anyway -- can talk about intelligence. But it really is not quite as easy as Ted Rowlands makes out.

[Question] No. I accept that point, but I must say that the Foreign Office is responsible for intelligence in foreign affairs. And clearly the intelligence was lacking in this case.

[Answer] No, I don't think so much the intelligence was lacking. What I think was -- and this is why I felt it right to resign -- I think that on what we knew, the judgment that I made as foreign secretary was sensible and right. Now, it turned out that they were wrong in the sense that there was an intention of the Argentines to resign [as heard] and therefore the judgment was wrong and I am responsible and therefore I thought honorably I ought to go. But if I look back over what I did, and knowing what I did, I do not believe that what I did was wrong.

[Question] Mrs Thatcher has said she did her best to dissuade you from resigning. And by resigning now, haven't you in a way made matters worse by undermining the confidence in British power and influence just as she is engaged on the most hazardous part of the whole operation?

[Answer] Well, I don't understand why you said that because the whole of the tenor of what you've been saying hitherto is that everything was wrong, therefore my judgment was not good at all. Come one, let me just answer the question. Therefore you're now saying, in spite of the fact that everything you did was wrong, you ought to have stayed and it weakens the government.

[Question] But it's an entirely different situation.

[Answer] What I think is important is that there is a constitutional custom. There's no doubt about it that what happened in the Falkland Islands has been a great national humiliation, that some of us knew the difficulty of defending the Falkland Islands -- you couldn't ever say so, of course, because it was an invitation to the Argentines to do it -- but in fact some of us knew it. Nobody else did and it was obviously a shock for those who didn't, very much greater.

Now, I have been in charge of foreign policy and, as I say, the judgment was wrong about whether they were going to do it. And I don't think it's right in those circumstances that you behave as if nothing has happened and go on and I thought that the honorable thing was to resign and I've done it.

[Question] Can we look at what might have happened if your judgment had not been as wrong as you now say it was and you did realize what they were going to do, what would you have thought was the right thing to do? I mean, it is being said continually that the government's naval military measures are taken in tandem with diplomatic measures. But if we insist that we're going to get the Falklands back, Argentina insists that she's not going to give them back, what would there be to negotiate about through diplomatic channels?

[Answer] Well, one of the things that we were trying to do over these years was to find a solution which was acceptable to the Argentines and acceptable to the people of the Falkland Islands. But we always made it -- all governments have done this -- I mean I was absolutely astonished to hear Mr Silkin say that negotiation was wrong. It's disgraceful to argue about it. I mean admittedly he was a comparatively junior minister and may not have known much about it. But in point of fact the Labor Party were doing exactly the same 4 years ago. What we were trying to do was to find a solution subject, always subject to the paramount wishes of the people of the Falkland Islands. Now you can see the,difficulty of doing it, but you also see the idiocy of not trying it. Because nothing else is left.

[Question] Now, Mrs Thatcher has made it absolutely clear that our objective is to get control of the Falklands again and to restore British administration. Does this mean we must retain British sovereignty?

[Answer] Well, I think what it means is that...

[Question -- interrupting] Can I ask you specifically on sovereignty? Do we insist on retaining sovereignty over the Falkland Islands or could we perhaps negotiate some arrangement by which we give sovereignty to the Argentines and lease back the Falkland Islands?

[Answer] Well, that particular problem, particular idea, was one of the things that's been discussed -- whether or not you could get a very long period of lease back.

[Question] So our sovereignty is discussable?

[Answer] Well, up to a point in which a very long lease back, which satisfied the islanders, would have been something we could consider. But, of course, the problems of getting any agreement on that, I mean it would have to be a very long time indeed for the Falkland Islanders to feel themselves secure and, of course it would be difficult for the Argentines, who would be getting more and more impatient. But one was trying to find ways which made it possible to get a solution in which there was agreement on both sides.

[Question] You very rightly probably say that it is the fate of the islanders that is really the important thing. Of course another solution would be to allow them to remain British and enjoy the standard of living and type of living they enjoy by removing them to Britain. Would that be a possibility you would envisage?

[Answer] I was interested to read the papers this morning. A journalist in the DAILY MAIL writing a rather disagreeable article, in the middle of the article said everybody has known for years that the Falkland Islanders should be settled. And this seemed rather curious when the rest of the article was directed at complaints about what we've been trying to do on negotiations. But I don't believe any suggestion on the part of the British Parliament to the Falkland Islanders that they would leave their homes and go away and be settled somewhere else would have been at all well received by them.

And if you say the wishes of the Falkland Islanders, who've been there for 150 years, should be respected, then they should be respected.

[Question] Isn't perhaps the real charge against British foreign policy that this was an anachronistic situation surviving from other days, from imperial days, and that we should have come to terms with it, modern terms with it, before such intense pressure was put upon the situation?

[Answer] But, you see, that's just what's been happening over the last 20 years. We've been trying to negotiate and to defuse it, to come to a situation in which it's possible for a solution to come. But when you've got 1,800 people — and there were more than that, there were more than that in those days, they've got rather less now -- when you're talking about people who are profoundly patriotic and British and want to remain British, and you've got a country 400 miles away which is ruled by a military dictatorship of a very nasty kind, and you look at their human rights record, the two things are very difficult to equate.

[Question] Yes, but also we knew the whole time that Argentina minded very much about the Falkland Islands, and their feelings were very strong. These feelings you seem to have ignored, or rather not taken sufficient notice of.

[Answer] That's what negotiations were about.

[Question] But there weren't any. There you were in the Middle East, not thinking about the Falkland Islands.

[Answer] Negotiations have been going on for 20 years or more. Richard Luce had been in New York discussing this with the Argentinians. They'd come to an agreement about how the negotiations should proceed. Then when he got back, when the Argentinians got back to Buenos Aires, he was told he'd been too nice. So a message was sent to me saying we had to do better. I was considering that message and wondering what the best thing to do, and how to answer it in the light of what the islanders wanted. We had to consult the islanders. It is quite impossible for a foreign secretary who's got all sorts of problems — the mandate, the East-West relations, Poland, Namibia, all the rest of it — to sit down 2 hours a day in London and never leave it and talk about the Falkland Islands.

And I really do think that people ought to keep a sense of proportion about it. The office — there's a whole lot of people in the office here who actually look after the Falkland Islands....

[Question] Was there a Falkland Islands desk looking after the Falkland Islands problem all the time?

[Answer] Of course.

[Question] All the more reason surely that they should have found out what was about to happen?

[Answer] But, you see, we're back where we were. We knew what the assessment was. It read that the assessments were different.

[Question] Except that you got it wrong.

[Answer] Well, what we got wrong was that the Argentinians invaded on March 29. You know, if I may say so, all you're saying is: Look, aren't I clever, sitting there asking questions and being wise after the event. Now I say in answer to that: Yes, you're perfectly right, I was wrong, and I reckon, given the information that I was given, you would have taken exactly the same decisions as me.

[Question] Very briefly, can I ask you this: Was perhaps the real reason for your resignation that you did not agree with Mrs Thatcher about the measures to be taken, and that you were more in favor of some negotiated settlement than she was?

[Answer] Absolutely not. I agreed 100 percent with what the prime minister has done. I back her absolutely up to the hilt. There is no question whatever of that.

[Question] With this great venture involving half the British Navy underway, the whole credibility and influence of British power in the modern world is now at stake. What happens if we fail?

[Answer] Well, why should it fail? That's a terribly media question, isn't it? Well, I'll say what happens if it succeeds, and let's make it succeed....

[Question] I don't think it's a media question; I think that the British public are very worried that it might not succeed, and therefore I'm entitled to put it to you on behalf of the British public.

[Answer] We're not going to know for 3 weeks, or whatever, whether things are going to be successful. Lots of things can happen between now and 3 weeks. You can't stop your diplomatic activity. I mean, I know a lot of people disregard the United Nations and don't think it matters very much, but in point of fact the mandatory resolution we got in the Security Council is very important....

[Question] So you have high hopes of a diplomatic settlement?

[Answer] No, I don't have high hopes of it. What I am saying is that what we've got to do is to pull out every stop in the diplomatic thing. Now, if we are successful, it makes what happens in the Falkland Islands and round the Falkland Islands in the next 3 weeks that much more difficult. It puts us in that much stronger a position. Instead of this talk about failure, let's make sure we have success.

BRITISH CITIZENS URGED TO LEAVE ARGENTINA

[Excerpt] British citizens were advised tonight to leave Argentina because of the Falkland Islands invasion. The advice was put out in a special message by the BBC World Service at the request of the Foreign Office.

The broadcast said: "British citizens who have no pressing need to remain in Argentina are advised to consider leaving the country by normal commercial means." Further information, it said, could be obtained from the Swiss Embassy in Buenos Aires. The embassy is handling the affairs of thousands of Britons in Argentina in the absence of regular British Embassy staff.

The BBC is to broadcast two extra programmes a week to the Falklands, starting tomorrow. The second broadcast will go out on Thursday. The one regular programme of the week, "Calling Falklands," goes out on Sundays.

The BBC World Service has had a congratulatory telex from HMS Endurance, which is in the South Georgia area. It said: "Your service is a great comfort os us all."

EC CONDEMNS ARGENTINE INVASION, PLEDGES SUPPORT

LD061322 London BBC Domestic Service in English 1200 GMT 6 Apr 82

[Text] The government has made a formal request for support from its Common Market partners in bringing about an Argentine withdrawal from the Falkland Islands. At a meeting of the 10 permanent representatives in Brussels this morning, Britain is understood to have asked for a united European approach, calling for active, diplomatic support as well as help with any economic sanctions that Britain may impose. And from the EC there has been a condemnation of the Argentine invasion. Here is Charles Hodgshon reporting from Brussels:

[Begin recording] It is not clear that all 10 of Britain's Common Market partners are likely to be firmly in favor of the government's efforts to dislodge the Argentines from the Falkland Islands. They are quite specifically defined to be part of the territory of the European Community by the Treaty of Rome, which also foresees concerted action by EEC members in the event of serious international tension. In a statement which has no precedent in Community history, the EEC Commission expressed its solidarity with the British Government and said it hopes the OAS would join its efforts to those of the United Nations to insure a solution based on law.

Exactly what the British Government has requested is veiled in secrecy, but any united European action, for example a ban on Argentine imports, could have serious consequences for Argentina, which exported more than 1.2 million pounds worth of goods to the European Community in 1980. All the EEC states agree with Mrs Thatcher that the best solution would be a diplomatic one, avoiding bloodsheed, but what is striking is the way a Community which last week was divided by farm prices and budget contributions, is now firmly united in its support for Britain. MOTION CONDEMNS GOVERNMENT, URGES DIPLOMACY

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Text] An attempt by Mr Tony Benn to commit the Labour Party to condemning the sailing of the British task force to the Falklands failed narrowly today. The party's international committee voted down his proposal by six votes to five with a number of abstentions. Mr Benn warned that the use of the task force would imperil the safety of the islanders. He said: "In no circumstances can I support the use of force and I felt I had to put down this proposal."

After two and a half hours of private talks, the committee passed by 11 votes to nil, again with some abstentions, a long motion roundly condemning the government's handling of the affair and backing efforts to resolve the situation by diplomatic means. Some members, including Mr Michael Foot, the opposition leader, expressed apprehension about the dangers of using force. The motion, which will go before Labour's ruling national executive for ratification later this month, says: "We condemn without qualification the actions of the Argentine military fascist government in taking over the Falkland Islands by force. We further condemn them for the actions they are now taking against the inhabitants of the islands.

"We believe the British Government have failed dismally in their duty to protect the islanders and that the failure was the responsibility of the entire government, including and especially the prime minister, not that of individual ministers. We demand a full inquiry into the failure of the government on this issue." The motion supports the efforts to resolve the situation by diplomatic means and welcomes the United Nation's Security Council resolution demanding an Argentinian withdrawal. "The paramount consideration must be the rights and safety of the islanders and that all actions of the British Government must be directed to their protection rather than by concern for property interests, natural resources or salvaging the pride of discredited ministers."

DENKTAS CRITICIZES KIPRIANOU'S ROME STATEMENT

TA051222 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 5 Apr 82

[Excerpts] President Denktas has said that the Greek Cypriot leader, Mr Kiprianou, had repeated his old statements, trying to raise the hope of his community that the Cyprus problem was developing in accordance with his views. President Denktas, speaking to correspondents this morning, commented on a statement by Mr Kiprianou in Rome following a meeting with the UN secretary general, Mr [Perez] de Cuellar. Mr Denktas said that as long as Mr Kiprianou viewed the Cyprus problem as in invasion by Turkey, the solution would be difficult. He repeated that the situation in Cyprus was not a Turkish invasion but a peace operation as a result of which the Turkish Cypriots were saved from an invasion by Greece. He recalled that it was only after this peace operation that the Turkish Cypriots had been saved from the Greek Cypriot threats and oppression and begun to live as human beings.

President Denktas said that Mr Kiprianou should understand that the Cyprus problem could not have a solution without Turkey's guarantee, because the Turkish Cypriots have not forgotten their sufferings between the years 1963 and 1974 and that the world should remember this fact. The president said that it was understood from Mr Kiprianou's statements that he had told Mr de Cuellar the same things. He added that this was strengthening the view that the Greek Cypriots would be taking the Cyprus problem to the United Nations within the coming months. He said that such an action would not be conducive to a solution of the Cyprus problem, and as long as the Turkish Cypriots were not accorded equal rights to address the General Assembly, any resolution to be adopted would not be binding on the Turkish Cypriot community. The president stressed that the Turkish Cypriot community did not see any peaceful approach in the joint actions of the Greek prime minister, Mr Papandreou, and Greek Cypriot leader Mr Kiprianou.

Replying to a question as to whether this meant that the Greek Cypriots aimed to internationalize the Cyprus problem, President Denktas replied in the affirmative, adding that as such an action would mean the suspension of the Cyprus intercommunal talks and as the Turkish Cypriot community would not be represented, it would not help but would damage the solution of the Cyprus problem.

Kiprianou Messages 'Propaganda'

TA011621 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 1 Apr 82

[Excerpt] President Rauf Denktas has criticized Greek Cypriot communit leader Kiprianou for sending messages to foreign heads of state and government on the missing persons issue. Pointing out that Kiprianou's messages are proof of his wish to distort and change the facts, Denktas noted that the fact that Kiprianou wants to involve Turkey -- which is in no way connected with the formation of the missing persons committee -- in this issue shows that the Greek Cypriots are actually interested only in propaganda against Turkey. Denktas said that if the Greek Cypriots had not viewed every matter concerning the two communities as subjects for propaganda, the problem could have been solved long ago.

GREEK ACTS IN THRACE SIMILAR TO THOSE IN CYPRUS

[Excerpts] President Denktas has said that the Turkish Cypriot community strongly supports the Turks of Western Thrace in Greece in their struggle against the Greek Government, which has been planning to expropriate their land. In reply to a question by a reporter, Mr Denktas said that similar methods had been applied in Cyprus by the Greek Cypriot leadership to deprive the Turkish Cypriots of their property. The Turks of Western Thrace, he added, were now confronted with a similar situation.

ECEVIT BELIEVES ATATURK'S LEGACY NOW BETRAYED

PM021617 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 29 Mar 82 pp 12, 13

[Article by Turkish former Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit: "Turkey Is Like a Bird That Cannot Fly"]

[Text] Last year Turkey celebrated the 100th anniversary of the birth of Kemal Ataturk. Throughout the year the founder of the Turkish Republic was commemorated, countless seminars and symposiums were organized, and schools and parks were named for him. Everywhere Ataturk statues were erected and a few enterprising businessmen even seized the opportunity of holding sales in Ataturk's name. But the picture also has its dark side: Although he was a successful field commander Ataturk was very careful to separate his political power from his military power. But on the 100th anniversary of his birth the military was ruling Turkey.

Ataturk founded the Grand National Assembly, the parliament, in 1922 in the middle of a war at home and abroad -- at a time when leaders in a number of countries with comparatively smaller problems were abolishing parliamentary systems. On the eve of his 100th birthday the Grand National Assembly was dissolved. He declared 23 April -- the date of the creation of the National Assembly -- a national holiday and called it "the day of national sovereignty and the child." It was his wish that the Turkish people should identify parliamentarism with the idea of national sovereignty and that the Turks should accept parliamentarism from their earliest childhood. But in his anniversary year even this national holiday was abolished.

Ataturk's relationship with the parliament he had created himself was in no way problem-free. Particularly during the war of liberation, when he assumed the posts of parliament chairman and commander in chief of the armed forces himself, he was the target of tough attacks and criticism and obstacles were put in his way by various groups and members of parliament, but he always respected parliament and spoke of it in the highest terms. He was very careful never to hurt the prestige and feelings of the parliamentarians. But in the year of the 100th anniversary of his birth the National Assembly was dissolved and its members mocked officially.

The Republican People's Party, [RPP] which Ataturk founded to carry on his ideas and reforms, was dissolved. His written testament was violated. In his testament Ataturk entrusted the Republican People's Party with Administering his political inheritance. In this way Ataturk was obviously hoping to ensure that in the future the party would not be able to be suppressed without violating his last wishes. He was obviously unable to imagine that a legal testament -- and especially not that of the founder of the republic -- could be violated in a country with such a long state tradition and a judicial system. But this is exactly what happened on the 100th anniversary of his birth.

Ataturk had entrusted the Republican People's Party with the task of working as the most important instrument of his reforms and his modernization and democratization programs. Shortly after World War I the party, under Ataturk's close colleague and successor Ismet Inonu, achieved one of its founder's most important goals -- the party took the initiative for a multiparty system. Ataturk proved that he was fully determined to achieve such a system by twice attempting to introduce it during his life. But both times he was forced to break off the experiment and postpone it because his modernization program needed more time before it would be able to resist the opposition of the reactionary forces.

But he was confident his reforms would be well able to stand the test of a multiparty system once his modernization program had put down roots among the population. Such was indeed the case in the three decades following World War II, when democratic governments were in power.

Ataturk's program meant that the road to democracy should be prepared and that the Republican People's Party, should remain chiefly responsible for the most effective communication of his ideas and reforms, of democracy and human rights. The party was an integral part of the development of modern Turkish society.

The dissolution of such a party is nothing less than an attempt to turn the course of historical events in the completely opposite direction. It is as if society were cut off from the state. All parties were dissolved last year. It is bad enough in itself to get one or another party out of the way for political reasons, but the ban on the RPP could create a dangerous political vacuum in the political spectrum in the country. For while the other parties can reemerge under other names or clandestinely, attempts to recreate the RPP would be as difficult as attempts to repeat history.

The fact that the RPP survived all the trials, all the temptations, indeed all the shocks of the democratic multiparty system, was to a large extent thanks to a historical consciousness of the party's mission and the party's loyalty to Ataturk and to his views. It is difficult to imagine that another new party will feel its honor and its historical consciousness connected with Ataturk's principles the way the RPP did.

The 12 March 1971 military intervention was the first attempt to destroy or break democracy and freedom, the first attempt to suppress the "democratic left" -- the social democratic movement, for which the RPP laid the foundation.

This leftwing democratic foundation has been worked out by the party since the mid-sixties. It was an attempt to adapt Ataturk's social ideas and ideals to the new conditions created by the industrialization of Turkish society. In this period of military interventions the RPP was able to ensure its existence and strengthen the leftwing democratic movement despite all opposition, and in this much helped to save democracy with a minimum of damage. Even though the party's goals were at that time often considered to be too ambitious and hopeless both in Turkey and abroad, the party was successful. After many years of setbacks the party was rewarded by the people, who made it into the strongest party. Despite the deep divisions caused by the military intervention, the party won the 1973 election and held government power for 8 months.

Those responsible for the next military intervention, on 12 September 1980, however, began by totally destroying the party in order to replace democracy with a puppet regime with limited powers, and in order to ensure that the reemergence of a social democratic political force would be impossible in the foreseeable future. The regime that those in power are planning for Turkey can be likened to a bird with only one wing, the right. It goes without saying that such a bird cannot fly. That is why they are making use of all means imaginable -- as well as some which do not bear thinking about -- to frighten, discredit, immobilize and silence each and every one who might be able to make the smallest contribution to the reestablishment of a leftwing democratic movement.

It looks as if there are people who are unaware that the political vacuum created in this way could be exploited by certain extremist forces which never managed to win more than 1 or 2 percent of the votes as long as the RPP with its social democratic policies was in existence.

But a more serious consideration is that Ataturk's inheritance could be sacrificed. As I write I am aware of a clear risk to myself -- for well-known reasons I cannot publish this article in Turkey. But as the party's third chairman, I see it as my duty to put before the public in democratic states what I see as a true picture of Ataturk. I will fight against every possibility of Ataturk being identified with a military or a paternalistic regime as a justification for the government at present being prepared for Turkey.

When surnames were introduced by law in Turkey in the thirties, the Grand National Assembly gave Kemal the surname Ataturk -- the Father of the Turks. Despite this Kemal never misused his position as a national hero either in a paternalistic cult or to win the support of the military while he ruled. In a world and in an age when many leaders with a civilian background put on military uniforms, Ataturk, once the republic had been proclaimed and he had become its first president, put aside his uniform. He led the country during an age when the masses and young people in particular in some much more developed and highly cultivated societies were brainwashed by official dogmas. Ataturk did the opposite -- he encouraged free, rational, scientific thinking. Under his leadership Turkey really became the place of refuge for many prominent men of learning who were forced to flee from dictatorial regimes.

He did not dream of setting up a military or paramilitary regime in order to weather crises, no matter how serious they were. On the contrary; in setting up the Grand National Assembly, which at times offered him violent opposition, he was building on the support of the general public when he faced the most serious crisis in Turkish history -- the danger of the country being divided. He saw the support of the people as the only legitimate and reliable source of political power, both domestically and in cases of international tensions, conflicts and relations.

It is interesting to note that the very parliament Ataturk valued so highly once attempted, with a law tailormade for the purpose, to remove him from political life, on the grounds that his father was born in Thessaloniki, outside Turkey's new borders, and because he had not had the required permanent residence for 5 consecutive years. Ataturk, the victor in the war of liberation, replied with all respect that he had moved from front to front in order to defend the country and had therefore not had the chance to live in the same place for 5 years.

Thus the father of Turkey became the first target of the Turkish fondness for removing political leaders from political life with the help of the law. But not even this bitter experience shook his faith in parliament and the parliamentary system.

In response to my arguments, it is possible of course to tell me that the situation in Turkey in 1980 was in the final analysis completely different, that terrorism was raging, that the parliament had ceased to function and so on and so on. All this is true. But one must remember that military interventions, if they become the norm at times of crisis -- and this has been the case in Turkey since 1960 -- have a psychological effect on certain politicians and certain voters, in such a way that when they are facing a crisis they fall to the temptation of expecting the military to "save" the country, instead of assuming responsibility themselves and gathering their strength to overcome the crisis with the help of the rules and institutions of democracy.

In other words, apathy could come to replace the feeling of responsibility. Yet another result of regular military interventions in times of crisis is this -- that many frustrated politicians, political losers and political adventurers, together with those circles seeking an opportunity to get rid of democracy, develop a fondness for creating crises themselves. They all work toward the same goal -- that is, to create the circumstances that lead the military to think that "the time is once again ripe for intervention."

DEMONSTRATIONS BY WESTERN THRACE TURKS CONTINUE

TA031036 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 3 Apr 82

[Text] The demonstration begun by Western Thrace Turks in Iskece [Xhanti] yesterday continued today. The Turks are protesting the expropriation of lands, in their use for 110 years, in accordance with a court ruling. The Iskece court decided to expropriate the registered lands owned by Western Thrace Turks since 1872. The court has asked the Turkish peasants to evacuate the lands in question.

The Turkish Radio and Television correspondent reports from Athens that the Turkish peasants who assembled in the Iskece square last night with their tractors and trailers after they were informed of the court decision are still there. On the various placards they are carrying the peasants are protesting the implementation of decisions in connection with their lands.

Foreign Ministry View

TA031648 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 1555 GMT 3 Apr 82

[Text] Ankara, 3 Apr (AA) -- Foreign Ministry Spokesman Ambassador Nazmi Akiman has said that the ruling of the Iskece court that the registered property of Western Thrace Turks, which has belonged to them for the last 110 years, be considered the property of the Greek state is an example of the fact that even the judiciary can be used as a tool for implementation of a policy. Replying to journalists' questions today in connection with the ruling of the Iskece court against the Western Thrace Turks, Ambassador Akiman said: Turkey is following these developments with great care and sensitivity and it still wishes to retain the hope that this ruling, which has tainted justice, will be rectified by a higher court.

Ambassador Akiman said: Our government will draw the attention of the Greek Government to the serious situation created by the fact that the rights of property and defense of Western Thrace Turks are limited, in contradiction to the principles of human rights.

MILITARY PROSECUTOR CLOSES CASE AGAINST DEMIREL

NC051843 Paris AFP in English 1828 GMT 5 Apr 82

[Text] Istanbul, 5 Apr (AFP) -- Istanbul chief military prosecutor Colonel Suleyman Takkeci decided today to close an investigation of former Turkish Premier Suleyman Demirel, judiciary sources announced here. The Istanbul Martial Law Command had ordered an investigation of Mr Demirel, who heads the conservative Justice Party, after publication of an article by him in the weekly HAYAT.

The editor-in-chief of the weekly, Kemal Uzun, was also to be investigated for violating National Security Council Decree No 52 by publishing the article, but Col Takkeci today ruled that no violation had been committed since Mr Demirel's article "did not concern the political and judicial structure of Turkey's past and present." In his article, Mr Demirel had replied to a serial in the liberal daily MILLIYET entitled "Billions (?Turned) into Ashes" which criticized former governments for wasting billions on major projects that were never completed.

THORN URGES REVIEW OF AIMS OF ORGANIZATION

[Text] Bonn, 4 Apr (DPA) -- President of the EEC Commission Gaston Thorn has urged a review and a fundamental discussion on the aims of the EEC. Speaking on Deutschlandfunk on Sunday, Thorn spoke in favor of a revision in terms of a broadening of the Rome treaties. In view of the internal state of the EEC, it was more important than ever to say "in what sort of community we are prepared to act and work."

"I wouldn't say we should change our aims, but we should reset our sights on them; we should clearly examine them," Thorn stressed. At present it is necessary to consolidate what we have. In connection with the separatist tendencies in some regions of the community, Thorn made it clear that there would be no special statute for any country "which is not in keeping with the treaty."

Speaking of the problems linked with the entry of Spain and Portugal into the community, Thorn said that first of all we must put our own house in order. "Only when we have a new treaty can we digest another enlargement."

The six items which have been finally completed, subject to the overall agreement on the 16 items comprising the membership negotiations as a whole, are as follows: Transportation, movement of capital, regional policy, economic and financial issues, right of establishment [of foreign banks, coinsurance and paramedical professions in Spain] and free performance of services and harmonization of legislation.

UK N. IRELAND PLAN SEEN 'UNWORKABLE, MISTAKEN'

LD051654 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1608 GMT 5 Apr 82

[Text] Britain's white paper plans for devolved government in Northern Ireland were officially branded "unworkable and mistaken" by the Irish Republic's Government in Dublin today. A statement issued soon after Ulster Secretary Mr James Prior announced by [words indistinct] confirmed a verdict delivered last week by Irish Premier Mr Charles Haughey on the scheme.

Dublin's formal comment spoke of "the unworkable nature and mistaken focus of the proposals." The statement said of Mr Prior's plan: "Their unworkability is emphasised by the reaction of the Northern Ireland political parties." The Dublin government said it would study the plans in detail, but it signalled disapproval of the white paper's aim of elaborating a form of devolved administration within Northern Ireland alone because it ignored the broader dimension of the problem.

"It is the government's view that only policies designed to promote peace, stability and reconciliation between the two major Irish traditions and to develop a totality of relations within these islands can contribute to a true solution to Northern Ireland's difficulties."

The statement said such policies should be brought forward through the operation of the Anglo-Irish governmental council and in particular, through the role of Anglo-Irish parliamentary institutions in which Northern Ireland representatives participated.

It concluded: "The fundamental objective of government policy remains the achievement of a united Ireland by peaceful and political means."

CHANCELLOR INTERVIEWED ON GREEK RELATIONS

NC041812 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 4 Apr 82 pp 1, 3

[Interview granted by Austrian Chancellor Kreisky to Y.Kh. Papakhristou in Vienna -- date not given]

[Text] [Question] Mr Kreisky, how would you describe Greek-Austrian relations? Is there a possibility for further development since PASOK took over the Greek government?

[Answer] For a long time Austrian-Greek relations have been satisfactory. At the time of the colonels' dictatorship we helped those who struggled for human rights as much as we could. With regard to the present, the fact that the Socialist Party has governed Austria for a long time and that the Socialist Party of Andreas Papandreou governs Greece constitutes yet another reason for closer contacts between these two countries.

[Question] According to press reports Prime Minister Papandreou will pay an official visit to Vienna in the autumn. What do you expect from this visit?

[Answer] Primarily I am pleased about this news. And as I have said to your country's deputy defense minister who had visited me, I wish that the close cooperation between Greece and Austria, which has been achieved in the "Steyr-Hellas" [Company], could be extended to other fields as well. We know that Greece's labor potential in industry is excellent. Consequently, it is possible for us to have common positions in various economic fields. We would also be able to jointly dispose of the products we would manufacture to third countries. This is only one proposal, one position. The second position is that there are probably no great differences of views on political issues, particularly now that the small countries must be heeded. Otherwise only the superpowers will make world decisions, something that could be very dangerous. Therefore, I would be happy to welcome Andreas Papandreou in Vienna as a friend holding the same ideology.

[Question] According to press reports Willy Brandt is expected to undertake an initiative on the Cyprus issue. With your country's stated good intention of contributing to the consolidation of peace, should we expect active support from Austria concerning Brandt's initiative?

[Answer] Because of our neutrality we are rather reserved and careful in all these issues. But we understand our neutrality in such a way that it allows us to express our views very clearly. Willy Brandt could certainly count on our impartial moral support for his initiative on the Cyprus issue.

[Question] The war clouds are amassing over the Middle East, threatening it. In the past you had offered your good services to the area. Are you thinking of offering something similar now?

[Answer] When Western Europe had not recognized the importance of the Arab world and, particularly, the problems that exist there, I headed a delegation to carry out an on-the-spot examination of the situation in all these countries. In a special report, I presented the Palestinians' problem as the main one in the Middle East. Now, today, all the European countries have stopped closing their eyes to this fact. Thus, I think I have accomplished my mission. Nevertheless, events in this part of the world interest me, especially because I believe that a war could result from this hotbed. Israel is a militaristic state that shows no willingness to reach an agreement, and this is something which I am particularly worried about.

GENSCHER WON'T MEDIATE IN FALKLANDS CRISIS

DW070829 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1800 GMT 6 Apr 82

[Reporter Thomas interview with FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Brazil; date not given -- videotaped]

[Text] [Question] What role can you play here in Brazil with regard to the Falkland Islands conflict?

[Answer] Certainly not that of a mediator; rather that of a friend of the United Kingdom. I will make it very clear here how much Europe has been shocked by the occupation of the Falkland Islands and that it is, therefore, necessary for Argentina to withdraw its troops from the islands. I think that precedence must also be given here to a political solution of the conflict rather than to the use of military force.

No Weapons to Argentina

[Text] Bonn, 6 Apr (DPA) -- "Under the present circumstances" Bonn will supply no weapons to Argentina. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker announced this on Tuesday evening on Bonn. Becker said that the FRG would prevent "a country which has committed an illegal act of force from receiving weapons from the FRG." The Netherlands and Austria have already imposed a similar ban.

The government's decision especially affects the export of warships. FRG firms have concluded contracts with the government in Buenos Aires on the supply of submarines and frigates, some of which have not yet been carried out in full.

BRANDT MEETS WITH CYPRUS PRESIDENT KIPRIANOU

[Text] Today President Kiprianou met in West Germany with FRG Social Democratic Party Chairman Willy Brandt. Our station's correspondent, Yiannis Kareklas, reports:

[Begin recording] This afternoon President Kiprianou met with Willy Brandt at the small city of [name indistinct] 60 miles southwest of Frankfurt. The talks were held at the Zwan Hotel and, together with the working luncheon that followed, lasted more than 3 hours.

Answering questions after the meeting, both Mr Brandt and President Kiprianou expressed their happiness with the meeting, during which they had a broad exchange of views on the current phase of the Cyprus problem. Mr Brandt expressed his disappointment over the absence of anything substantive in connection with the solution of the Cyprus problem. He said: Since my visit to Cyprus at the beginning of the year, I find that there is still more reason than in the past to bring to the attention of the European countries in particular, as well as internationally, the importance of the Cyprus problem, not only for the Cypriots themselves but also for the region and for Europe.

Answering a question as to when he will begin promoting the Cyprus problem, as he stated in Cyprus during his visit, Mr Brandt said: I do not believe that my main role in this case is to make public statements. On the contrary, my main role is to talk to others, in Europe and elsewhere, and bear responsibility for the Cyprus problem. I have already begun, but a long road still lies ahead of us.

The possibilities of a discussion with the Turkish side appear to be more difficult than I thought. However, there is no doubt that so long as there is the necessity of cooperation from various sides, particularly from those who are involved in the problem, I shall continue my efforts. I will not be disappointed. I will continue to be useful for the problem of Cyprus.

Asked how he views his role as catalyst he said: I am not the catalyst but a catalyst, one of those who can contribute to the Cyprus solution. At this time what the United Nations itself and UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar can do is very important. It is not only a question of respect for the United Nations, but also a basic question that nothing should be done that would make the UN's task more difficult than it is now. The advice that I can give is to put the Cyprus problem on the international stage and to stress its importance -- so that the world will consider the Cyprus problem important for European and international cooperation.

In his statement, President Kiprianou said that he will have more meetings with Mr Brandt in the future in order to continue their cooperation. Mr Kiprianou said that he discussed ways and means to persuade governments regarding the necessity of achieving an early Cyprus solution because, as he said, the Cyprus problem is not something which must be forgotten because of the existence of other international problems in the world. This is a problem which, if resolved in the interest of Cyprus -- Greek Cypriots, Turkish Cypriots and others -- would benefit the region as well as international peace and security.

President Kiprianou said: We are particularly happy because Mr Brandt is undertaking an active role, as he himself has outlined it, to promote a Cyprus solution. Asked about the present chances for the promotion of the Cyprus problem following his Rome meeting with Mr Perez de Cuellar, and here with Mr Brandt, President Kiprianou said: It is difficult for one to make a prediction. According to my appraisals following my talks with Mr Brandt and my talks in Rome, and from other indications, there is no doubt that there is increased interest in a Cyprus solution. As we see it, it is imperative that Turkey be made to understand that it cannot impose its terms and that it must abandon its attitude.

President Kiprianou added: The Cyprus problem has two aspects: There is the internal aspect, which is connected with the constitutional structure, and there is also the international aspect -- that Cyprus must be absolutely free and demilitarized, and united for the happiness and progress of all its citizens.

On the arrival of President Kiprianou and Mr Brandt at the Zwan Hotel in the small city of [name indistinct] they were welcomed by the mayor and the entire municipal council. The mayor said that the citizens of this country, which has been divided for 35 years, are very sensitive about matters of self-determination and peace. He said: We consider as friends all those who support these principles. With our influence and with our goodwill we try to support those countries which have not yet gained their freedom.

In their replies both President Kiprianou and Mr Brandt thanked him for the friendly welcome and said that whenever they meet they always discuss questions of peace. They signed the city's visitors book. After this, the mayor gave them a commemorative gift with the city's emblem. [end recording]

POLISH LOAN RESCHEDULING AGREEMENT SIGNED

[Text] Frankfurt, 6 Apr (DPA) -- Poland has been given a period of grace to overcome its serious financial problems: The repayment of its debts due to approximately 500 Western banks in 1981 was placed on a new contractual basis today.

In the presence of the Polish deputy finance minister, W. Bien, and the president of the Polish Handlowy Bank, (Warsaw), M. Minkiewicz, as well as representatives of the Western banks, a rescheduling agreement was signed in Frankfurt for loan repayments not guaranteed by the state.

The agreement provides for 95 percent of the $2.4 billion which became due last year to be deferred for 4 years and then repaid in seven equal half-yearly installments. Under the agreement, 5 percent must be paid before the end of this year in three installments. The interest is 1.75 percent points above the London interbanking trade rate.

It remains open how and when Poland will meet its credit commitments for the current year. A communique published by the Dresdner Bank states merely that "The talks on capital maturities in 1982 between Poland and the Western banks should begin as quickly as possible." Frankfurt banking circles estimate the repayments due in 1982 to be nearly $3 billion, in addition to accrued interest of well over half a billion. Poland's overall debts to the West are officially estimated in Warsaw at $25.5 billion. According to Western information, they amount to nearly $27 billion.

SPD LEFTWING CRITICIZES REAGAN DECLARATION

[Text] Saarbruecken, 2 Apr (DPA) -- Leading representatives of the SPD's leftwing reacted on Friday with sharp criticism and violent accusations to U.S. President Ronald Reagan's declaration on the nuclear arms race. In a statement published in Saarbruecken, the SPD politicians Erhard Eppler, Guenter Gaus, Oskar Lafontaine and Klaus Matthiessen emphasized that the U.S. President is throwing all of the principles of the SALT negotiations "overboard" with the announcement of his "arms drive program for disarmament."

Reagan said "We want to disarm; but in order to be able to disarm, we first of all have to arm strongly in order to balance our lagging behind the Soviet Union." This was the motto under which the "mad arms race" of the last decades has been kept going in the world. With his remark that America is "lagging behind" the Soviets, the President is also in contradiction with American expert opinion, with Senators Kennedy, Mondale [as received] and Hatfield, and with many of his own statements. The SPD leftwingers' declaration says that anyone who, in the face of the two superpowers' arsenal of more than 50,000 nuclear weapons, still talks of lagging behind or superiority is "underestimating the effects of these instruments of mass murder in an irresponsible manner."

MINISTER VISITS VIETNAM; RELATIONS IMPROVING

[Jacques de Barrin dispatch: "Resumption of Dialogue Between Paris and Hanoi Is Confirmed"]

[Text] Bangkok -- The resumption of dialogue between Paris and Hanoi is confirmed. Mr Jean Pierre Chevenement, minister of state and of research and technology, visited Vietnam 2 and 3 April. Mr Regis Debray, special adviser to the president of the republic, had preceded him to that country last February. Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach is to be received officially in Paris 8 and 9 April.

The last visit to Vietnam by a member of the French Government -- the visit by Mr Louis de Guiringaud, who was foreign minister at the time -- was made in September 1978. The invasion of Kampuchea by Hanoi's troops in January 1979 had frozen relations between the two countries. As a result of that, the French note, the economic and cultural cooperation agreements concluded in April 1977 during Prime Minister Pham Van Dong's visit to Paris, "have not had much effect."

Today the French insist on the need "not to allow so many common ties to vanish" especially since the Hanoi leaders are showing a desire to "keep open a corridor to France." During his brief visit to Hanoi Mr Chevenement met with Mr Pham Van Dong, Mr Nguyen Co Thach and Gen Vo Nguyen Giap, his Vietnamese counterpart, who has just been eliminated from the Communist Party Politburo but who, according to an official source, will now be able to devote himself more fully to his ministerial job in scientific and technological research.

The Hanoi leaders wanted France's cooperation, especially in the agronomical, food and energy spheres. They have asked for its participation in the construction of small hydroelectric power stations along the Annamese Cordillera. In addition a French National Coal Board mission is to visit Vietnam and experts from the Vietnamese electricity service will be received in France. The joint French-Vietnamese commission will meet in Paris in May to draw up the methods of implementing this cooperation. For his part General Giap has accepted an invitation to visit Paris, probably early next year.

Is this France's return to the Indochinese stage? In any case, the French stress the Vietnamese leaders' desire to see France and India -- France more than India in view of the past -- play a role in the search for peace in Southeast Asia in general and in Kampuchea in particular, even though Vietnam is now hinting to its interlocutors that it has virtually won in Phnom Penh.

CHEYSSON DISCOUNTS PLO INVOLVEMENT IN KILLING

[Text] Paris, 6 Apr (AFP) -- External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson said today that while police continued investigating the assassination of Israeli diplomat Ya'aqov Bar Simantov here last Saturday, the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) must be "presumed innocent" of the crime.

The Israeli Government has stated publicly that it held the PLO responsible for the murder of Mr Bar Simantov, shot down by a young woman at the entrance to his apartment block. (In Beirut, a little known pan-Arab organisation claimed to have carried out the attack.)

Mr Cheysson said over Europe-1 Radio that French Premier Pierre Mauroy had stated that "for the moment there is no proof of PLO involvement." Mr Cheysson added: "Reasonably, I do not see what its interest would be in doing it."

He said that when he saw Israeli Ambassador Me'ir Rosenne on Monday, the question of closing down the PLO bureau in Paris had not been mentioned. About 3,000 people demonstrated outside the PLO office last night, demanding that it be closed down.

Israelis Want Bureau Closed

[Excerpts] Paris, 6 Apr (AFP) -- The Israeli Embassy in Paris today confirmed that it "has requested and does still request" the closure of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) Paris Bureau, following last Saturday's assassination of Israeli diplomat Ya'aqov Bar Simantov here, an official embassy statement said.

Observers note that the confirmation contradicts a statement by French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson who said that when he saw Israeli Ambassador Me'ir Rosenne on Monday, the question of closing down the PLO Paris bureau did not arise.

The Israeli Embassy maintains that during the ambassador's meeting on Monday with Mr Cheysson "no written request" was made concerning the PLO bureau, implying that the question had been discussed.

SOUTH AFRICAN ATTACKS ON ANGOLA CONDEMNED

PM061049 Paris LE MONDE in French 4-5 Apr 82 p 16

[Text] During the first sitting of the spring session in the Senate on Friday, 2 April, Mr Serge Boucheney (PCF, Paris), asked the external relations minister a question on the situation in South Africa and Angola. Mr Claude Cheysson replied in particular: "We cannot hope for a stabilization of the situation in Angola while that country is suffering South African attacks: The last killed 200 people on 17 March. France condemns those attacks and it intends to facilitate the implementation of UN Resolution 435. In an initial phase, general principles and constitutional provisions must be defined: Discussion is going on with the frontline countries, especially Angola, and SWAPO, Namibia's authorized representative, the goal being to bring about a South African withdrawal from Namibia -- a withdrawal which will have to be followed by elections. We think the withdrawal and elections should take place in 1982."

SPADOLINI, PERTINI TALK WITH GREEK PRESIDENT

[Text] Rome, 6 Apr (ANSA) -- International issues close to home were the focus of visiting Greek President Karamanlis' talks with Italian leaders in Rome today, mainly devoted to Mediterranean developments and the European Economic Community policies: Karamanlis had another meeting today with Italian chief-of-state Sandro Pertini, a meeting attended by the two sides foreign ministers and primarily geared to the Cypriot dispute, a Greek-Turkish relations and the Athens regime's bid to secure a special transitional status, with special breaks to help modernize backward farming systems, from the European Ten.

The Greek president went on to discuss East-West relations, the Mediterranean once again and the latest developments in the Middle East with Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini, who pledged to promote moves together with other EEC states to restore peace in Cyprus. The Italian Government leader's stand on East-West relations was that the European Ten should tighten their ranks and coordinate joint economic and political moves with respect to Polish affairs. He took the same tack, extending the realm of Western cooperation to Europe's other allies, while dealing with the Soviet-American talks in Geneva on medium-range nuclear missile installations in Europe.

The two statesmen also swapped views on the dispute between Britain and Argentina over the Falkland Islands, both deploring the use of force as a means of settling international controversies.

Foreign Ministers' Talks

[Excerpt] Rome, 6 Apr (ANSA) -- Greek Foreign Minister Ioannis Kharalambopoulos discussed Athens' claims to a "special transitional status" in the Brussels-based European Community with his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo Monday. The request for breaks that may enable Greece to upgrade the most backward areas of its economy "posed problems," both men realized, but the Italian diplomat nevertheless gave assurances that his government would give "close and understanding attention" to the issue.

PEREZ DE CUELLAR CHAIRS UN AGENCIES MEETING

[Text] Rome, 7 Apr (ANSA) -- United Nations Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar and the directors of a number of specialized agencies of the UN are scheduled to meet today with Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo. On Tuesday, the secretary general chaired a meeting here of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC), the executive heads of the specialized agencies whose organizations are linked to the UN through the Economic and Social council (ECOSOC).

The ACC consultations, held on a rotation system in the various capitals where the agencies are located, cover the issues of joint interest to the specialized bodies and the ACC subsequently prepares a report for ECOSOC.

The UN specialized agencies are the International Labor Organization (ILO), the Food and Agriculture Organization (FA), the United Nations Education, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), the World Bank (International Bank for Reconstruction and Development), the International Telecommunications Union (ITU), the World Meteorological Organization (WMO), the International Finance Corporation, the Internatioal Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO). Sitting in on the ACC as observers are the directors of the UN Children's Fund (UNICEF), of the UN Relief and Workers Agency (UNRWA), of the High Commission for Refugee (UNHOR), the UN Training and Research Committee (INITAR), and the director generals of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and the Development Program (UNDP).

CENSURE MOTION WITHDRAWAL SEEN AS PCP 'DEFEAT'

[Excerpt] The Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] deputies have reiterated "formally their confidence in, support for, and solidarity with" the parliamentary group's leadership over the way in which it acted during the session of the debate on the PCP's motion of censure. This stance was the culmination of a meeting which had its epilogue late yesterday morning, after being suspended at 0400 hours. It thus confirms the distancing of the Centrists, led by Rui Pena, from the prime minister's refusal to be present in parliament to use the right of reply to the Communist censure.

For its part, the Social Democratic Party [PSD] political committee has praised the Social Democratic deputies for their conduct in the debate on the PCP's motion, "in which they ably implemented the strategy previously defined together by the three Democratic Alliance parties." In a communique read out by Fernando do Amaral at the conclusion of the committee's meeting, chaired by Pinto Balsemao, it expresses full support for the stance of the prime minister and of the government and reaffirms commitment "to the implementation of the Democratic Alliance's blueprint by the PSD." "Nothing will come" from the Social Democrats, the communique says, "which would call into question that blueprint, which earned and still earns the support of the majority of the Portuguese people."

In Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa's opinion, the Centrist parliamentary leader's conduct was due to "lack of knowledge of a set of facts which to some extent shaped the Democratic Alliance's overall strategy" for the debate. However, in the interview which he granted to Radio Renascenca, the secretary of state did not regard that "lack of knowledge" as a sign of lack of coordination on the majority's benches. "The complexity of relations between governments and the majorities supporting them and the various political components of the majority forms part of political life -- specifically, parliamentary life -- in any democracy in the world...." However, he acknowledged that it is important to strengthen cohesion within the majority and its knowledge of the facts, and this could happen at the meeting which will take place tomorrow of the Democratic Alliance leaders with national and regional bodies.

In addition, a member of the PSD parliamentary group's leadership, cited by ANOP, regards Wednesday's incidents in the Assembly of the Republic as an internal matter of the CDS; more precisely, as a lack of coordination between the leadership and the Centrist parliamentary group -- specifically, between [minister of agriculture, trade and fisheries] Basilio Horta and Rui Pena. Commenting on this assertion, a Centrist leader emphasized that "it is not for the minister of agriculture and fisheries to ensure communications between the government and parliament." Reviewing what happened before the debate, the same source revealed that the strategy to be adopted in the motion of censure session had been debated with the prime minister at a meeting held 22 March. At this meeting, the CDS was not represented, and so -- he stressed -- it would be for the minister in charge of relations with parliament, Fernando Amaral, to inform the Centrists of what was decided at it. Subsequently the strategy was altered at a meeting of ministers with representatives of the majority's parliamentary groups. "The minister of agriculture, trade and fisheries did not attend that meeting," he concluded.

However, there is complete agreement on condemnation of the walkout decided on by all the opposition groups following the PCP's withdrawal of the text of the motion of censure. The CDS' communique refers to this occurrence, expressing its "utter" condemnation of the opposition parties' "antidemocratic conduct," "nullifying the motion of censure of the Communist Party, which thus registered another significant parliamentary political defeat." This is also the opinion expressed by a leader of the Social Democratic benches, who regards the withdrawal of the motion of censure and the subsequent walkout from the Assembly as a "defeat" for the PCP, from which the Socialist Party "could have reaped dividends if it had remained in the plenum."

CABINET CHANGES REPORTED; OPPOSITION UNHAPPY

[By Chris Moncreiff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Excerpt] The prime minister introduced a virtually unknown peer into her cabinet today in the re-shuffle necessitated by the Falkland Islands crisis resignations. The appointment of Lord Cockfield, as secretary of state for trade, will enrage Labor MP's who feel that the principal minister in such a sensitive department, which includes consumer interests, should be answerable to the House of Commons and not the Lords.

Lord Cockfield, 65, who had been minister of state at the Treasury, is a former chairman of the Prices Commission. Now issues covered by this department will have to be dealt with in the Commons by his juniors, Mr Peter Rees, minister of state, and Dr Gerard Vaughan, minister for consumer affairs. The opposition will not be satisfied with this arrangement and already there are plans in hand to table a Commons motion deploring the prime minister's decision to choose a peer for this job.

The prime minister has decided not to give the Foreign Office a second minister in the cabinet as was the case when Mr Humphrey Atkins, the lord privy seal until yesterday, held office at the F.O. Now the lord privy seal label will be assumed by Baroness Young, leader of the House of Lords. This title will not affect her duties.

One of the MP's promoted direct from the back-benches becomes minister of state at the Foreign Office. He is Mr Cranley Onslow, MP for Woking. Before his appointment he was chairman of the powerful all party select committee on defence, which is to hold an inquiry into the government's conduct of the Falkland Islands affair.

His new job will mean that he must relinquish that chairmanship. Some cynics are suggesting that this rapid promotion may have something to do with his chairmanship of that committee. However, Mr Onslow, 55, is no stranger to ministerial office. During the Edward Heath regime he was an under secretary at the Department of Trade and Industry for two years.

Another back-bencher who joins the government is Mr John Butcher, the 36-year-old MP for Coventry South-west. Mr Butcher becomes under secretary at the Department of Industry. There is promotion, too, for Mr John Wakeham, who was under secretary for industry and who now becomes minister of state at the Treasury.

The changes have involved a near clear-out of middle and junior rank ministers in the Foreign Office, completing a virtual clean sweep of all ministers in that department. Lord Belstead, who was under secretary, Home Office, becomes minister of state at the Foreign Office, and the government's principal spokesman on foreign affairs in the House of Lords. Mr Malcolm Riffkind, under secretary, Scottish Office, now becomes under secretary at the Foreign Office.

Lord Trefgarne, who was under secretary at the Foreign Office, also moves sideways to become under secretary for health. Lord Elton, under secretary for health, now becomes under secretary at the Home Office, and back-bencher Mr John MacKay, MP for Argyll, is the new under secretary at the Scottish Office. Mr Cecil Parkinson, paymaster general and chairman of the Conservative Party, also becomes chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. This will not affect the duties of Mr Parkinson, who does not draw a ministerial salary. Today's changes reduce the number in the cabinet from 23 to 22.

GOVERNMENT WON'T NEGOTIATE BEFORE WITHDRAWAL

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Text] The government is standing firmly by the United Nations Security Council resolution demanding an immediate Argentinian withdrawal from the Falkland Islands. It means that Britain will almost certainly not engage in any direct talks with the Argentinians until and unless that resolution is complied with.

This emerged in Whitehall today after Mrs Thatcher met cabinet colleagues to discuss the invasion. Earlier, Argentina was reported to be confident that an "honorable and just peace" could be reached through negotiation.

Visitors to Downing Street for today's informed talks with the prime minister included Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym and Defence Secretary Mr John Nott, who will both speak for the government in this afternoon's Commons debate on the crisis.

Both ministers will seek to justify the government's handling of the affair, but the opposition will continue to demand Mrs Thatcher's resignation for what they believe to be incompetent and inept conduct. They are convinced that the government was aware of Argentina's invasion plan days before it took place, yet did nothing about it.

DAILY TELEGRAPH VIEWS CARRINGTON RESIGNATION

[Editorial: "Lord Carrington"]

[Excerpts] The fact that all three ministers connected with the Falkland problem have resigned confirms that the mistakes made did not result from the misjudgement of one man, but from a concerted and considered policy based on that view of the world which has long been praised or execrated as "the Foreign Office view." This approach depends on the belief that there is no political problem which tactful diplomacy cannot solve, no possibility that cannot be discussed, and therefore no principle that cannot be swept away by circumstance.

But a fact of life, and therefore a fact of politics, is that there is a whole class of problems which are not negotiable. For the land and the nation in which they live and the culture of which they are a part, people feel a loyalty and love which is not dispelled by "reasonable" considerations of self-interest. Where such feelings exist, the attempts of diplomacy to ignore them are not merely inappropriate, but offensive. Not only did British diplomacy discount the feelings of the Falkland Islanders and so fail to resist their adversaries: It made the more serious mistake of discounting the feelings of the British people and their parliamentary representatives. For all this the Foreign Office is now paying.

The resignations should help to clear the air. Mr Pym and his new deputies will more readily get the support of the House of Commons than their predecessors. In particular, the opposition, mutinous at the idea of backing the government as previously composed, will find it more difficult to avoid giving any aid during the present emergency. But no one should jump for joy that the prime minister has lost her foreign secretary. It is a great office of state filled by a remarkable man. His resignation, though needed, makes the government look weaker and confirms the extent of its failure. For the prime minister cannot say, by way of excuse, that she left her ministers to their own devices. She is ultimately responsible: Lord Carrington took his orders from her, or if he did not, she should have made him. If the Falkland Islands are to be recovered, the government needs to go quietly to work, supported by national confidence. May it merit that confidence.

DENKTAS LEAVES FOR MEETING WITH PEREZ DE CUELLAR

In a statement before his departure, Denktas said he would exchange views with Perez de Cuellar, and added: The main purpose of my visit to Geneva is to inform the new secretary general of the point we have reached in the intercommunal talks and of the difficulties we have been encountering, and also to exchange views on these issues. From one point of view the solution of the Cyprus problem is very easy and from another point of view it is very difficult. If the realities are acknowledged, it is very easy. Denktas said the solution was very easy if the realities of the problem were acknowledged and if the principles of the agreement reached with the late Makarios were abided by. He noted, however, that if the problem were mishandled -- as the Greek Cypriots were doing -- and if it is viewed as a problem created by Turkey's invasion, the solution would be very difficult, and even impossible.

Denktas concluded by saying: We will explain to Mr Perez de Cuellar that we are ready to do everything necessary, with good will, for solution of the Cyprus problem within the framework of the realities, but that we will never compromise our rights, authority, status or security to solve problems created by an unrealistic approach. This is a necessary meeting and we hope it will yield positive results.

President Denktas is being accompanied by Foreign Affairs and Defense Minister Kenan Atakol, the Turkish Cypriot negotiator at the intercommunal talks, Umit Onan, constitutional adviser Prof Turhan Feyzioglu, adviser Necati Munir Ertekun and presidential under secretary Taner Etkin.

AKEL SAYS POSITION ON CYPRUS SOLUTION UNCHANGED

[Text] AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou stressed that the party's firm and unchanging line on a solution to the Cyprus issue remains based on a truly independent, sovereign, territorially integral, federal, nonaligned and demilitarized Cyprus, without foreign bases and foreign troops, in which Greek and Turkish Cypriots will live in brotherhood. In a statement on the 15th AKEL party congress to be held 13-16 May, Papaioannou said the congress will discuss and decide on the promotion of the Cyprus issue on the basis of the UN resolutions and the summit agreements.

He said: The Cyprus issue, a basic problem of invasion and occupation, presents two basic aspects -- the domestic and the foreign. The domestic aspect must be solved through intercommunal talks under the auspices of the UN secretary general. After all margins for progress and agreement within the intercommunal talks have been exhausted, and after it has been proved that intransigence continues, then there must again be an appeal to the United Nations for the purpose of adopting measures to achieve success in the intercommunal talks and the convocation of an international conference for a solution of the foreign aspect of the problem. The convocation of such a conference, he added, would also assist in solution of the domestic aspect of the issue.

In reference to the coming presidential elections, Papaioannou said the main goal of AKEL will be the election of a democratic president who will implement the program to be agreed on. He added that AKEL is in contact with all the political parties, with the exception of the Democratic Rally, on cooperation in the election on the basis of a minimum program. He also described the decision of the Holy Synod to reinstate Bishop Yennadhios as a scandal and an insult.

On Party Cooperation

NC070841 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 7 Apr 82 pp 1, 7

[Excerpts] Yesterday the AKEL secretary general expressed the conviction that soon cooperation among democratic parties for the coming presidential elections will be announced. Speaking at a press conference at the party office on the occasion of the impending AKEL 15th congress, E. Papaioannou stressed that the party's main aim is election of a democratic president on the basis of a common program which will also include provisions for its implementation. After reading an introductory statement (published in another column) the AKEL secretary general made the following replies to journalists' questions:

Question: You spoke about the election of a democratic president. Do you consider Kiprianou a democratic president capable of implementing your goals?

Answer: When we speak about a democratic president we mean a democratic president. We never said Kiprianou is not democratic. It is true we have criticized him, very sternly in fact, but even then we said we would judge him by his deeds. However, we never said he is antidemocratic. Of course, if you want a statement as to what AKEL will support, I can tell you that consultations have yet to be completed. They are continuing, and as soon as they are completed we shall be in a position, as cooperating parties, to issue a statement.

Question: With whom are the consultations taking place?

Answer: They are taking place with the democratic parties and began some time ago.

Question: In case you support Kiprianou as a candidate, can you tell us the reasons for this?

Answer: The reasons will appear from the program, if and when it is agreed on. However, it will be on the basis of a specific minimum program and measures for its implementation, because it is indispensable that measures for implementation in practice accompany the program.

Question: With which democratic parties are consultations taking place?

Answer: Except for the Democratic Rally, which shelters and politicizes the coupists, as we have said so many times -- and this is the reason we cannot accept it as a democratic party -- we have had and continue to have contacts with the other parties on this cooperation.

Question: Will AKEL ask the president for certain ministries?

Answer: What interests AKEL primarily is the program and its implementation. AKEL will insist on the necessary guarantees. An AKEL demand for certain ministries, as some newspapers have reported, will not arise.

Question: We want the election battle to be waged within a civilized framework and without tension. We shall do everything in our power for such conditions prevail. We should not forget that we are waging a struggle to rid our country of the Turkish occupation, for independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity, as well as to rid our country of foreign bases and spy stations. Consequently, this should always be uppermost in our thoughts. We shall be completely independent, and then all parties will go to the people with their own program, the social program if you wish, and ask for the people's support to implement it.

Parties Deny Consultations

NC070845 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 7 Apr 82 pp 1, 8

[Excerpts] EDEK, Center Union and the New Democratic Front have denied yesterday's statement by AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou that his party is holding consultations with "all the democratic parties except the Democratic Rally" on the question of the presidential elections. EDEK Secretary General Khatzidhimitriou, Center Union Chairman Papadhopoulos and New Democratic Front Chairman Mikhailidhis have made statements to O AGON stressing emphatically that they are not having any consultations whatsoever with AKEL on the presidential elections.

Following these denials by the three parties, it is obvious that at the moment, AKEL is holding consultations on the presidential elections only with the Democratic Party and with no other party.

GREEK CYPRIOT TERROR GROUP FORMED IN W. EUROPE

NC060840 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 2 Apr 82 pp 1, 14

[Savas Ay report]

[Excerpt] London -- It has been learned that Greek Cypriots living in various countries in Europe have formed a terrorist organization known as the "Cyprus Liberation Organization" which will go into action when appropriate conditions are ready. It is further reported that members of this organization are currently undergoing training.

TFSC representative in London Faik Muftuzade, who is frequently threatened by this terrorist organization, which has been set up with funds amounting to $400 million, stated: "If they go into action, they will encounter a formidable Turkish community and they will be utterly disappointed in the end."

According to information obtained from reliable sources in London by an AKAJANS correspondent, Greek Cypriots have secured $400 million from businessmen in the Greek Cypriot sector of Cyprus and in Greece for establishment of this terrorist organization. Some countries are also reported to have contributed to this fund. According to British intelligence, $12 million have been allocated to militant action in London.

The "Cyprus Liberation Organization" plans to go into action as soon as the intercommunal talks are discontinued or in the event the atmosphere turns in favor of Turkey. Turkish missions have been warned about the likely militancy of the Greek Cypriots.

PARLIAMENT DEBATES BUDGET, EXPORT OF WAR MATERIAL

[Excerpt] There will be important trade agreements with Arab countries for the export of Greek products and experts' services. Specifically these will include the export of war material from the rapidly developing military industry as well as construction projects in Arab countries -- construction of military installations, bases and airfields. This was stressed in the Chamber of Deputies yesterday by PASOK's main speaker for the majority, V. Kedhikoglou, at the opening of the debate on the budget.

Pointing out that "1982 will be a difficult year for our economic relations with the other countries" of the West because of the policy to reduce deficits through indirect reduction in imports, Kedhikoglou stressed: "Following the government's initiatives, some favorable prospects are opening up with regard to the Arab countries. Prospects for the export of other products and services are opening up -- products from our rapidly developing military industry as well as expertise connected with military construction projects, bases, airfields -- the construction of projects in which we have special experience."

Earlier Kedhikoglou, after making a general analysis of the budget, and referring in particular to the economic chaos left behind by New Democracy, said that the government had to prepare an "interim budget of sacrifices and not one of prosperity" because otherwise there would be a rapid increase in inflation, in the deficit and in unemployment.

New Democracy showed a united stand -- to vote against all expenditures with the exception of expenditure for national defense, which it accepted -- but three different views were expressed by its speakers, S. Dhimas, A. Samaras and K. Yiatrakos. The KKE will vote against all expenditures, including that for defense. Main KKE speaker N. Ambatielos stated that the KKE will vote against the budget, after pointing out the positive points -- the readjustment of salaries and wages according to the cost of living index -- and after recognizing the difficulties the government must face because of New Democracy's policy of "unilateral frugality."

KKE ATTACKS ZABLOCKI ON NATO STATUS REPORT

NC061414 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 6 Apr 82 p 2

[From the "Radical" column: "Open Interference"]

[Text] The report to Congress by Mr Zablocki, of the U.S. House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee, constitutes another link in the long chain of pressure and blackmail being exerted on the Greek Government. In a rough and provocative manner, the U.S. official made threats against our country in the event the government decides we should withdraw from the military wing of NATO. On the basis, as he put it, of experience from a visit he paid to Greece last November, this...excellent gentleman attempted open interference in our country's internal affairs by also mentioning, in addition to everything else, the "attachment of the Greek officers to NATO." At another point in his report, Mr Zablocki attributed to appraisals by observers the intention of Prime Minister Papandreou to use the threat of withdrawal from NATO to gain something in return. The purpose of Mr Zabocki's threats is also obvious.

Besides, these threats are repeated to the utmost by the reactionary U.S. press. It is also a positive fact that this is also the view of the government, which has rejected the contents of this provocative report. The most correct and resolute answer to the imperialists, however, would have been the courageous promotion of an independent foreign policy aiming at disassociation from NATO, which would deprive the imperialists of both the right and possibility for threats, pressures and blackmail.

BRUSSELS IMPOSES BAN ON ARMS EXPORTS TO ARGENTINA

[Text] Brussels, 7 Apr (AFP) -- Belgium today imposed a temporary ban on exports of weapons and military equipment to Argentina.

The measure is applicable until the Argentinian armed forces quit the Falkland Islands prior to negotiations for a settlement, as laid down by the UN Security Council, the cabinet decided.

Belgium has also recalled its ambassador from Argentina, and is summoning the Argentinian ambassador in Brussels to hear the Belgian Government's position on the Falklands crisis.

A government statement said the Argentinian armed intervention was against international law and the United Nations Charter, and "Belgium has always been opposed to acts of force and faits accomplis wherever they occur."

Along with its partners in the European Economic Community, Belgium envisaged appropriate trade, economic and financial measures against Argentina.

GOVERNMENT TO AID EL SALVADOR FDR GUERRILLAS

[Text] The Hague, 26 Mar -- The government will give humanitarian aid to the Salvadoran FDR [Revolutionary Democratic Front] opposition movement and thereby upgrade its assessment of the movement's political role.

Foreign Minister van der Stoel has discussed this with Cooperation and Development Minister van Dijk, and the cabinet is expected to give its approval to the proposal at its meeting today.

The aid will not go through neutral channels but through organizations connected with the FDR. This is intended to give somewhat more weight to the Netherlands' political recognition of the FDR as "one of the representative political forces in El Salvador." Minister van der Stoel announced this recognition in September 1981, but so far the announcement had not been followed by any concrete measures.

Both the Christian Democratic Appeal and the Labor Party asked for initiatives for giving aid to El Salvador during talks with Minister van der Stoel at a meeting of the Second Chamber permanent foreign affairs committee on Wednesday. Reference was made to the already existing humanitarian and pastoral aid projects of Benito Tobar, former adviser to Bishop Romero, helping refugees in areas controlled by the FDR. The minister described aid as "an extremely important matter" and assured the chamber that the government was prepared to increase aid. The exact sum involved is not yet known.

GOVERNMENT REAFFIRMS ARGENTINE ARMS EMBARGO

[Text] Bonn, 7 Apr (DPA) -- As a sign of solidarity with Great Britain in the British-Argentine conflict surrounding the Falkland Islands, the Federal Government today decided on an immediate halt to arms exports of all kinds to Argentina. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker told the press that henceforth no approval will be given, as required by the foreign trade law, for the export of war weapons, ammunition or other arms equipment to Argentina.

Immediately after this decision, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt informed British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. Schmidt had interrupted his Easter holiday for the cabinet session because of the "uncertainty" of the future development of the conflict. According to Becker, Mrs Thatcher was "very pleased" and described the decision as an important expression of the close relations between Bonn and London and of European solidarity.

In its statement, the Federal Government once again condemned the Argentine invasion, which it said represents a "flagrant violation" of international commitments to the peaceful settlement of international disputes and nonuse of force in interstate relations. The cabinet endorsed in this respect the demands made by the EEC foreign ministers and the UN Security Council for a withdrawal of the Argentine troops and a diplomatic settlement of the conflict.

At the same time, Becker made it clear, however, that Bonn is very interested in maintaining its good relations with Argentina. The Federal Government's decision, he stressed, does not place relations with Buenos Aires "at zero point for all time."

GENSCHER URGES BREZHNEV-REAGAN MEETING IN JUNE

LD081004 Hamburg DPA in German 0932 GMT 8 Apr 82

[Text] Cologne, 8 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher (FDP) hopes for a meeting between the Soviet head of state and party, Leonid Brezhnev, and U.S. President Ronald Reagan. In an interview with Deutsche Welle, Genscher appealed to Brezhnev on Thursday not to refuse the chance of a personal meeting. It was to be hoped that Brezhnev's health would allow the acceptance of the American invitation at the time of the UN special General Assembly in June in New York, he said. At present there is no background more suited to such an urgently necessary meeting of two politicians, Genscher said. The Soviet Union has not yet reacted to Reagan's proposal.

BRANDT COMMENTS ON SPD, COALITION PROBLEMS

DW080725 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 5 Apr 82 pp 24-32

[Interview by editors Erich Boehme and Klaus Wirtgen with SPD chairman Willy Brandt in the Bonn SPD headquarters; date not given]

[Excerpts] SPIEGEL: Mr Brandt, after the SPD catastrophe in Lower Saxony you have demanded to "move forward." Could you tell us what "forward" means for the shrunken SPD electorate, maybe the opposition?

Brandt: I don't intend calling a defeat something else than a defeat. Yet it is strange that 1.5 percent can make the difference between a small success and a great defeat. Had the SPD scored 1.5 percent more than it did in the communal elections and had the CDU scored a bit less than 50 percent, you would have said...

SPIEGEL: ...A smaller catastrophe.

Brandt: ...Well, you would have said that some small progress has been achieved. But the shrunken electorate you just mentioned will nevertheless not become a sect within a foreseeable future.

SPIEGEL: The party congress must clarify the contradicting comment on the election results. Schmidt has said that "the torn picture of our party" was the reason for the poor result. You, however, have said that the "sad appearance of the coalition" was the reason. Shouldn't the party agree in its congress on the true reason?

Brandt: I do not want to dodge the issue, but I really think that this is one of the many cases where there is more than one reason. There is no question at all that the coalition as well as the SPD have made a better appearance before. That was due mainly to politics, and not so much to individual undisciplined action -- but that happened also.

SPIEGEL: Who is guilty, the party or the government?

Brandt: These two points are not involved, but the appearance of the coalition is. We must make greater efforts to tell the public and the voters what we plan to do. Just remember -- and this brings me back to the miserable appearance of the coalition -- the back and forth in the summer and fall, and the really deplorable, not just painful, process which caused the bringing about of a common initiative with regard to an employment package plan in early February. That is not the fault of the coalition, I know that, but the effect of the clumsiness of our federal system where people always claim to hear something without knowing when a final decision will be made.

SPIEGEL: Why do the responsible party people not beat their own breast in such situations but always that of others? You speak of the sad impression of the coalition, meaning the chancellor. Your deputy, Helmut Schmidt, speaks of the torn picture of the party, meaning you.

Brandt: Are you so certain about that? I must speak on my own now without involving others. If I speak of the impression of the coalition I also mean that the FDP has considerably strained the nerves of the Social Democrats because the Social Democrats had created the impression in the country that they are the sumpter mules of the coalition.

SPIEGEL: Did the Social Democrats take too much from the coalition partner in past months?

Brandt: It is not so much a matter of taking much but of pointing out our position, particularly with regard to workers and employees. Considerable shortcomings exist in this respect.

SPIEGEL: Must the SPD remain open and attractive for the environmentalists?

Brandt: That is your special formulation. For me it is not a matter of running after new lists or new groups. Many of them do not want that, showing us their bare ass.

SPIEGEL: Do you think that the environmentalists and alternative groups will exist as parties for a longer period of time?

Brandt: I don't think so, but I do not rule it out that something like that will exist in party life for some 5 years. That is a long time nowadays.

SPIEGEL: As regards the key words "perspectives" and "security policy": What can the chancellor expect from the party congress in this field?

Brandt: I assume that the security policy motion of the party executive board will be adopted in Munich. There will be amendments and motions demanding occasional changes and there will be considerable arguments in this respect. But no motion will be adopted aiming at an annullment of NATO's dual decision. That problem is superseded.

SPIEGEL: Will there be a majority for a "moratorium?"

Brandt: There will be arguments and demands with regard to various forms of what is considered a "moratorium" at present...

SPIEGEL: ...Majorities too?

Brandt: ...I do not think so.

SPIEGEL: There will be strong minorities against the party congress decisions.

Brandt: We shall see. A frank discussion must not complicate Schmidt's business. Not every critical comment means weakening our position, it can also be helpful with regard to difficult outside partners.

SPIEGEL: The discussion in the United States about regional SPD congress decisions has created many difficulties for the Federal Government.

Brandt: Well, I cannot take it too seriously if some people in Washington become excited about regional party congresses. Why is it not being discussed that some U.S. administration people were holding party policy speeches in Munich against the Federal Government?

SPIEGEL: Do you mean U.S. Under Secretary of Defense Fred Ikle of the Pentagon speaking at a CSU congress?

Brandt: I don't care about names. But Social Democrats could go to America polemicizing at local party or peace movement meetings. I don't plan to do that, by the way.

SPIEGEL: Do you deem it possible that the new American peace movement could change the American approach on significant points by the end of 1983?

Brandt: It would be more important to ponder whether we could avoid a catastrophe. But let me get back to your question: The current administration states these days that it wants to take up START negotiations on intercontinental weapons this summer. That is important.

SPIEGEL: Can you see a Social Democratic chancellor agreeing in late 1983 or 1984 to the deployment of missiles in the Federal Republic of the peace movement here and maybe also in America has created a very unstable basic mood in the populace against counterarmament?

Brandt: NATO's dual decision, regardless what you may think, is not up to the German Social Democrats. It is a decision of the alliance with participation of the German Government. The SPD can and will give its advice in due time as it has done before. I will not say anthing today, here, on other occasions, or at the Munich congress that could create the impression of weakening the Western negotiating position. I may not do anything -- and I think the SPD may not either — which could create the impression that one wants to weaken the Western negotiating position.

SPIEGEL: Could you imagine being the chairman of an SPD which decides in the light of certain negotiation results to deploy missiles in Germany?

Brandt: No automatism exists in this respect. Nobody has our agreement yet with regard to deployment. Our policy is aimed at avoiding the deployment of these American weapons in our country and at making the Russians reduce their arms sufficiently.

SPIEGEL: The FDP has threatened in Bonn to take a very close look at the Munich SPD decisions.

Brandt: So what? The FDP colleagues know that we have several ideas going farther than they think fit.

SPIEGEL: But is the FDP possibly threatening to quit the coalition?

Brandt: You must not become nervous. If the most esteemed colleague Moellemann of the German Bundestag, who is now deputy land chairman in North-Rhine Westphalia, demands that an end be made eventually to the quarrel with the SPD, it would just make me smile -- if the situation were not that shitty.

SPIEGEL: Do you consider new elections an alternative?

Brandt: No. We would be deserters if we were to run away from the mission the voters gave us in the fall of 1980.

MINISTER OF YOUTH, FAMILY AND HEALTH RESIGNS

[Text] Bonn, 7 Apr (DPA) -- Antje Huber, minister of youth, family and health, handed in her resignation to Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today. The reasons for this step lie apparently in the continuing speculation about a cabinet reshuffle, in which the minister's name was repeatedly mentioned. Huber had been minister for youth, family and health since 1976.

DEFENSE MINISTRY DENIES EXILED ZAIRIAN'S CLAIMS

[Text] Bonn, 7 Apr (DPA) -- The president of the Zaire Liberation Movement (CLC), Bernhardin Mungul-Diaka, called on the Federal Government to end all support for the General Mobutu regime in Kinshasha. Speaking at a press conference in Bonn today, Mungul-Diaka said that the international public should no longer close its eyes to the "flagrant violations of human rights" in Zaire. Mobutu is reigning with terror and violence. Bloody suppression and murder are used against imagined and real political opponents. Zaire's economy is being ruined while the head of state has acquired a private fortune -- estimated at DM15 billion -- through "systematically exploiting" the country.

Mungul-Diaka, who formerly held various ministerial offices in Zaire and who now lives in exile in Belgium, called on the Federal Government to grant support to students expelled from Zaire instead of aiding Mobutu. Bonn granted Kinshasha credits and subsidies last year amounting to DM65 million, intended mainly to benefit agriculture. The next talks on development aid are scheduled for this autumn.

Allegations by Mungul-Diaka that the Federal Government recently promised Mobutu aid in the form of military equipment worth DM80 million are described as false by the Federal Defense Ministry. Zaire last received a "small sum" in 1980 as a contribution to setting up a military hospital and for the acquisition of field kitchens.

ARMS, AMMUNITION SALES TO ARGENTINA EMBARGOED

[Text] Paris, 7 Apr (AFP) -- The French Government has decided to embargo all arms sales, ammunition sales and deliveries to Argentina, President Francois Mitterrand's chief aide said today. Speaking after today's cabinet meeting, presidential advisor Pierre Beregovoy said the decision had been reached "immediately after the invasion" last Friday of the Falkland Islands by Argentine forces. He said the embargo covered planes, anti-aircraft missiles, arms, spare parts and ammunition.

The decision followed a report today in the CANARD ENCHAINE, a satirical weekly newspaper, that 1,000 French armored vehicles would be made under licence in Argentina beginning in 1984. Official sources today confirmed the report, but said the deal involving the light armored vehicles had been reached by the administration of Valery Giscard d'Estaing, Mr Mitterrand's predecessor. That deal, the CANARD ENCHAINE said, would be worth about $330 million for France.

ROLE IN SINAI PEACE FORCE FORMALLY APPROVED

[Text] Paris, 7 Apr (AFP) -- The French Government today gave its formal approval to participation in the Sinai multi-national force due to be set up on Israel's evacuation of the area, scheduled for April 25. It will have one Transall transport plane and two Twin Otter light aircraft.

A total of 11 countries are contributing to the 2,500-man force -- the United States, Uruguay, Colombia, Fiji, New Zealand, Australia, Norway, France, Britain, Italy and the Netherlands. The French Government gave its approval at today's weekly cabinet meeting.

PS WILL NOT INVITE PLO LEADER 'ARAFAT FOR VISIT

[Text] Mr Huntzinger, PS deputy national secretary for international affairs, recognized that the PLO is "undoubtedly politically representative" on Wednesday 31 March. However, during a press conference, he stated that a visit to France by PLO Chairman 'Arafat was "neither envisaged by nor possible to envisage" for the PS. He stated that the PS "plans to support all initiatives aimed at establishing the conditions for direct dialogue between Israelis and Palestinians" and that it was going to undertake to inform and explain to its members in order to explain its position following Mr Mitterrand's visit to Israel. "There is a Palestinian people who have the right to self-determination. Provided there is mutual prior recognition between the Israelis and Palestinians, that process should be implemented and should lead to the establishment of a Palestinian state which cannot be Jordan," he said.

Commenting on the repression on the West Bank, Mr Huntzinger said that he thought it "impossible to view Israel through Mr Begin's behavior." "In Israel, there is a society disturbed by certain clearly reprehensible actions for which the present Israeli Government is responsible," he said. He stated that he would visit Algiers in May and then Israel in June to meet with the Labor Party and the United Workers' Party (Zionist Socialists).

SPADOLINI HOLDS TALKS WITH UN SECRETARY GENERAL

[Text] Rome, 7 Apr (ANSA) -- The secretary general of the United Nations, Javier Perez de Cuellar, at the end of a six-day visit to Rome, met today with Premier Giovanni Spadolini, Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani for what were described as wide-ranging discussions on a series of international issues with special emphasis on the Anglo-Argentine crisis over the Falkland Islands and the situation in the Middle East.

The Italian premier, in his consultation with the secretary general, voiced hopes for a peaceful settlement of the controversy over the South Atlantic islands "following the appeal of the United Nations Security Council" for a withdrawal of the Argentine military from the British crown colony.

Addressing himself to the situation in El Salvador, Spadolini confirmed Italy's commitment to a negotiated solution to bring an end to the strife in the Central American republic.

Perez de Cuellar and the Italian head of government also discussed the situation in the Mediterranean, the North-South dialogue, Italian participation in the activities of the UN specialized agencies and the UN peacekeeping forces in Lebanon (UNIFIL).

Spadolini declared that he intended to deliver a speech to the upcoming UN General Assembly on disarmament, on the calendar for June.

POPE RECEIVES GREEK PRESIDENT KARAMANLIS

[Text] Vatican City, 7 Apr (ANSA) -- Greek President Konstandinos Karamanlis, on state visit to Italy, met today in the Vatican with Pope John Paul II for an hour-and-a-half talk centered on the past and present role of Greece in the international community.

Karamanlis, in his response to the statement delivered by the pontiff, said that even without military divisions, the Vatican "is no less strong and effective in international relations than those who are considered big powers.

"Its strength is invincible because it is a spiritual strength," the Greek head of state said and added, "and you wield this strength with courage, firmness and wisdom."

After referring to the "considerable role" played by the Church of Rome in the present crisis of values, the president said that, "This knowledge caused me to take the step of opening diplomatic relations between my country and the Holy See two years ago."

He also said that he attaches "special importance" to the dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Roman Catholic Church. Most of Greece's nine million citizens are members of the Greek Orthodox faith, another one hundred thousand are Muslim and there are some 35 million [as received] Roman Catholics in the country.

After his meeting with the pontiff, Karamanlis conferred in private with the cardinal secretary of state Msgr Agostino Casaroli, and was presented to the diplomatic corps accredited to the Holy See.

PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO VISIT USSR IN FALL

[Text] Eduskunta [parliament] Speaker Johannes Virolainen has received his first official invitation to the Soviet Union only 2 months after President Mauno Koivisto took office. Virolainen received the Supreme Soviet's invitation yesterday from Soviet Ambassador V.M. Sobolev.

Virolainen's visit will take place some time in September or October of this year. During the visit Violainen will lead an Eduskunta delegation comprised of about 10 Eduskunta members. In Eduskunta circles the visit, which comes unexpectedly soon after Koivisto took office, is also partly seen as a gesture to the Center Party and its role in foreign policy.

The final communqiue from President Koivisto's "working visit" to the Soviet Union at the beginning of March said that "the two sides express their mutual striving to continue to maintain contacts at government and parliamentary level and also between their Foreign Ministries and other official institutions."

The last time a Finnish Eduskunta delegation visited the Soviet Union was in November 1973. The delegation was led by then Eduskunta speaker V.J. Sukselainen. A Soviet parliamentary delegation visited Finland in 1976.

BELSTEAD ADDRESSES LORDS ON FALKLANDS ISSUE

LD071410 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1304 GMT 7 Apr 82

[Excerpt] The government was mistaken about the signs of Argentine moves against the Falkland Islands, the newly appointed Foreign Office minister of state, Lord Belstead, told the Lords today. "The evidence available to us shows that the Argentine regime took the decision to invade no earlier than March 28 and possibly as late as the 31st," he said.

"Evidence before that time was to some extent contradictory and in our assessment pointed the other way. It is true, in the event, we were mistaken but so were other countries."

Lord Belstead was replying to opposition leader in the Lords, Lord Peart, who had asked for a statement because the peers were due to break for the Easter recess later today. Lord Peart asked if there was any chance of armed conflict while Parliament was in recess, and if so, would the House be recalled?

Lord Belstead replied that it was well-known how long the task force would take to get there. "I think conclusions can be drawn as to the likelihood and possibility of a confrontation before the House meets again," he added.

Lord Peart had also asked for an assurance that there would be no solution without the Falklands being free. The minister replied that the combination of diplomatic, economic and military pressures was being brought to bear, working in the general context of the UN Security Council resolution.

In his statement Lord Belstead said: "The government is energetically pursuing its efforts to return the Falkland Islands to British administration as soon as possible. We are bringing a combination of diplomatic, economic and military pressures to bear. Our naval task force gives us the strength from which to urge a settlement."

After the mandatory United Nations Security Council resolution condemning the invasion, Britain had informed a large number of friendly countries of the measures it had taken, including the freezing of Argentine assets, banning of imports and export of arms.

Britain had urged other countries to take parallel action to bring pressure on Argentina. "Argentina must be in no doubt about our determination to put an end to the occupation of the Falkland Islands," Lord Belstead said.

Lord Belstead said Britain hoped other countries would back Britain's economic measures.

It would be announced in the Commons today that the Argentine consulates in Liverpool and Hong Kong would be closed.

Answering a question about the safety of British civilians left on South Georgia, including two women scientists, Lord Belstead said 28 people were involved. Britain has asked the Swiss Embassy in Buenos Aires and the international committee of the Red Cross to inform Argentina of the need to ensure their safety. The government was still awaiting a response.

[Speech by UK Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary Francis Pym during the House of Commons debate on the Falkland Islands -- live]

[Text] Mr Speaker: I come to the House to open this debate less than 2 days after becoming foreign and commonwealth secretary. I'm deeply conscious of the heavy responsibilities that have been placed upon me and I shall discharge them to the very best of my abilities. My predecessor lifted high the reputation of Britain and British foreign policy. He made full use of his great skills and gifts and his special flair. He registered some important achievements. He was a very fine foreign secretary, and the nation owes him its gratitude. [loud applause and cheers] He had under him a very fine diplomatic service, which has served us and continues to serve us well, and I look forward to working with it.

Mr. Speaker, the circumstances of my predecessor's departure were most unfortunate, and I come to my new post at a critical time in the history of the Falkland Islands. I shall bring to this task all the determination I can command and I approach it in a spirit of realism and, I hope, of calm; determination, because we intend to show Argentina and the whole world that Britain is resolved to succeed in this crisis; [cries of "Hear, hear"] realism, because I shall proceed in full recognition of the major difficulties that lie ahead; and calm, because we must give the most careful consideration to the practical options open to us and reach the right decisions as we advance toward our objectives. The House knows what these objectives are. They were stated by my right honorable friend, the prime minister, on Saturday. We intend to see that the Falkland Islands are freed from occupation and returned to British administration at the earliest possible moment. [cries of "Hear, hear" and shouts from back benches] To do this we must look forward in confidence and not backwards in anger.

The whole House and the country is struck by the appalling nature of the aggressive action the Argentine regime has committed. As recently as the end of February -- as the House is aware -- we had held talks with Argentina about the Falkland Islands. The Argentine Government was fully aware of Britain's position; that is to say, total firmness of the right of the islanders to determine their own future, but subject to that, willingness -- indeed desire -- to deal with the Falkland Islands problem by means of fair negotiations.

Why did Argentina's ruler suddenly decide in the last days of March to resort to arbitrary and brutal aggression? I suggest that part of the answer lies in the very brutality and unpopularity of the Argentine regime itself. Inflation in Argentina is raging at the rate of 140 percent a year. The regime is notorious for its systematic contempt of all human rights. Since 1976 there have been thousands of arrests and killings, often described in a tragic and disgraceful euphemism as disappearances. Only a few days before the invasion of the Falkland Islands there had been riots in Buenos Aires and many people had been arrested. So, harassed by political unrest at home and beset by mounting economic difficulties, the regime turned desperately to a cynical attempt to arouse jingoism amongst its people. The Falkland Islanders have thus become the victims of the unprincipled opportunism of a morally bankrupt regime. Our purpose is to restore their rights.

Since the debate on Saturday, Mr Speaker, there have been a number of developments, and I should bring the House up to date. The governor of the Falkland Islands and the marines from Port Stanley have been evacuated to this country. I'm sure that the whole House will wish to join me in paying tribute to them. The governor, Mr Hunt, conducted himself with courage and dignity amid the danger and confusion; he proved himself worthy of the trust which the British Government had placed in him and of the manifest respect which he had inspired among the islanders.

The Royal Marines proved equally and characteristically valiant and trustworthy. They did all that could possibly have been expected of them. They gave the invaders a sharp taste of what even a very small detachment from the British armed services can do when attacked by overwhelming force. On Saturday, the Argentines occupied South Georgia. The small detachment of Royal Marines on that island put up a gallant and spirited resistance, but of course they could not stand up against overwhelming strength.

The Argentines have also been consolidating their presence in the Falkland Islands themselves. We believe they may now have a sizable occupation force. While we have no reports of direct maltreatment of the islanders, it is quite obvious that the occupation force has no intention of treating them other than as a conquered population. Tight restrictions have been placed on their activities. It is essential at the very least that the Argentine authorities respect their international obligations to the civilian population.

Mr Speaker, the House is aware that we have dispatched a large task force towards the South Atlantic. We are confident that it will be fully adequate for any action that may be required in exercise of our undoubted right of self-defense under the United Nations Charter. While no formal state of war exists between this country and Argentina, we are fully entitled to take whatever measures may be necessary in the exercise of this right. This task force is an essential part of the means for attaining our objectives. It gives the strength from which to urge a settlement, and in the end it may only be strength that the regime in Argentina will understand. There will be time before the task force reaches the area to do everything possible to solve the problem without further fighting. We would much prefer a peaceful settlement. We will do all we can to that end. The House and the country should be in no doubt about that. But if our efforts fail, the Argentine regime will know what to expect. Britain does not appease dictators. [loud cries of "Hear, hear"]

This is a tense and difficult period. We are using the interval immediately ahead for maximum diplomatic activity. The need is for all the world to bring pressure on Argentina to withdraw her forces from the islands. Britain herself has already taken various measures: We have broken diplomatic relations with Argentina. The British ambassador in Buenos Aires and most of his staff have been withdrawn. We have informed Argentina that their consulates in Liverpool and Hong Kong must now be closed. And I would add here that we have increased our broadcasts in Spanish to Argentina and in English to the Falkland Islands. A small British interests section will continue to work in the Swiss Embassy, and we are most grateful to the Government of Switzerland, who are most expert in these matters, for agreeing to this arrangement. We have been advising the many British subjects living in Argentina to depart unless they have special reasons for remaining. We have frozen all Argentine financial assets in this country. We have stopped new credit cover for exports to Argentina. We have banned the export of arms to Argentina. And as the House was informed yesterday [loud shouts from back benches], we have imposed an embargo on the imports of all goods from Argentina from midnight last night. The dispatch of our naval force and the economic measures we have taken should show the Argentine regime quite clearly that we mean business. Yet if we are to convince them that aggression does not pay, we shall also need the support of the world community and all who believe in freedom.

The Security Council of the United Nations promptly and decisively endorsed the British view of the invasion of the islands. It adopted -- the very day after the invasion -- a resolution put forward by Britain. That resolution demands an immediate cessation of hostilities and an immediate withdrawal of all Argentine forces, and it calls on the governments of Argentina and the United Kingdom to seek a diplomatic solution to their differences and to respect the United Nations Charter. Britain immediately accepted the injunction to seek a diplomatic solution and to observe the charter, but Argentina displayed her contempt for world opinion by coldly declaring that she would not comply with the resolution.

Mr Speaker, the resolution is mandatory; it represents the expression of world opinion. It is binding in international law. I hope that the Argentine regime will be brought, by the pressure of world opinion, to fulfill its legal obligations. And I would like to add: The whole world has an interest in the fulfillment of this resolution. There are many such territories across the world which are vulnerable to aggression from more powerful neighbors. The preservation of peace depends on the exercise of responsibility and restraint. It depends on the strong not taking the law into their own hands and imposing their rule on the weak. It depends on the international community supporting the principle of self-determination and punishing those who willfully and forcibly violate that principle. It is the Falkland Islanders who today are being deprived of their right to live in accordance with their wishes. If the world does not oblige Argentina to restore their rights, tomorrow it will be someone else's turn to suffer aggression and occupation. [cries of "Hear, hear"] The world will become an even more dangerous place.

Since the 4th of April, the government have been making these views known to a large number of countries across the world. We have urged them to take measures similar to those that Britain has taken to bring Argentina to her senses. Yesterday, my right honorable friend, the prime minister, sent a personal message to our partners in the European Community and also to other countries with whom we have particularly close ties. Active dicussion is now underway about the measures by the European Community against Argentina. We have also been in close contact with the members of the Commonwealth, many of whom have responded with support, which bears witness to the strength and the value of our commonwealth links. All this diplomatic activity will continue.

The case for other countries to follow Britain in taking economic measures is very strong. The Argentine economy depends greatly on export earnings and on raising finance to pay for imports and cover the external deficit. The scope for measures by our friends is extensive. About 40 percent of Argentin'a exports go to our major partners, including the members of the Community. Argentina frequently tries to raise funds in the leading financial centers of the Western world. We are asking our friends to do everything they can to help us. They may not be able to take exactly the same measures as Britain herself; I don't think precise similarity is necessarily the answer in this kind of situation, but the supply of arms and military equipment to Argentina must be stopped in present circumstances. And I hope that our friends and partners will encourage their banks to make no new loans to Argentina. I hope, too, that they will follow us in terminating official export credits. And above all, we are asking our friends and friendly countries to take measures against imports from Argentina. I ask also that they should announce what they are doing. This will impress Argentina and encourage others to follow suit. We are confident of the support of the world community and, in particular, of our friends. With this support, we hope to make it clear to Argentina that withdrawal from the Falkland Islands and a negotiated settlement constitute the only legal and acceptable approach to this dispute and the only one which is in Argentina's own interests.

The first responses to our approaches to friendly countries have been encouraging. Many countries across the world have condemned Argentina's aggression. Our friends in Europe and the United States were among the very first. New Zealand has severed diplomatic relations with Argentina. Canada has placed an immediate ban on military supplies. Canada and Australia have withdrawn their ambassadors from Buenos Aires. The Netherlands, France, Belgium and Germany have taken action on arms sales. We hope that this list will soon grow much longer, both in terms of action taken and the number of countries involved.

Meanwhile, our naval task force is on its way to the South Atlantic. It is a formidable demonstration of our strength and of our strength of will. The challenges that they may be called upon to face may also be formidable. I have no doubt that they will be equal to it. I know the House will join me in offering full support to those who are now embarked in defense of British territory [cries of "hear, hear"] and to protect the rights which we and the Falkland Islanders hold equally dear.

Mr Speaker, it is intolerable that the peaceful people of the Falkland Islands, who are British by choice and by inheritance, should be the victims of unprovoked invasion by a powerful and covetous neighbor.

It will be far from easy to reverse the situation. The difficulties speak for themselves. We shall spare no effort to reach a peaceful solution. The Falkland Islanders have reacted with courage and dignity to the rape of their islands. I assure them now that Britain will stand by them. We have always said that their wishes are paramount. We shall do all in our power to show that their confidence in us is justified. I know that our objective of liberating the islands is shared in all parts of this House. If we in this country are to achieve our objective as swiftly and as peacefully as possible, then we must all unite together in our resolve to succeed.

Of course, there has been criticism of the government's handling of the matter before the invasion. We are acutely conscious of that. Yet I believe, Mr Speaker, certainly I hope, that I judge the mood of the House and the country rightly when I say that the government have their support in the determined course we have taken to solve the problem. What we in Britain must now do, with the support and the backing of all freedom-loving countries right across the world, is to see to it that Argentina's illegal defiance, Argentina's intolerable defiance, of the international community and of the rule of law is now allowed to stand. [loud cries of "Hear, hear"]

Parliament Debates

[Excerpts] Shadow Foreign Secretary Mr Denis Healey, praised Mr Pym's "vigorous" speech and told MPs that the crisis was not another Suez. That had been about property. The Falklands was about people. Of Labour support for the military operation, Mr Healey said the prime minister had no moral or political right to ask for a blank cheque. "But we have a duty to the nation and we will fulfill it."

Former Labour Prime Minister Mr James Callaghan attacked the government's use of the word "administration" regarding Britain's connection with the Falkland Islands. Mr Pym had used the word, he pointed out -- and the prime minister had used it in Saturday's debate. "Is there any significance in this?" he demanded of Mr Pym. "Did you mean sovereignty or not by 'administration'?"

Opposition MP's shouted "Answer" as Mr Pym rose to his feet and said he had been quoting the prime minister, who used the word "advisedly." "In two days as foreign secretary I am not competent to make a precise definition," he said to opposition jeers.

Mr Callaghan urged the prime minister to explain herself and to a crescendo of "Get up" cries from Labour MP's, a defiant Mrs Thatcher replied: "We have no doubt about our sovereignty, which has been continuous since 1833, nor any doubt about the unequivocal wish of the Falkland Islanders to remain British in stock and tradition. I regard the Falkland Islands as still British...an invader of unprovoked aggression does not and has not altered the law of British sovereignty."

What would happen if the islands had been handed back by some lease arrangements and were then leased back for British administration? asked Mr Callaghan. "Would that satisfy the prime minister?" he demanded. "What are our objectives in this matter, in which we have sent the Royal Navy?" Mrs Thatcher told him: "It is the Falkland Islanders' wishes that are paramount."

Mr Callaghan said that government spokesmen talking about Britain being "ahead of points" made him "squeamish." The real question behind the government's reaction to the situation was not whether the prime minister could have known that Argentina had taken the decision to invade, said Mr Callaghan. "The real question is: Was the available evidence of such a character that she should prudently have taken precautions at an early date?"

"It was for the prime minister to use her judgment on information given to her, and on this occasion she made a gross blunder," said Mr Callaghan.

Britain was living in a period of "half peace, half war." Technically it was a state of war, he said.

He stressed that Britain must avoid further humiliation. Britain faced its most difficult task since Suez, "namely how to get peace with honour." Mr Callaghan proposed that the government set up a special group of ministers inside the cabinet to take responsibility for the Falkland operation. This would be "in our national interests, and in the interests of those who are steaming towards possible action, with resultant deaths on either side."

Mr Callaghan also urged appointment of a minister "not distracted by day-to-day affairs, who can have charge and co-ordinate this interlocking and very difficult task." He went on: "I don't believe that the front bench as constituted at the moment has either got the time or the experience to handle these matters."

He urged Mrs Thatcher to look to experienced backbenchers in appointing a special team. Mr Callaghan said one of the earlier decisions the government had to reach was whether to declare a war zone to avoid third party incidents off the Falklands. Enterprising newspapers were probably even now chartering planes to the area. "I am sure Soviet submarines will be poking their noses in," he said.

He regretted the fact that Mrs Thatcher was not making a statement today. "We look to the prime minister to give the lead on these matters and assume responsibility for what is taking place in all these areas," said Mr Callaghan. "I think she has made a mistake by not taking that lead today and not speaking to the House."

PEREZ DE CUELLAR OFFERS MEDIATING ROLE

[Text] Rome, 7 Apr (AFP) -- United Nations Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar said today he was prepared to intervene personally if necessary to help find a peaceful solution to the Falklands crisis. Speaking at the conclusion of a six-day official visit to Italy, Mr Perez de Cuellar added, however, that he felt it was premature at this point for him to step in as a [word indistinct] between Britain and Argentina.

"The situation is very delicate, but I am confident over the possibility that a negotiated solution can be reached," he said. (?He expressed) hopes for the success of the good offices mission to London and Buenos Aires being undertaken by U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig.

The UN chief was to fly to Geneva from Rome today.

FOREIGN MINISTRY LOOKS FORWARD TO HAIG VISIT

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Text] As the U.S. secretary of state was heading for London and emergency talks with the prime minister over the Falkland Islands invasion, Britain's new foreign secretary, Mr Francis Pym, warned: "We mean business." To loud cheers he told the House of Commons: "Britain does not appease dictators."

And as the Royal Naval task force continued to head to the South Atlantic, MP's on both sides adopted a tough stand on the Argentinians. Meanwhile a Foreign Office spokesman tonight said Mr Pym warmly welcomed President Reagan's decision to send Mr Haig to London.

Mr Pym's debut as foreign secretary was regarded as a major success on all sides at Westminster. And the benches were also crowded to hear former Labour prime minister Mr James Callaghan suggest that the government might have to contemplate declaring a war zone in the South Atlantic to avoid "third party" incidents.

To loud cheers, Mr Pym told MP's: "We intend to show Argentina and the whole world, Britain is resolved to succeed in this crisis." The government intended to "see the Falklands freed from occupation and returned to British administration at the earliest possible moment."

Later tonight Mr Pym said that about 1,400 of the Falkland Islanders had the right to abode in the United Kingdom. In a Commons written reply he stressed that the home secretary, Mr William Whitelaw, "was given an assurance that no Falkland Islander -- whether he has the right of abode or not -- will have any difficulty over admission to this country."

The Tory MP for Plymouth Sutton Mr Alan Clark asked about the sealed orders held by the islands' governor, Mr Rex Hunt, to be opened in the event of an Argentine invasion. And Mr Pym said in another written reply: "The governor was given instructions to make his dispositions as he thought fit to resist an invasion. As commander-in-chief he was given discretion to carry on resistance for as long as he considered it to be in the interest of the Falkland Islanders."

Details of Visit

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Text] Alexander Haig, America's tough-talking secretary of state, flies into London early tomorrow for emergency talks with Mrs Thatcher over the Falkland Islands crisis.

The United States has now assumed a major role as mediators in an attempt to settle the dispute without bloodshed. President Reagan is desperate for a peaceful solution and gave personal orders for Mr Haig to fly to Britain and then on the Buenos Aires.

The sudden decision took the British Government almost by susprise although the intervention was welcomed. Astonishingly, Mr Francis Pym, the new foreign secretary, made no reference to the visit when he opened the Commons debate on the crisis this afternoon.

A telegram from the US State Department in Washington landed at the Foreign Office late this morning saying that Mr Haig would like to come. Almost by return, the Foreign Office replied, saying effectively: "We will be pleased to see you."

Mr Haig is due to land at Heathrow Airport shortly after 4 p.m. tomorrow. He will hold talks at Downing Street with the prime minister and Mr Pym before and after lunch, as well as separate discussions with Mr Pym at the Foreign Office.

A Foriegn Office spokesman said: "The foreign secretary warmly welcomes President Reagan's decision to send Mr Haig to London. He comes as a friend and ally to consult with us on an issue of great importance to us both." Mr Haig's stay in Britain is not expected to last more than 24 hours.

The United States is friendly towards both the United Kingdom and Argentina and does not want to see the dispute escalate into war.

The Royal Navy task force is steaming towards the Falklands and Mr Pym has already told the Commons that Britain "means business."

Mrs Thatcher will tell Mr Haig tomorrow that Britain stands unflinchingly by the United Nations Security Council resolution, backed by America, demanding Argentina's immediate withdrawal from the islands. The implication of this is that Britain will not take part in any direct diplomatic negotiations with the Argentinians about the islands' future until the invading forces have left.

Argentina's foreign minister, Nicanor Costa Mendez, said after meeting Mr Haig in Washington on Tuesday night that he was confident negotiations would result in "an honorable and just peace." But the country's interior minister, General Alfredo Saint Jean, said today that Argentina would make no concessions. "We will fight if necessary," he added.

In Washington today, White House Spokesman David Gergen said the decision to use Mr Haig in an effect to resolve the crisis was made today at a meeting between the President and his top foreign policy advisers. "This is an effort to be of assistance," said Mr Gergen "The situation is delicate." U.S. officials said Mr Haig's mission could not be called mediation, but rather the preliminary stages of a U.S. effort to help resolve the crisis.

Argentina's cabinet met in emergency session today to discuss the crisis. General Saint Jean later flew to the Falklands to swear in the new hard-line military governor, General Mario Benjamin Menendez. The 52-year-old general takes charges of the 1,800 islanders who have repeatedly said that they want to remain British.

A growing number of Britons working in Argentina are now leaving the country. Our embassy in Buenos Aires has virtually closed and Britain's diplomatic interests are being taken over by the Swiss. Foreign Office officials from all 10 EEC governments have been summoned to Brussels on Friday to discuss possible Common Market plans to resolve the dispute.

Meanwhile, ambassadors from the EEC member states will tomorrow resume talks on Britain's plea for a Common Market ban on imports from Argentina. The talks are said to be making progress, although several countries, including West Germany, have expressed misgivings about a total trade blockade.

LABOR PARTY SUPPORTS NAVAL BLOCKADE OF ISLANDS

LD080906 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0822 GMT 8 Apr 82

[Text] The Labour Party today backed the government's decision to impose the Falklands blockade. Shadow Foreign Secretary Mr Denis Healey, speaking on BBC Radio Four's "Today" programme, described the move as "sensible."

He added: "I can't help feeling that Mr Nott chose to announce this last night not just to restore his political reputation in Britain, but to get something in the bag before Secretary Haig arrives today to try to persuade the British Government to 'cool it.'"

He said the move strengthened Britain's position in negotiations with the Argentine Government, and added: "The 200 mile radius is British waters around the Falkland Islands. The blockade is against naval ships only, not against civilian ships."

But he went on: "We should not exaggerate the importance of this from the practical point of view. It is an enormous area -- 120,000 square miles of sea -- which have to be covered, perhaps by a couple, maybe four submarines.

"Argentina will still be able to pour troops and equipment into the Falkland Islands by using the Hercules aircraft they have.

"They could have 10,000 people on the island by the time our task force gets there."

The Commons is due to rise today for the Easter recess, but in view of last night's announcement there are likely to be renewed calls for the House to remain in session. The indications are that it will rise as planned, on the understanding that Parliament will be recalled in the event of any dramatic developments.

MINISTRY COMMENTS ON AVAILABILITY OF SHIPS

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defense correspondent]

[Text] The Defence Ministry today officially admitted "a lower state of availability" of British forces pledged to the defence of NATO because of the Falklands operation. How the alliance will fill the gaps left by the departure of a large number of Royal Navy warships and troops was still unclear tonight. MP's were expected to raise the issue during today's big Commons debate.

A ministry statement said NATO would only be told how many British ships it will temporarily lose when they leave the Western alliance's area of jurisdiction. The statement said: "NATO will be informed as and when British assets committed to the alliance leave the alliance area.

"British forces will, of course, remain available to NATO during the current emergency -- but at a lower state of availability. Of course the UK remains firmly committed to NATO's common defence. Our NATO allies fully understand the reasons for the reduced availability and there is a great deal of support for our cause."

Royal Navy and Royal Marine officers nearing the end of their commissions are to be kept on for the Falklands task force, Armed Forces Minister Mr Peter Blaker announced today. And ratings and other ranks will be retained "for a period not exceeding 12 months" from their discharge date for the same reason, he said in a Commons written reply.

The action has been taken under the Armed Forces Act 1966 and the Army Act 1955. "We intend to use these powers only in the case of those who are needed for this operation and to release them as soon as they can be spared," Mr Blaker said.

Only a handful of men are affected at the moment, but the move is a precaution to keep on "indispensable" experts if the operation lasts more than a month, it is understood.

THATCHER RESPONDS TO QUESTIONS IN COMMONS

LD081112 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1101 GMT 8 Apr 82

[Excerpts] American Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig is coming to London as a friend and ally, but not mediator in the Falkland crisis, the prime minister said today. Britain is standing firm on its demand for the unconditional withdrawal of Argentine troops, Mrs Thatcher told MP's as she faced the Commons just before Parliament's Easter break.

"Mr Secretary Haig comes as a friend and ally between the United States and ourselves," Mrs Thatcher said at question time. "The phrase mediator has not been used because we made our position perfectly clear that troops must be withdrawn from the Falkland Islands as a first step."

MP's did not refer to last night's dramatic announcement of a 200-mile "no go" zone around the Falklands from next Monday. Mrs Thatcher also announced that "simultaneous" statements would be issued from Britain and Spain today on negotiations over Gibraltar in the light of the crisis.

She said an inquiry is to be held into the events leading up to the Falklands invasion. Mrs Thatcher told Social Democrat Mr David Owen, the former Labour foreign secretary: "I think some form of review is appropriate." "We are considering exactly what form that review or inquiry should take, and what should be its timing."

On Gibraltar, the prime minister said: "The foreign secretary is in touch with the Spanish foreign minister and a simultaneous statement is expected later today." Talks between Britain and Spain on Gibraltar are due to open near Lisbon on April 20, preparatory to opening the border.

Mrs Thatcher ruled out a recall of British military reserves to compensate for the drain on British forces, saying: "If we thought it was necessary, we would of course consider it. I do not believe it is necessary at the moment."

The prime minister told the opposition leader, Mr Foot, that Parliament would be recalled during its 10 day Easter recess if necessary, in the light of events. "If it was thought necessary or strongly advisable to recall the House, of course I would do so," said Mrs Thatcher.

Mr Foot pointed to the possibility of developments over the recess, and the visit of Secretary Haig. "If there are departures in policy or understanding arising from the visit of Mr Haig, it must be the Commons which deals with the matter and not some television programme," said Mr Foot.

Mrs Thatcher said Britain's stand was now being supported "throughout the Western world and beyond." (?"There will be a realisation that if this dictator) succeeds in unprovoked aggression, other dictators would succeed elsewhere," she told MP's. "We really are fighting a battle against that kind of aggression."

The prime minister stressed Defence Secretary Mr John Nott's message that the cost of the operation was not being considered. She told Labour backbencher Mr Willie Hamilton (Fife Central), who demanded to know the eventual cost: "When this information first came to me I took a decision immediately -- I said it is the future of freedom which is at stake and the reputation of Great Britain." "We could not look at it against the basis of precisely how much it would cost -- we just could not."

But Mrs Thatcher added: "That is what the contingency reserve is for, and the chancellor has indicated that should we need to raise more money it will be raised in orthodox ways and will not be done in an inflationary way."

The government has "not yet formulated specific advice" for British football teams who may face Argentina in the World Cup in June, the prime minister said in a Commons written reply. The prime minister also said in another written reply the government had not made any inquiries to the South African Government on the availability of facilities or supplies to support Britain's task force in the South Atlantic.

It appears that the decision to quarantine the Falkland Islands was taken during the course of yesterday's debate, writes a PRESS ASSOCIATION political correspondent.

Mr Haig was informed of the move shortly before Defence Secretary Mr John Nott made the announcement in the Commons. It was stressed in Whitehall that the decision is not causing any distress in the White House. The blockade was said to be logical in strategic terms and is being presented as a further turning of the screw on the Argentine regime.

Mrs Thatcher has no intention of appointing a senior minister to co-ordinate military and strategic operations, as proposed yesterday by former Labour prime minister, Mr James Callaghan. Overall charge of the operation is in the hands of a small group of ministers, presided over by the prime minister, and including Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym, Defence Secretary Mr John Nott, and Home Secretary Mr William Whitelaw. They are reporting to the Overseas and Defence Policy Committee and through that to the full cabinet.

APPEAL MADE TO RED CROSS ON MISSING MARINES

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] Britain has appealed to the Red Cross to help discover what has happened to the 22 Royal Marines captured during the weekend Argentinian invasion of South Georgia, 800 miles from the Falklands.

The marines shot down an Argentinian Puma assault helicopter, killing three invaders and, using ageing shoulder-fired anti-tank missiles, holed an Argentinian missile corvette giving covering fire to the invasion.

A Defence Ministry statement said tonight: "The government has made an approach to the International Red Cross seeking their assistance in establishing the whereabouts of the Royal Marines who were stationed in South Georgia."

ECONOMIC SANCTIONS BEGIN TO TAKE EFFECT

[City editor Andreas Whittam Smith report: "Sanctions Halt 426 Million Pounds in Loans"]

[Text] Financial sanctions imposed on Argentina by Britain at the weekend have already halted completion of about $750 million (426 million pounds) of borrowing arrangements. Argentina's international debts are very substantial at $32 billion.

International bankers said yesterday that Argentina's chances of raising its 1982 borrowing target of $7 billion loans were now extremely poor. This is partly the result of the sanctions themselves which forbid British banks and foreign banks operating in this country from paying money to Argentina. Almost half of the country's foreign borrowings have been arranged through the City of London. The other factor is the risk of lending to a country caught in a grave international crisis.

Power Project

Among loan arrangements halted by the British move are a $200 million credit for the Buenos Aires electricity authority; $250 million for the state gas agency, and up to $300 million under borrowing which was to have been drawn upon by the state oil company.

FALKLANDS 'NO GO ZONE' CLARIFIED BY WHITEHALL

LD081422 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1407 GMT 8 Apr 82

[Text] Whitehall sources made clear today that the "no go zone" also applied to civilian Argentine ships attempting to resupply and reinforce troops on the Falkland Islands, writes a PRESS ASSOCIATION political correspondent.

The original announcement referred specifically to warships and naval auxiliary vessles, but reserved Britain's right to take other measures, if necessary.

Government sources clarified the position today, insisting that other ships carrying out work to reinforce Argentine forces on the island would be equally liable to attack from the Royal Navy. The message from the British Government to any Argentine ship involved supplying the Falklands was clear -- "take heed."

DAILY TELEGRAPH REPORTS TROOPS' PREPARATIONS

[Report by military correspondent Maj Gen Edward Ferguson: "Paras Prepare To Sail"]

[Text] The 650-strong 3rd Parachute Battalion, currently the army's "on call" spearhead unit, together with some logistic support elements to boost the commando force's "tail" are due to complete embarkation on the 45,000-ton liner Canberra at Southampton today.

Two armoured reconnaissance troops of the Blues and Royals equipped with Scimitar and Scorpion light armoured vehicles, have already been loaded aboard the 4,463-ton vehicle ferry Elk which has also been taken over by the services.

The addition of these soldiers to the Royal Navy task force greatly increases its commander's landing options for South Georgia, the Falklands or elsewhere. It gives him a reserve of bayonet strength, and some armoured support, to commit to battle to secure a forward base, to employ as a diversion, or to use as a follow-up force to occupy and hold ground won.

Units at Readiness

The army's artillery, engineer and logistic units permanently integrated into 3rd Commando Brigade have sailed with the task force. These soldiers have all had to undergo commando training. The army's special forces are also bound to be involved.

So far the army has not had to move any troops out of the British Army of the Rhine to support the Falklands move, but other units in Britain will have been brought to seven days' readiness.

CYPRUS ARCHBISHOP SEEN 'MEDDLESOME, DANGEROUS'

NC071510 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 7 Apr 82 p 4

[From the "Views" column: "The Cyprus Junta"]

[Text] A "major and full" synod -- as it was described -- convened in Nicosia and resolved (it says) to pardon the junta of metropolitan bishops who acted as agents for the fascist Athens criminals in their effort to dismiss Makarios and hand him over as a quarry for their guns. He managed to forestall them, however, defrocked them first, and then escaped in the well known dramatic way, avoiding their murderous weapons.

This "restoration" of the perjurious priests -- one posthumously, the second after repenting (the man was under age and knew not what he was doing) and the third under the reservation that he will be reinstated when he considers it proper to "repent" -- is the work of the present Cyprus Archbishop Khrisostomos, an ambitious, complex, extreme righting clergyman who "cannot find rest after Makarios' triumph." It has long been obvious from certain maniacal attacks against all and sundry, but not against himself, that Khrisostomos has thought very little about his clergyman's duties but, on the contrary, sails close to the wind toward alien tasks -- a meddlesome trait that smells of a buccaneering spirit and which in all probability may become dangerous tomorrow.

This may already have become dangerous as a result of the unexpected "initiative" in pardoning the criminal actions of the clerical fascist trio (for reasons of ...national unity and for nothing else), done in an absolute coupist manner while President Kiprianou is away from the island fighting in foreign capitals for a nationally acceptable solution to the Cyprus issue. This is a pardon granted within a closed circle among clergymen who are isolated from their flocks, because in the conscience of the democratic people of Cyprus, in other words, among the vast majority, the three metropolitan bishops, alive or dead, will always remain guilty of a despicable, antinational, treasonous and criminal act.

It is time that extreme rightist Khrisostomos reconsider his standing and not invite more calamities upon his already ruined fatherland. Perhaps we has heard of that fable by Aesop about the cockerel who wanted to be an eagle and who in the end got tangled up in the wool of a sheep and ended up in a cage, becoming a toy for the children in some village. If the cap fits, wear it.

SPOKESMAN RESPONDS TO TURKISH CHARGES ON THRACE

NC072150 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2100 GMT 7 Apr 82

[Text] Commenting on statements by the Turkish Foreign Ministry, the government spokesman stated the following:

There is no Turkish minority or Turkish population in Western Thrace, but Greek citizens who enjoy equality. In other words, there is a Muslim minority which, however, is protected not only by international treaties but also by the Greek constitution and laws. The government cannot and does not wish to interfere with the work of independent Greek justice, which is dealing with the case.

It is at the least perfidious and tantamount to unacceptable distortion of all facts on the part of Turkey to speak about human rights and persecution in Greece when it is well known to the entire international community what has happened up to now and what is continuing in Turkey in connection with the Christian minority in Istanbul, Imbroz and Bozcaada. It is inconceivable for one to talk about the violation of the rights of the Greek Muslims in Western Thrace when this is about a case still pending before Greek justice and which concerns Christian and Muslim inhabitants of a village.

KKE GROUP TO DISCUSS JOINT ACTION WITH LIBYANS

[Dispatch by special correspondent Dh. Sarri]

[Text] Tripoli -- The KKE delegation headed by Comrade Kh. Florakis, secretary general of the KKE Central Committee, has begun talks with officials of the People's Bureau of Foreign Affairs. The delegation has been in Libya since Monday at the invitation of Libyan leader Colonel al-Qadhdhafi. The talks include the following topics: Coordination of struggle against U.S. imperialism, conversion of the Mediterranean into a sea of peace and development of bilateral relations. The delegation has met with (Ahmad Suhati), head of the permanent secretariat of the Mediterranean progressive and socialist organizations.

Today the delegation will hold talks with representatives from the leadership of the General People's Congress, revolutionary committees, trade unions and students and womens organizations.

In a statement shortly before his departure for Libya, KKE Central Committee Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis stressed:

"In the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah we will hold discussions of particular interest because, at the present time, this country plays a pioneer and resolute role in the Mediterranean people's struggle against the U.S. and NATO imperialists. Also because Libya is building a new life whose experience might be of interest to every progressive force, all the communists.

"At all meetings with progressive movements and communist parties there is a permanent topic on the agenda: the struggle against imperialism and for the defense of peace. Questions of joint action and further development of relations between the two peoples will also be discussed."

EEC Tax on Yarn

[Text] The Turkish-EEC association council has decided to impose a permanent tax of 12 percent on all Turkish exports of cotton yarn. The decision will be in effect beginning tomorrow.

Earlier the EEC decided to impose a tax of 16 percent on all Turkish exports of cotton yarn because Turkish cotton yarn prices were very low. In reaction to this decision, Turkey asked for a meeting of the Turkish-EEC association council to reconsider the EEC decision. In its meeting in Brussels yesterday the council rejected the Turkish request for the abolition of the tax and decided to impose a tax of 12 percent beginning tomorrow.

In a statement following the council meeting, Turkey's permanent representative at the EEC, Cenap Keskin, said Turkey would retaliate by imposing a stabilization tax of 15 percent on all imports of iron and steel from EEC countries.

GREEK AMBASSADOR QUERIED ON LAND SEIZURE ISSUE

[Foreign Ministry Information Department statement; date not given]

[Text] The Greek ambassador was invited to the Foreign Ministry today by the ministry's acting under secretary, Oktay Cankardes, in connection with the Greek authorities' seizure of the lands of our kinsmen in Inhanli. The ambassador was told that we are having difficulty in understanding the justice or legality in the Greek court's rejection of the Inhanli villagers' protests. The rejection is based only on a secret report and is contrary to land registers and official documents that show the land in question as belonging to our kinsmen.

It was stressed to the ambassador that we expect the Greek Government to take the necessary measures to protect the property rights of our kinsmen on the land they have been working for many years. The ambassador was asked to convey the Greek Government's reply on the issue as soon as possible so the Turkish Government could determine the attitude it would adopt.

Greeks Surveying Land

[Text] A Greek court ruling to seize the registered lands of Turks living in Inhanli, a village near Iskece in Greece, has been announced. The ruling says the lands in question belong to the Greek state and that the protest of the Turkish villagers has been rejected.

Meanwhile, the Turks living in Inhanli have gone to court for disclosure of a secret report studied by the court before reaching the decision to seize the lands. The report, which had been drawn up by the agriculture directorate of Iskece, had not been disclosed during the trial.

After the lawyers study the ruling and the secret report is disclosed, the Turkish villagers will use their right of appeal. They have now been striking for 6 days in protest against the seizure of theirregistered lands.

Meanwhile, a Greek company has started to measure the lands in question, under the supervision of gendarmes and police, in order to start building a housing complex.

ECEVIT TRIAL SCHEDULED TO BEGIN 29 APRIL

TA071000 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 7 Apr 82

[Text] Bulet Ecevit will go on trial again on 29 April. The prosecutor is demanding a prison sentence. A new investigation of Ecevit, the former leader of the RPP, which was closed by the junta, has begun by the military prosecutor of the Ankara Martial Law Command. The reason for the investigation is an article Ecevit wrote in the West German magazine DER SPIEGEL and an interview on Netherlands television. The prosecutor is demanding a sentence of not less than 7 months on the grounds that Ecevit's article, while criticizing the present military regime and its activities, insulted the army and the junta members.

The scheduling of the new trial comes immediately after Evren, in Bursa, called Ecevit an informer and said: If they do not shut up we will not refrain from very harsh measures. This shows the military dictatorship has taken a clear position against the masses. As will be recalled, a short while ago Ecevit was sentenced for violating the junta's famous Declaration No 52 and served a prison term.

POLISH DEPUTY FOREIGN MINISTER POSTPONES VISIT

[Excerpt] Vienna-Warsaw (Special) -- Polish Deputy Foreign Minister Jozef Wiejacz -- who reportedly was to come to Vienna on Monday for a visit arranged at short notice -- abruptly had to fly back to Warsaw from Geneva. The last-minute postponement of his visit to Austria reportedly is connected with the fact that Foreign Minister Jozef Czyrek was in Prague on Monday with party and government chief Jaruzelski. The Polish Embassy in Vienna says Wiejacz may come to Vienna for a few hours on Wednesday or Thursday. The purpose of his talks in Geneva was primarily to seek an extension of international aid to Poland.

BRIEFS

FLIGHTS TO POLAND -- As of 1 April Austrian Airlines will introduce a second flight per week on the Vienna-Warsaw route, so there will now be flights every Tuesday and Thursday. Negotiations with the Polish LOT airlines, which also has two flights a week on this route, are to lead to a further increase in the number of flights. [Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 3 Apr 82 p 3 AU]

GOVERNMENT COMMUNIQUE CRITICIZES ARGENTINA MOVES

LD071956 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 7 Apr 82

[Text] The Portuguese Government today again deplored the occupation of the Malvinas Islands by Argentine military forces. In a three-point official communique, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs reiterates the Portuguese Government's respect for the principles of the UN Charter on the peaceful settlement of conflicts. The Lisbon government takes the view that Argentina's attitude constitutes a violation of the fundamental principles of international law, likely to cause a serious deterioration in the present framework of international relations.

Expressing its solidarity with the resolution adopted by the UN Security Council, the Portuguese Government voices its hope that Great Britain and the Republic of Argentina will be able to find, by means of diplomatic negotiations, a solution to the dispute between the two countries within the framework of international law, so that a situation of legality may be restored as soon as possible.

DETAILS OF ARGENTINE IMPORT BAN REPORTED

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Brussels]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher's plea for a total Common Market ban on imports from Argentina received full backing from EEC governments today. Sweeping trade sanctions plus formal confirmation of the total embargo on sales of arms and military equipment to Argentina from the Community came at a meeting in Brussels of the Ten's ambassadors to the Common Market.

The level of support for Britain's request for Community-wide action on trade came as something of a surprise to British officials, following hours of negotiations over the last few days when serious reservations by some member countries about the diplomatic and political value of total sanctions had emerged. Talks ended last night with little hope of much more than token trade moves against Argentina in support of expressions of condemnation at the invasion, demands for withdrawal of troops, and a general political solidarity with the UK.

But after overnight consultations with national governments' the ambassadors finally agreed this morning to the bulk of what Britain was requesting. A British official in Brussels said afterwards: "We are extremely satisfied with the solidarity that we have received." The complete embargo on imports will come into effect as soon as the necessary legal documents have been drawn up, probably some time next week. EEC ambassadors are to meet again next Wednesday when the formal go-ahead is expected.

Today's meeting did not, however, give Britain the unqualified support that had been hoped for on the question of export credits for Argentina. It was agreed that the decision on whether or not to suspend credits was a matter for national authorities, although a number of member states had already indicated they will not be providing new export credit guarantees during the present crisis.

Today's decision means a block on import trade worth nearly 1,000 million pounds. Agreement on the total ban came as a surprise because several countries were known to be deeply concerned about the internal effect on such measures. An end to imports of leather were a particular worry because of the difficulty of obtaining raw hides elsewhere to keep Europe's footwear industries going. Other countries were thought to fear trade reprisals, not only from Argentina, but her South American neighbours.

Exactly why agreement came swiftly this morning after apparent problems yesterday was not immediately known. A British spokesman simply said that member countries had been grappling with "very difficult and weighty matters," but had finally decided to support Britain's stand. The trade ban, the arms embargo, and expressions of solidarity do not, however, necessarily imply full endorsement of the British Government's current military strategy in the South Atlantic.

Some EEC sources in Brussels believe the determination demonstrated by Mrs Thatcher and strong warnings from Defence Secretary John Nott regarding Monday's expected confrontation have spurred reluctant member states to invoke trade sanctions in the hope of persuading the Argentine to recognise it is becoming increasingly isolated, and to make a diplomatic withdrawal.

EASTER MARCHERS DEMONSTRATE AGAINST N-WEAPONS

[Excerpts] Hamburg, 10 Apr (DPA) -- Tens of thousands of people in the Federal Republic participated today in the 1982 Easter marches. New Easter marches set off and others continued on their way to central rallying points. At the rally's -- for example in Duisburg, Munich and Hamburg -- speakers demanded that the West renounce a nuclear first strike, new nuclear weapons, the stationing of such weapons in Europe and the arms race.

According to information from the national information center for the Easter marches '82 in Frankfurt, over 140,000 people took part in the demonstrations throughout the Federal Republic today. However, police estimates are at around half this figure. The organizers say some 300,000 citizens intend to demonstrate for peace and disarmament by Easter Monday. According to DPA's information, the demonstrations have proceeded without major incidents so far. In Munich, however, 20 young people were detained after painting peace symbols on walls.

GENSCHER REAFFIRMS SUPPORT FOR BRITAIN

[Text] Bonn, 10 Apr (DPA) -- The Argentine-British conflict over the Falkland Islands cannot, in the view of Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, "be taken too seriously." In an interview with ARD Television, published by the Foreign Office in Bonn on Saturday, Genscher said that the European states relations with Latin America are also at stake. He stressed that it can only be hoped that U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig can achieve something in his talks with the Argentine Government. Everything must be done to prevent an armed conflict and to reach a diplomatic solution. That can happen only if the Argentines are made fully aware "that in no way will the creation of faits accomplis by use of force be rewarded."

Once again Genscher affirmed that Bonn, together with the partners in the EEC, gives unqualified support to Britain's demand for a withdrawal of Argentine troops from the Falkland Islands. The Europeans see it as their task to make it clear to Argentina through an attitude of solidarity that the "act of force" must be ended.

Genscher will meet Tuesday with the Argentine ambassador, Roberto E. Guyer, in Bonn. The foreign minister has already had a talk with British Ambassador Sir Jock L. Taylor.

Comments on Soviet Position

[Text] [no dateline] In an interview on South German Radio, Foreign Minister Genscher accused the Soviet Union of clearly trying to profit from the conflict between Argentina and Britain. Moscow is obviously seeking Argentina's favor. An example of this policy is the new trade treaty concluded between Buenos Aires and Moscow a few days ago. The Soviet Union has therefore not sided with the states which have condemned the act of force against the Falkland Islands, but is encouraging Argentina to stick to its present stance. Genscher stressed that the Soviet Union is taking on a heavy responsibility for the danger of further confrontation.

The text of the interview was published by the Foreign Office on Saturday.

UPCOMING MITTERRAND VISIT TO JAPAN OUTLINED

NC100850 Paris AFP in English 0835 GMT 10 Apr 82

[Text] Paris, 10 Apr (AFP) -- Francois Mitterrand, in the first trip ever made to Japan by an incumbent French president, will seek to establish an overall political dialogue and will discuss trade problems between the two countries, a presidential palace spokesman said. The spokesman, Michel Vauzelle, told reporters yesterday that the five-day voyage, to begin Wednesday, would end the "anomaly" of no French head of state ever having visited Japan.

Mr Mitterrand will meet both Emperor Hirohito and Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki and address the Japanese parliament (Diet) during his stay.

The Elysee spokesman said Japan's large surplus in trade with France would be discussed, "but in a friendly way." Mr Mitterrand did not want to "reproach Japan for its commercial dynamism. We must discuss certain rules in order to prevent aggressiveness which will lead to falling back on oneself and protectionism," the spokesman said.

The goal for Franco-Japanese commercial relations is "to arrive at a controlled expansion of trade and to prevent unbridled competition," Mr Vauzelle said, adding that "faced with the world crisis Japan and France share an optimistic and voluntarist vision." "In going to Tokyo Francois Mitterrand intends to pay homage to a country of great culture and a major economic power, but he will also try to get the Japanese to know France better, Japan's image of France being a little bit dated," Mr Vauzelle said.

Mr Vauzelle said Paris and Tokyo had consistent points of view, faced with a difficult world economic situation, and that "the desire for economic cooperation must be strengthened by political cooperation." "Dialogue is also possible in the geostrategic area, given the proximity of the two countries to the Soviet Union," said the presidential spokesman. He mentioned the feeling shared by Tokyo and Paris on the necessity of a balance of forces for world peace.

As part of their discussions of the international situation, Mr Mitterrand and Japanese leaders will review the state of affairs in Korea, China, Southeast Asia, the Pacific and the Middle East, Mr Vauzelle said.

The spokesman said Japan had said it was "very open" to French concerns for North-South dialogue and stabilizing prices of natural resources.

During his five-day visit, to end April 18, the president will first be greeted by Emperor Hirohito and then, on Thursday, have a working breakfast with Japanese business leaders, followed by a meeting with Prime Minister Suzuki, with whom he will also lunch on Friday. Mr Mitterrand will on Thursday address both the Japanese parliament and a Franco-Japanese symposium on new technologies.

He will be accompanied by his wife Danielle and ministers Claude Cheysson (Foreign Affairs), Michel Jobert (foreign commerce), Jean-Pierre Chevenement (research and development), Jacques Delors (economy) and Jack Lang (culture).

On Saturday, he will visit Tsukuba, which houses Japan's National Science Center, and meet with representatives of the French community in Japan. On Sunday, the last day of his trip, he will visit the historic city of Kyoto, where stops in several temples are planned.

On his way to Tokyo, he may stop in Helsinki to meet new Finnish Prime Minister Kalevi Sorsa, a Social Democratic, and on his way back to France he will confer with Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau on April 18 in Vancouver.

POSTPONEMENT OF GIBRALTAR NEGOTIATIONS VIEWED

[Excerpts] The postponement of the Hispanic-British talks on Gibraltar, caused by the Falkland Islands crisis, continues to be the public, political and diplomatic focal point of the day. However, over the past 24 hours, the postponement has given rise to much reaction from political leaders and the authorities in the area of the Campo de Gibraltar [area adjacent to the Rock] as well as on the Rock itself.

Although London and Madrid issued the news of the postponement simultaneously, it was learned today that the initiative to put off the reopening of the border and the commencement of negotiations on the future of Gibraltar until 25 June came from Spain. The British received the proposal positively, taking into account the lack of time and the atmosphere created both by the crisis with the Argentine Republic and Spain's abstention at the UN Security Council.

In semiofficial British circles, Spain's abstention at the Security Council -- which approved a resolution condemning the act of aggression by the Buenos Aires government -- is regretted, though the importance of Hispanic-Argentine relations is understood. British diplomatic sources, quoted in today's EL PAIS, do not think that Spain's stance will influence the British attitude on negotiations over Gibraltar. On the contrary, the British position in these future negotiations on the Rock, beginning on 25 June, will depend to a great extent on what happens in the Falklands in the next few weeks. The same sources stress that on the British side there still exists a readiness to negotiate on everything, including a change in sovereignty over the Rock.

According to a report in EL PAIS, the Gibraltarian leaders were not consulted, but simply informed by London of the postponement of the Hispanic-British talks. DIARIO 16 today says that the decision to postpone the Hispanic-British talks on Gibraltar means that the two sides will have to change their positions and London will have to rethink its colonial policy. According to diplomatic sources quoted by the newspaper, Madrid will have to adopt a more radical stance.

After yesterday's reaction in political circles and in the Campo de Gibraltar today we have further reaction -- the prime minister, Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo, this morning referred to the Gibraltar affair at the end of his visit to Malaga.

[Begin recording] [Question] Mr Prime Minister, what is your opinion on the postponement of the reopening of the border?

[Answer] It's more a decision than an opinion. I believe that we are maintaining all our commitments, as Britain is maintaining its commitments, and that a date has been found which is far removed from present events, in which the reopening of the border would be definite and real. Given the situation of the British Government with the Falklands problem, the negotiations would probably not be true, thoroughgoing negotiations, above all on matters pending, including sovereignty, which as we have always said, Spain (?wants). However, I hope that the negotiations will take place in this framework at the end of June, on the 25th when (?the working sessions) are scheduled. [end recording]

LETTER FROM FALKLAND ISLANDERS ASKS EVACUATION

[Text] Some leaders of the Falkland Islanders have appealed to the British Government for evacuation before the naval task force arrives. The letter was brought out of the Falklands by a group of islanders to Montevideo in Uruguay. It has been signed by some of the Island's top administrators, including the chief constable and the heads of housing, education and health.

But a spokesman for the Falkland Islands Office in London said the letter did not represent the views of the elected islands government. The letter, which is being considered by the Foreign Office said: "On behalf of the civilian population of the Falkland Islands, we, the undersigned civil servants and administrators, request that a protecting power be appointed to help to arrange the temporary evacuation of the civilian population of these islands, under the terms of the Geneva Convention.

"We further request the immediate dispatch to Port Stanley of an observer from the protecting power." The Falkland Islands Office said the letter was not signed by the deputy governor or any elected representatives.

ARGENTINE SHIPS WITHDRAW FROM 'NO GO' AREA

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Experts] Only two Argentinian warships -- a frigate and a destroyer -- were at sea early today, the Defence Ministry disclosed today, just 18 hours before the Royal Navy enforces a 200 mile "no go" zone around the disputed Falkland Islands.

The ministry spokesman said: "We note that their aircraft carrier, their only cruiser, seven of their eight destroyers, two of their three frigates and all of their submarines are back in port. By simple arithmetic, that means that one destroyer and a frigate can be at sea at present."

He added: "We are not going to discuss the position of the two ships other than that they are at sea." The spokesman could not give any information about whether Argentine naval auxiliaries were in what early tomorrow would become a "no go" zone to them. "We are keeping a very close watch on this situation. I cannot give any details," he said.

Meanwhile, the navy has requisitioned another passenger ship, the 16,907 ton P and O liner Uganda, at present in the Mediterranean with 904 children on board on an educational cruise. The Uganda, built in 1952, will become a hospital ship and after the children disembark at Naples, probably on Tuesday, with their trip cut short by a week, the ship will sail to Gibraltar for conversion work.

The other P and O liner, Canberra, is now on her way south, with 2,000 marines and paratroops on board, to catch up the naval task force. She is being trailed by the Soviet spy ship, Primorye, 3,400 tons, one of a new class of frigate-sized intelligence gatherers, which recently stationed herself off Malid Head, Ulster. The Defence Ministry spokesman said: "We would expect this kind of surveillance. It would be strange if they did not take interest in this kind of shipping movement."

The ministry is pouring cold water on some of the reports from Argentine. On troop build-ups in the Falklands, the spokesman said "Reports of escalation are not always to be believed." They have assessments and estimates of force numbers in the occupied islands.

"We have noticed television pictures of Argentinian warships patrolling around the Falklands. We have seen exciting pictures of fast patrol boats. These seem to be old shots taken in the vicinity of the mainland. We believe their patrol boats do not have the sea-keeping abilities to reach the Falkland Islands except in very calm weather. We do not have calm weather around the Falklands at the moment."

He stressed: "Since the declaration of the 200 miles exclusion zone on April 7, we have noticed a number of Argentinian warships reappear in mainland ports." The main British naval task force was today continuing "on course and on time" south through the Atlantic. There were some "minor difficulties," but these were "being overcome."

PYM COMMENTS ON SITUATION, HAIG DIPLOMACY

[Interview with Foreign Secretary Pym at the Foreign Office 11 April -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] In a few hours Mr Haig will be taking off from Buenos Aires with what his staffers describe as specific ideas for further discussion. But Mr Haig will not arrive here until after the 0500 deadline tomorrow. In light of that when I called this morning on the Foreign Secretary Francis Pym in his room at the Foreign Office, I asked him if the government would now instruct the submarines in the maritime exclusion zone not to fire on those few Argentine vessels reported to be in the zone until those specific ideas for a settlement have been explored.

[Answer] You know that really is a decision for the Argentines. They invaded this island, made this aggressive act, this invasion, so they took that aggressive action, and we said on Wednesday giving 4-days notice that this zone will come into effect, and if there is going to be some arrangement whereby we can achieve by diplomatic means an end to this dispute, then I would not expect that there'd be any targets within that zone. As a matter of fact I would not have expected there to be any targets in that zone anyway. I certainly hope there wouldn't but in veiw of the fact that Mr Haig is making these efforts, which we totally support, to try and find a solution, I think it would be very surprising indeed if there were targets there, at any rate I hope very much that the Argentines don't present a target.

[Question] Have you had any indication at all that the potential targets are leaving the area?

[Answer] No, but I think the bulk of the Argentine Navy is near their port in the mainland. Some are in the ports in the mainland. We don't know what exactly is there, but the evidence we have suggests that the bulk of it is near their own mainland.

[Question] So there may in fact by 0500 tomorrow morning be nothing for the submarines to attack?

[Answer] That is quite possible, and I certainly hope that is so. And if this negotiation, if you can call it that, to find a diplomatic solution in accordance with the UN Charter is to be real then I think it would be really extraordinary if the Argentines did not clear out of the zone.

[Question] When Mr Haig went to Argentina as a friend and ally, not as a negotiator, he took with him apparently a message from the government saying that there could be no peace until the 9,000 or however many thousand strong Argentine troops there are on the Falklands had withdrawn and British administration was restored. Do you still stand by that position?

[Answer] That's right. Because as I say they are the invading party, the United Nations passed a resolution demanding the end of hostilities, demanding an immediate withdrawal of all Argentine forces, and of course the Argentine is legally required to fulfill that requirement, and it has not yet done so.

Obviously that is a first step to be taken by them before there can be anything remotely like negotiations for a long-term solution of the whole problem. So naturally it is vital that that happens and it isn't just a matter between the Argentines and us because I think the whole world has an interest in seeing that this act of aggression is not allowed to stand and therefore of course withdrawal is the first condition.

[Question] It didn't sound from what President Galtieri was saying yesterday that he was prepared now to withdraw. He said in the... Although he was calling on us for restraint, he was saying but if they come we will do battle. He also talked about peace with honor. Now can there be any peace with honor for us that does not involve total withdrawal?

[Answer] It must be a total withdrawal. No, I don't think that there can be, and that is the United Nations resolution to which Argentina is of course committed to the charter just as we are, and they passed that resolution so they are required to withdraw. [sentence as heard] I think one mustn't perhaps necessarily take it at absolute face value what a president such as Mr Galtieri may say in a moment of this kind. But the point is that Mr Haig is coming back to London, he arrives sometime tomorrow, we don't yet know when, and of course he is going to engage himself in talks with the prime minister and myself and we'll see what he has to say. But that would suggest that there is at any rate some scope for finding a diplomatic solution, and as I said to the House last week, the House of Commons, we are very desirous indeed of ending this by peaceful means as I believe everybody is.

[Question] Secretary, what about the longer term peace with honor? There have been talks of course with the Argentines about the possibility of leaseback, the possibility of condominium has been mentioned. In the long term, do you think those options are still open, do you think that the Falkland Islanders could accept a leaseback or a condominium?

[Answer] Whereas I wouldn't, as it were, actually exclude them, I can tell you that until and unless there is a withdrawal and unless the conditions of the UN resolution is fulfilled, there is no question of any further talks or any further negotiations. It does not arise, we've been invaded, British territory has been annexed and that has got to be put right before any further talks can take place.

[Question] While we are waiting for what might be a naval battle, what about the position of the Falkland Islanders themselves? There has been this letter from the 15 civic leaders which has been dismissed as not representative, but is it not a letter which should be paid attention to? It may express the wishes of more than have been given credit for.

[Answer] I don't think we ought to talk in terms of a naval battle because as I have indicated I expect that there will be no target and I hope very much there won't be within the zone and I would like to make that quite clear. The bulk of the Argentine Navy from the evidence we have is near the mainland. In the meantime it's pretty clear that the Falkland Islanders are having a very rough time. I am so glad the governor broadcast a message to them today. I am sure they are having a rough time and obviously they will hope that their territory can be returned to British administration and of course thereafter we can ascertain yet again what their wishes are likely to be. We have always paid close attention to their wishes and we must find out again what they will be and the only way we can do that is after there has been a withdrawal. As for the letter I have not seen a copy, haven't seen any of the signatories to it and until we've seen a copy and know more about it, it is a bit difficult to assess it exactly. But I shall be very surprised after all that has happened, if the Falkland Islanders weren't even more British than they were before if that is possible.

[Question] Is there any further prospect you think of United Nations being able to help us in any way? The use of the United Nations has been urged by various voices, Tony Benn among them, the Peruvian ambassador among others.

[Answer] Well we've used the United Nations. They passed a resolution and it ought to be carried out. The members of the United Nations ought to see that it is carried out and I would remind you that even the Soviet Union didn't oppose it, and they are equally responsible for seeing that it is implemented just to take one example. And there is an interest for the whole world to see that it is implemented and that is the use of the United Nations, that is what it is for. And I very much hope that its members will see that that is carried out.

[Question] You said in the House of Commons, in the debate, that Britain would not appease dictators. Now a very short time to go that [word indistinct] zone goes into operation, there is that possibility that some ships may be left in it. Are you prepared to appease in any way?

[Answer] No, the whole world wants the Argentine to withdraw. It was an aggressive act as everybody very well knows, and everybody wants the problem resolved without going to war, and it is up to them to withdraw and the whole world wants that. Look at the support we had in the Community. A unanimous resolution passed yesterday. Of course it is banning export on arms but also banning Argentine imports. Look at the response we have had from the Commonwealth. Splendid, all our friends around the world, all freedom-loving people realize what has happened, what offense has been committed and they want it put right by the Argentine without war.

[Question] Foreign Secretary I must press you again on this last and what to many people is a crucial point. Mr Nott has said that if there are ships about they will be sunk. If there are ships about tomorrow at 5 o'clock will they be sunk?

[Answer] That is the position, but as I say, I do not expect there will be, but that is the position.

HAIG ARRIVES; NO INCIDENTS IN 'NO GO ZONE'

LD120546 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0535 GMT 12 Apr 82

[By PA diplomatic, political and defense staff]

[Text] American Secretary of State Alexander Haig arrived at Heathrow Airport, London, today on the latest stage of his mission to find a peaceful settlement to the Falkland Islands crisis. As he flew in, Britain's 5am deadline bringing into effect the 200-mile no-go zone in the seas around the islands passed without reports of any incidents.

Mr Haig flew direct to London from Buenos Aires, where he had talks with the Argentinian president, General Leopoldo Galtieri about the Argentinian invasion of the South Atlantic island group. Mr Haig, accompanied by his entourage of officials and bodyguards, promptly sped off to London for crisis talks with Mrs Thatcher. He told reporters: "As you know, I have just arrived from Buenos Aires. I am bringing here to the British Government, to Mrs Thatcher and her ministers, some ideas which have been developed on the basis of the United Nations Security Council Resolution 502, and look forward to these discussions."

Mr Haig is expected to put forward a plan for the withdrawal of Argentinian forces from the Falklands and their replacement by forces from the United Nations and countries of the Organisation of American States. He is due to meet Mrs Thatcher, with Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym and Defence Minister Mr John Nott, at 10 Downing Street at 9.30 this morning. Mrs Thatcher had a meeting with ministers most closely associated with the crisis at Downing Street last night.

A Defence Ministry spokesman said this morning that there had been no incidents in the no-go zone round the islands since the deadline passed at 5am. Most of the Argentinian Navy was last night reported to be in port in Argentina. The Defence Ministry said last night that only one Argentinian destroyer and a frigate were still at sea. The foreign secretary said last night that if there was going to be an arrangement to settle the dispute by diplomatic means he would not expect there to be any targets within the maritime exclusion zone.

DENKTAS MEETS WITH PEREZ DE CUELLAR IN GENEVA

[Text] TFSC President Rauf Denktas held a meeting with UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar in Geneva this morning. In a statement after the 1-hour meeting, Denktas said it had been a useful and constructive meeting, adding that they decided to review the developments in New York in June once again. On his meeting with Perez de Cuellar, Denktas said: We both concluded that the problem can be resolved through negotiations and that progress has been achieved in the negotiations regarding important issues.

Also present at this morning's meeting were Denktas' constitutional adviser, Turhan Feyzioglu, Turkish Cypriot Foreign Affairs and Defense Minister Kenan Atakol, Turkish Cypriot negotiator Umit Suleyman Onan and his legal adviser, Necati Munir Ertekun. The meeting was held in Perez de Cuellar's room at the hotel where he is staying. His special adviser, Hugo Gobbi, and his New York aide, (Tikko), also attended the meeting.

In a statement after the meeting, Denktas made the following statement: [Begin recording] We held our expected meeting with the honorable secretary general. During the 1-hour meeting, we gave him detailed information about the point reached by the intercommunal talks. We exchanged views on that. We both concluded that the problem can be resolved through negotiations and that progress has been achieved in the negotiations on important issues. Our community has always had a positive attitude and has always strived for peace. It has always tried to help the secretary general in all fields, whenever necessary. This last meeting, which was held within this framework, I believe was very useful and constructive for both sides. The intercommunal talks will continue. We will probably review the situation again in June. [end recording]

Denktas then answered questions by foreign journalists. Asked whether the secretary general had brought new ideas, Denktas said: No. We discussed the issues along the lines of former Secretary General Waldheim. There is no need for new ideas. Denktas stressed that the talks had centered around the establishment of a government that would represent both communities, adding: The talks are centering around the establishment of a government as Madarios and I had agreed on in 1977 -- a bicommunal, bizonal and federal government representing both communities. Denktas pointed out that the intercommunal talks were being held every week, adding: Now these talks must be speeded up.

[Excerpt] UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar and Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas had a meeting on the Cyprus issue in Geneva today. A UN statement on the meeting says the talks were constructive and lasted for 1 hour. The present phase of the intercommunal talks between the two Cypriot communities was reviewed in some detail. The statement adds: The secretary general called on the Turkish Cypriot side to agree to speed up the negotiating process within the framework of the intercommunal talks. Mr Denktas accepted this suggestion and also agreed to reassess the situation in New York in June. The secretary general reaffirmed his intention to continue with determination his current efforts to facilitate finding a solution to the Cyprus problem.

Atakol Returns

[Text] Foreign and Defense Minister Kenan Atakol, who attended the meeting between President Rauf Denktas and UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar in Geneva, returned to the TSSC last night. In a statement on his contacts in Geneva, Atakol said the meeting between Denktas and Perez de Cuellar on 9 April was held in a very positive atmosphere and that was very beneficial.

Atakol said: At the meeting, also attended by the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, Hugo Gobbi, his adviser and a Turkish Cypriot delegation, various basic realities were put forward clearly and the progress made in the intercommunal talks was reviewed. It was understood that we shared the same views on the following issues: The intercommunal talks are the way in which a just, peaceful and lasting solution can be found to the Cyprus problem; these talks, being held so far within the framework of the basic principles the parties concerned declared they agreed upon under the auspices of the United Nations, have been productive and constructive; the talks should be continued with patience and through mutual good will. A unity of view was reached that it is possible to speed up the intercommunal talks. It has been deemed suitable to hold a new meeting in June to assess the talks to be held until then.

The Cyprus problem can be solved not through provocations and propaganda aimed at disrupting mutual confidence but through a realistic, rational and constructive approach. The TFSC constructively and sincerely will continue to exert every possible effort for the just solution of the problem within the framework of the intercommunal talks, which it believes will enable the two communities on the island to live in peace, security and tranquillity in their own region. Quicker progress can be achieved on the solution of the Cyprus problem if the other party reciprocates our good will and if it adopts a realistic attitude.

He said: During the Athens talks it was established jointly that the increased interest in the Cyprus problem is due to the intensive and coordinated effort for international mobilization and to Greece's alignment with this effort.

[Excerpt] In answer to newsmen's questions, President Kiprianou stated that the UN secretary general will not hesitate to visit Cyprus if he ascertains, discerns or feels that there is a possibility for progress in the inter-Cypriot talks and that this progress might be achieved through his presence. He also stated that there is no question of changing the agenda of the inter-Cypriot talks, but that there is the question of focusing the talks on the basic questions and thus ascertaining within a resonable time whether or not there is a possibility for progress.

Regarding Mr Papandreou's proposal that the occupation troops be withdrawn and that Greece undertake the expenses of maintaining a strong UN peace force, Mr Kiprianou stated that this is being widely approved and that it is being very favorably accepted.

He added that it seems the other side does not have the political will to solve the Cyprus issue. In reply, Mr Hameed expressed his concern over the developments in Cyprus and added that his country maintains that a settlement must respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and the nonalignment of Cyprus. He also expressed hope for the success of the intercommunal talks. Mr Hameed, who is on an official visit to Cyprus, will leave for home Monday.

AUSTRIA

NATIONAL BANK PRESIDENT GOING TO MOSCOW

[Summary] At the invitation of the Soviet state bank, National Bank President Stephan Koren will leave for Moscow early next week. During his several-day stay in the Soviet capital Koren will have talks with functionaries of the state bank as well as with representatives of the investment and foreign trade bank. The talks will primarily serve the exchange of information, as there are no unresolved problems between the banks of issue, but the bilateral economic relations are burdened by the high Austrian trade deficit which reached 13.6 billion schillings last year, mainly due to high energy imports.

"To boost Austrian exports, the USSR was granted a 10 billion schilling loan at the interest rate of 7.8 percent, which will also serve to finance the delivery of equipment for the construction of a new pipeline from Siberia to West Europe. Although a basic agreement on Soviet natural gas deliveries has already been concluded, no Soviet orders have been placed to date with Austrian industries. At the signing of the 10 billion schilling loan agreement the Soviets also expressed the wish for freely disposable loans, but to date this wish has not been made more specific by the Soviet side."

TRADE TIES WITH ARGENTINA BEING MAINTAINED

[Text] Copenhagen, 10 Apr (AFP) -- A delegation from the Chamber of Commerce here still plans to go to Argentina on Tuesday to head a sales campaign for Danish products, it was learnt today.

This was despite meetings by ambassadors from the ten European Economic Community countries to discuss possible economic and political measures against Argentina in retaliation for its invasion of the Falkland Islands.

Danish exports to Argentina rose from 235 million krone (about 30 million dollars) in 1980 to 256 million in 1981. Meanwhile the Danish 500-ton AES freighter, with goods for the Falkland Islands Company, has been re-routed from the Falklands to Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, by the owners A.E. Sorensen.

The Danish Foreign Ministry has not yet identified the Danish national who, according to the London TIMES newspaper, is among the 1,813 inhabitants of the islands.

PCP LEADER CUNHAL INTERVIEWED IN WARSAW

LD091000 Warsaw PAP in English 0855 GMT 9 Apr 82

[From the press review]

[Text] Warsaw, 9 Apr (PAP) -- ZYCIE WARSZAWY carries an interview with Secretary General of the Portuguese Communist Party Alvaro Cunhal, in which the guest said the Portuguese Communist Party's membership is continually growing. The 1980 census indicated 187,000 registered members, against 100,000 in 1975.

Speaking of the counterrevolutionary process going on in Portugal since 1976, Cunhal, now on a visit to Poland, said "There are conditions for defeating the forces of reaction and saving and continuing the consolidation of the democratic system" in Portugal. Cunhal said trends are increasingly widespread within the Socialist Party which are directed against the party's alliance with the country's rightwing. "Soares runs the risk of being left isolated within his own party and thus he may be forced to change his course," Cunhal predicted.

The Portuguese Communist Party is firmly opposed to the plans for Portugal joining the EEC, he declared. "This would contribute to the restoration of monopolistic capitalism in Portugal... and would mean invasion of the Portuguese economy by multinational monopolies, which would undermine its development and the country's national independence, Cunhal said.

[Text] The secretary general of the PCP, Alvaro Cunhal, said in Lisbon today that the alarmist reports on Poland carried by some of the news media do not correspond to the truth. I was expecting to find tanks and patrols at every corner, but saw only the odd tank and a few patrols scattered around the city, Cunhal said today on his return from Warsaw. This visit to Poland, at the invitation of the first secretary of the Polish United Workers Party, General Jaruzelski, enabled me, the PCP leader said, to draw two conclusions: The first is that in 1981 a counterrevolutionary process was, in fact, under way which could have culminated in a violent, all-out bid for power. The second is that the measures taken by the present Polish Government will contribute to the stabilization of the Polish state at various levels. [sentence indistinct]

With regard to this visit to Poland, during which he held talks with several members of the Warsaw government and activists in some factories, Cunhal said that his party had taken the view that it would be useful to visit the country in order to be able to see what the real situation is. Asked to give an opinion on the future of the Polish trade union movement, Alvaro Cunhal said that nothing had yet been decided and that Polish organizations and the government are studying the problem in detail.

LE MONDE SUMS UP EEC SUMMIT CONCLUSIONS

[Text] The following is a summary of the European Council's conclusions published in Brussels on 30 March:

I -- Transatlantic relations: The Council "stresses the importance it attaches to ties with the United States and its intention to further develop consultation between Europeans and Americans." The Council "appreciates" President Reagan's recent statement on the 25th anniversary of the Treaty of Rome, which states that "the United States regards a united Europe as a partner with which it confirms its intention to pursue close cooperation in keeping with Europe's economic and political importance and its role in the world."

II -- East-West relations: The European Ten's heads of state and government state that "the situation in Poland is still influencing East-West relations and is affecting... The Ten's relations with Poland and with the USSR, which bears definite responsibility for this situation." The Greek delegation "expressed its reservations" on the part of this sentence which mentions the USSR.

The Ten renew their appeal "for the Polish authorities to lift martial law, release the people arrested and restore real dialogue with the church and Solidarity as soon as possible." The Ten then say they are concerned by "the Polish authorities' recent statement relating to the possibility of detained people leaving.... They reject any attempt to exert pressure on those concerned. They would interpret such a policy as a new aggravation of the situation in Poland and a serious violation of fundamental human rights."

The Ten then state that they examined economic relations between their countries and the East European countries, "taking account of the important role played by Community trade with those countries." The Ten agreed that "those questions, including the important related question of credits, should be carefully examined by the EC, the member states' governments and other governments both at national and international level in close consultation with the other OECD countries" (in other words the United States and other market economy countries). (Greece expressed reservations on this whole paragraph.)

The Ten then state that they hope that circumstances will make it possible to adopt "a substantial and balanced document" when the Madrid conference resumes in November.

III -- Afghanistan: The Ten recall their previous statements on this subject made at the last European Council meetings in Luxembourg and London. Drawing attention to the "tragic situation that country is now in... its 3d year of occupation," they add: "The Soviet expeditionary corps has recently been strengthened; the repression of the civilian population is continuing relentlessly, and every day brings an increase in the total number of refugees which has already reached 3 million, in other words one-fifth of the population." The Council once again calls for a "political solution" and "condemns the Soviet Union's negative attitude" in rejecting all the proposals put to it.

IV -- Near East: Declaring itself "acutely concerned by the serious events taking place in the occupied territories of the West Bank and Gaza, the European Council launches an urgent appeal for an end to this dangerous spiral of violence and repression. It particularly condemns all unilateral measures such as the sacking of democratically elected mayors by the Israeli authorities and the violations of the freedoms and rights of the inhabitants of those territories, which come after the measures taken by Israel regarding the Golan Heights and which are bound to damage the prospects for peace."

The Ten then launch a new appeal for Lebanon's full sovereignty and territorial integrity to be respected. They reaffirm their will to help establish a just and lasting peace in the Near East.

V -- Central America: After pointing out that the "constant increase in tension in that region is causing it great concern," the European Council states: "Thus it welcomes with interest any initiative likely to end the violence and lead to the restoration of peace in the region by dialogue and respecting democratic rules and human rights, while safeguarding national sovereignties and the peoples' will."

In this context the European Council "noted with interest the suggestions made by several countries in the region." "Noting that the tensions and conflicts raging in Central America are often caused by serious economic problems and social inequalities which the world situation is aggravating to the detriment of the most underprivileged people, the European Council thinks that the international community cannot remain indifferent to these ills."

The Council then welcomed the initiatives taken by Nassau group countries (the United States, Canada, Mexico, Venezuela and Colombia). The Ten state that they are prepared to "increase within the bounds of their ability" their development aid to Central America and the Caribbean.

VI -- With regard to the recent mission to Ankara carried out by EEC Council Chairman Leo Tindemans (Belgium), the Ten state: "Mr Tindemans clearly informed the Turkish Government of the serious concern being aroused among The Ten by the problem of respect for human rights in Turkey and stressed the need for that country to return to a democratic regime as quickly as possible. His interlocutors assured him that the country would return to democracy with 2 years at the latest. According to their statements, the referendum to approve a democratic constitution would take place in November 1982 and parliamentary elections in fall 1983 or spring 1984 at the latest." The Ten state that they attach "fundamental importance to the attainment of those objectives."

Economic Policy Within the Community

In the part of the presidency's conclusions on economic policy within the community, "The Council stresses the need for a coordinated policy to promote investment and combat unemployment. Such concerted action should be accompanied by efforts to control the increase in all production costs. Greater emphasis must be placed on private and public production investment.... As regards investment the European Council expresses its concern at a rate of production investment in Europe, especially in promising sectors, which is too low given its gross industrial product..."

"In this connection it confirms the importance it attaches to a reduction in interest rates and the strengthening of Community credit tools to help investment, especially in the sphere of energy and the development of the agricultural and food industry...."

"The European Council stresses the importance of maintaining and developing the Community's internal market which, thanks to a more active external policy, guarantees it a continental dimension.... That dimension makes it possible to develop Community industrial strategies and a policy of technology and innovation.... The industrial policies relating to energy and research and the agricultural policy are the policies in which the Community dimension can contribute most..."

"As regards employment, the Council admits that, in addition to increased production investment efforts and efforts to control production costs, the serious nature of unemployment requires specific actions with rapid effects. To help gradually define a social policy the member states will take measures aimed more especially at job training for young people.

As a first step the member states will try to ensure that over the next 5 years all young people appearing on the job market for the first time will receive job training and initial work experience in the framework of special programs to help young people or in the framework of employment contracts...."

The European monetary system must be given "new impetus by increasing economic convergence, the system's mechanism, the role of the European currency unit and monetary cooperation between the Community and third countries...."

With regard to international economic policy, "the European Council expects the Versailles summit in early June to establish increased cooperation among the big industrialized partners, especially with a view to encouraging a fall in interest rates, reducing the volatility of exchange rates and strengthening North-South relations...."

"The coordination of the big industrial countries' policies in the stock market sphere to avoid chaotic fluctuations in exchange rates is still very urgent. The Community insists that Japan open its market and integrate it more into international trade. In the exchange rate sphere Japan should pursue an economic and commercial policy which is more compatible with the balance of burdens to be assumed by the whole industrialized world and thus help ensure economic recovery."

COUNCIL OF EUROPE CALLS FOR ARGENTINE WITHDRAWAL

LD081304 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1247 GMT 8 Apr 82

[Text] The Council of Europe today backed the UN Security Council resolution calling for the Argentinians to withdraw their troops from the Falklands. The Council's Committee of Ministers also backed the Security Council's call for the UK and Argentina to solve the crisis by diplomatic means.

A statement issued today in Strasbourg said "The Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe has examined the situation created by the invasion of the Falkland Islands (Islas Malvinas) by armed forces of Argentina. The Committee of Ministers reaffirms the commitment of all member states of the Council of Europe to the principles enshrined in the United Nations Charter, whereby states are bound to settle their international disputes by peaceful means and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force.

"The committee supports the demand by the Security Council of the United Nations in its resolution of 3 April 1982, for an immediate cessation of hostilities and for an immediate withdrawal of all Argentine forces from the Falkland Islands (Islas Malvinas), and the Security Council's call for the governments of Argentina and the United Kingdom to seek a diplomatic solution to their differences, and to respect fully the purposes and principles of the charter of the United Nations."

The member states of the Council of Europe are Austria, Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Malta, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the U.K.

VIETNAM'S FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVES FOR TALKS

[Text] Paris, 8 Apr (AFP) -- Renewed peace and stability in Southeast Asia was tied to France's future role in the region, Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach indicated here today as he began a two-day official visit to France. Mr Thach said upon arrival that he came to Paris "to develop Franco-Vietnamese relations" as Vietnam considered France to have "a special footing" among "our ties with Western nations."

The Vietnamese minister's visit to France has apparently been set to strengthen months-old reconciliation moves between the two countries. After his recent talks in Hanoi with French presidential advisor Regis Debray and research and technology minister Jean-Pierre Chevenement, Mr Thach has been scheduled to meet here with both the cooperation and transport ministers as well as with Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson tomorrow.

While the recent Franco-Vietnamese talks in Hanoi focussed on primarily economic and technical issues, Mr Thach seems to have been sent to Paris on a politically-centered mission. Analysts said today that by laying stress on France's "very important role" in Southeast Asia, Vietnam aimed to imply that France could end the current Cambodian crisis by recognising the ruling Vietnamese-backed regime in Phnom Penh and voting in the United Nations against -- instead of abstaining -- the Vietnamese-ousted Khmer Rouge regime still officially recognised by the U.N.

But official French sources said that although France hoped to step up its influence throughout the Indochinese peninsula, it did not aim to recognise Heng Samrin's Phnom Penh regime or support Vietnamese military presence inside Cambodia. Whether France and Vietnam considerably improve their relations or not, the recent steps towards a reconciliation have already triggered harsh criticism in Peking and among Indochinese refugee groups in Europe and the United States.

In a Chinese article late last month in which France was not directly named, editorialists lashed out against a 40 million dollar economic aid deal by Paris to Hanoi in December. France has argued that aid must be poured into Vietnam to give the country the economic means to break its alliance with Moscow and shatter its diplomatic isolation from the West as well as from the five-member Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN).

But Chinese strategists have responded by saying that "the Soviet-Vietnamese alliance will never be shattered by economic aid." They added that although the Vietnamese economy was in a "catastrophic situation," this had in no way "stopped Hanoi's rulers from maintaining their aggression against Cambodia." All aid to Hanoi, they said, would simply serve as an encouragement to Hanoi's current policy stance.

Meanwhile, Mr Thach's visit here was termed a mere attempt by Vietnam to break through its international isolation by the Khmer People's National Liberation Front (KPNLF), headed by former Premier Son Sann. A KPNLF statement said that Vietnamese "colonialism" in Cambodia had left the country "victim to an economic fiasco and international isolation." This was why Hanoi was engaged in efforts to woo the West, the statement said. French aid to Vietnam, the anti-communist KPNLF said, supported Vietnamese occupation in Cambodia.

Another anti-communist Cambodian group resisting Vietnamese military presence there, the Provisional Animation Committee for Khmer National Union (PACKNU), termed Mr Thach's visit a diplomatic "manoeuvre" aimed at disguising Vietnam's "abominable crimes" in Cambodia by attempting to swing the international community into accepting the Vietnamese-backed regime.

Meets With Ministers

[Excerpts] Paris, 8 Apr (AFP) -- Renewed political dialogue between France and Vietnam was the focus of the first round of talks that Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach held here today with French officials, authoritative French sources said.

The Vietnamese foreign minister is scheduled to meet with French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson tomorrow for political discussions that could clarify Hanoi's aims.

His talks today were with Minister of Cooperation and Development Jean-Pierre Cot. French sources said the Vietnamese minister outlined Vietnam's efforts to boost its ailing economy, as well as how the country anticipates renewed cooperation and political dialogue with France. Mr Nguyen Co Thach also met today with Transport Minister Charles Fiterman, a communist member of the French cabinet.

Saturday and Sunday will constitute the personal part of the minister's Paris visit, and it is believed that he will hold private meetings then with French Communist Party leaders and members of the ruling Socialist Party's leftwing. Both of these groups favor recognition of the Vietnamese-backed Cambodian regime.

Mr Nguyen Co Thach's visit here follows recent talks in Hanoi with French presidential advisor Regis Debray and Minister of Research and Technology Jean-Pierre Chevenement, focusing primarily on economic and technical issues.

His arrival in Paris triggered a new round of harsh criticism by Beijing and exiled members of Cambodia's anti-communist groups, particularly the Khmer People's National Liberation Front (KPNLF) headed by former Premier Son Sann.

(China today repeated recent warnings that any attempts to appease Hanoi with aid in the hope of weakening Soviet-Vietnamese ties was "wishful thinking." The article in the English-language China Daily did not mention any country by name, but was thought to refer to French aid to Hanoi that last year amounted to about 32 million dollars in credits.)

ALGERIA PROTESTS BEN BELLA 'UNTIMELY' STATEMENTS

[Text] Circles close to the Algerian Government have for some time been showing acute irritation at the "untimely" statements being made by former President Ben Bella against the Algiers regime. In particular those circles point to the particularly harsh statements made by the former head of state on French radio and television, especially on the 20th anniversary of the Evian Agreements 19 March.

The view has been expressed that Mr Ben Bella is behaving "like an opposition militant," and "semiofficial" approaches have been made to the French Government -- particularly to Interior Minister Gaston Defferre -- and to the PS to draw the attention of officials to the consequences which the former Algerian president's repeated statements might have. The latter has a diplomatic passport but, Algerian circles point out, he should conform to the "duty to adopt a reserved attitude" which France asks of its foreign guests. Otherwise, they add, French-Algerian relations would be likely to suffer in all spheres.

In addition, in a communique issued Tuesday 30 March following Saturday's incidents at Belfort between supporters and opponents of Mr Ben Bella, "the association of Algerians in Europe" "does not accept responsibility for any incident which might occur between the Algerian emigres and this bitter and ambitious adventurer should he continue his campaign to insult and denigrate Algeria."

POSTPONEMENT OF GIBRALTAR TALKS WELCOMED

[Text] Spanish diplomatic sources have said that the postponement of negotiations on Gibraltar is the most suitable thing for Spain at the present time. These sources have said that the Spanish Government wants serious and thorough negotiations on the basic problems, and present international circumstances do not favor this.

The diplomatic sources consulted referred to the conflict which has arisen in the Malvinas Islands, the change at the top of the British Foreign Office and the difficulty which Francis Pym would have in attending the talks on Gibraltar in Sintra, Portugal, on 20 April. It is precisely on that day that the British fleet will arrive at the Malvinas Islands. The diplomatic sources have said that the present climate is not the most suitable for negotiations and for this reason the two sides have agreed on a postponement of the meeting.

Reactions in La Linea

[Text] Madrid, 8 Apr (AFP) -- Resignation and wrath were the dominant reactions in the Spanish towns of La Linea de Concepcion facing Gibraltar after the postponement today of the Ango-Spanish talks on the future of the British-ruled peninsula. Local figures interviewed from here by telephone mentioned the possibility of violent demonstrations from the population which, they said, had been "constantly foiled" in their hopes of seeing the barrier lifted between their town and neighboring Gibraltar.

London and Madrid jointly announced today that the talks scheduled for April 20 in Sintra, Portugal, had been postponed until June.

"All the ingredients for a revolt are present," said Juan Manuel Ballesta, who leads the movement for reconciliation between La Linea and Gibraltar. "There could be violent reactions," he said. The mayor of La Linea, Socialist Juan Carmona, said news of the postponement was "like a cold shower." The population "deeply regrets the decision, which has had important effects on the life of the town," he said. "The people of La Linea are disappointed, and are skeptical about the barrier being eventually lifted," he added, "but they are used to waiting."

Some locals believed the postponement was a "safe and logical" step. It was unlikely that the talks would yield favorable results while Britain was preoccupied with the Argentine invasion of the Falkland Islands, they said. Others said that Britain and Spain should have launched efforts to solve the problem nonetheless, ignoring the conflict in the South Atlantic, "thousands of miles away."

The 60,000 inhabitants of La Linea -- 40 percent unemployed -- hoped that lifting the barrier would increase trade and allow locals to find jobs in Gibraltar. The barrier also separates large numbers of La Linea inhabitants from their families on Gibraltar, with whom they can only communicate by telephone -- or by megaphone. Many had already agreed to meet with relatives on April 20.

"The postponement of the talks has set a precedent," Mr Ballesta said. "There is no guarantee that they will not be postponed again in the future for some reason or another."

FOREIGN SECRETARY BROADCASTS TO FALKLANDS

LD081826 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1801 GMT 8 Apr 82

[Text] Mr Francis Pym, the new foreign secretary, will tell the Falkland Islanders in a special BBC radio transmission to the islands tonight that Britain will do everything it can to restore the position there as soon as it can. "By that I mean, of course, bring about by peaceful means, if we can, the withdrawal of the Argentine forces who have absolutely no right to be there," the broadcast continues.

"We hope the United Nations will be true to its charter, fully support and insist that that is done and we will do everything we can to achieve the ultimate objective. "In the meantime, I can assure the people of the Falkland Islands that not only in Britain, but in many other countries all round the world, we are constantly thinking of you and we will do our best to come to your aid just as soon as we can and, we hope, by peaceful means."

In the same programme, "Calling Falklands," the archbishop of Canterbury, Dr Robert Runcie, will also send a message to the islanders. "I speak to you now from Canterbury which is a focal point of prayer in our islands and I want to assure you that the prayers of our people are with you in these days of crisis and uncertainty. "You may be far away, but your interests, your safety and your well-being are at the very heart of our thoughts this Eastertide.

"So I, in turn, ask you to do something for us and for all who are working so hard to restroe justice and peace to the people of the Falkland Islands. Pray that in the countries now in dispute, anger and national pride may not cloud wise judgment or deflect us from our chief concern, which must be for your secure future as a peace-loving people. We don't forget you."

The programme is due to be broadcast at 2115 GMT.

Broadcasts Increased

[By David Wallen, PA Staff reporter]

[Excerpts] Messages for broadcast to the Falklands are being phoned into the BBC World Service at the rate of more than 500 a day. Just a few months after its services were cut, the World Service has boosted its broadcasts to the Falklands by an extra two programs a week, and its programs in Spanish to Latin America by an hour a night.

This week, the World Service made extra broadcasts to the Falklands, making a total of three a week, and there was even a special message to Britons in Argentina advising them to get out. Foreign secretary Mr Francis Pym and the archbishop of Canterbury, Dr Runcie, broadcast to the Falklands last night, and Lord Carrington earlier in the week.

Mr Kark [deputy managing director of BBC External Services] said: "Our little programme to the Falklands goes out to them loud and clear. I am sure it is helping the Falklanders feel they are still wanted and loved, and that the British Government is helping them because otherwise they would be cut-off." Ironically, the "Calling the Falklands" broadcast has been mooted for the chop itself in the past.

VISAS NOW REQUIRED FOR ARGENTINE VISITORS

LD091118 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0907 GMT 9 Apr 82

[Excerpt] Argentine nationals wishing to enter the UK will have to have their passports endorsed with a valid UK visa with effect from noon today, the Home Office disclosed today. The immigration rules have been changed following the decision of the Argentine Government to suspended temporarily the Anglo-Argentine visa abolition agreement of 1967. The home secretary will lay a statement of the changes in the rules before Parliament when it reassembles.

GIBRALTAR BORDER OPENING, NEGOTIATIONS DELAYED

[By Andy Webb, PA political staff]

[Excerpt] The planned opening of the border between Spain and Gibraltar has been postponed, the Foreign Office announced in London today. The frontier, which was closed by General Franco in 1969, was due to be opened on April 20 to coincide with the start of talks between Britian and Spain over the disputed territory. A new date has been fixed for June 25. The delay, which has been mutually agreed between the two countries, has been caused by the crisis in the Falkland Islands, another disputed UK colony. It is felt that the newly appointed foreign secretary, Mr Francis Pym, will be devoting his energies in the coming weeks to resolving the conflict with the Argentine in the South Atlantic.

A statement announcing the delay, which has been widely predicted, was issued simultaneously in London and Madrid. Both countries reaffirmed their commitment "to starting negotiations aimed at overcoming all the differences between the two sides over Gibraltar, to reopening direct communication and to developing closer understanding between those directly concerned in the area."

The statement went on to say that both sides were agreed that the talks due to start on April 20 in Sintra, in Portugal, and all other commitments, including reopening the frontier have been rearranged for June 25. Spain and Britain also restated their commitment to the 1980 Lisbon agreement which is the basis for the proposed talks and the lifting of the Spanish blockade on the border.

'LEFTWING' LABOR MP'S TO PROTEST, BOYCOTT REAGAN

[Text] President Reagan's visit to Britain in June, welcomed anew in the Commons by Mrs Thatcher yesterday, will meet "a massive tidal wave of protest," left-wing supporters of the newly-formed "Reagan reception committee" said yesterday. Mr Ernest Roberts, a Bennite and the committee's chairman, said he and others would boycott the President's address on June 8 to members of both houses of Parliament in the Royal Gallery. He said they would hold an alternative meeting in the grand committee room, and London would be flooded by anti-Reagan posters and leaflets.

There would be "mass disciplined pickets" at London Airport, Windsor Castle, and the American Embassy, and a major demonstration in Grosvenor Square, said Mr Roberts, Labour MP for Hackney North and Stroke Newington. Mr Sidney Bidwell, Labour MP for Southhall, said that to welcome President Reagan was to express "a form of warmongering" widely opposed in Britain when warmongering was "on the agenda." He was ensure what role the Reagan administration might be playing in the Falklands crisis, but its global strategy was "poison to the people of Britian."

"The Reagan reception committee" has the support of more than 30 Labour MPs, including Mr Wedgewood Benn, left-wing trade unionist, Mr Kenneth Livingstone, GLC leader, Mr Tariq Ali, Mr Peter Hain, and Mr Vladimir Derer, secretary of the campaign for Labour Party democracy.

DENKTAS SAYS MAKARIOS AGREEMENT MUST BE MODIFIED

[Excerpt] Geneva, 9 Apr (AFP) -- Turkish Cypriot leader Rauf Denktas said here today that "everything is in place for reaching a just, fair and rapid solution" to the Cyprus problem. Mr Denktas was speaking to newsmen after an hour of talks with United Nations Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar, who met earlier this week in Rome with Cypriot President Spiros Kiprianou.

Mr Denktas said he and Mr Perez de Cuellar had "useful and constructive talks on the Cyprus issue...from every angle." The Turkish Cypriot leader noted that progress had been made recently in the intercommunal Cyprus talks. He added, however, that the agreement he had reached with late Cypriot President Archbishop Makarios needed modifications. Mr Denktas said both the Turkish and Greek sides agreed that the talks, held once a week in the Cypriot capital of Nicosia, should be speeded up.

ARCHBISHOP HITS BACK AT CRITICISM BY AKEL

[Excerpts] Archbishop Khrisostomos, the primate of the Cyprus church, yesterday hit back hard at his critics. He claimed that the attacks launched against him by AKEL and the Democratic Party of President Kiprianou are diversionary while division is forced on the island. The archbishop has been a strong opponent of the intercommunal talks, while AKEL and the Democratic Party support their continuation till all possibilities are exhausted.

The open clash between the archbishop and his opponents resulted from his recent decision to convene a holy synod to pardon the former Bishop Yennadhios. With two other bishops, Yennadhios rebelled against Archbishop Makarios' authority before the coup. For that they were reduced to lay status. Critics of the archbishop say the synod was politically motivated. He is accused of allying himself with the right-wing to try and thwart any AKEL-Democratic Party collaboration for the presidential elections due in February.

But the archbishop in his sharp statement hit back saying that the pardon for Bishop Yennadhios and, posthumously, for Bishop Anthimos, was a purely religious affair. It was initiated while Archbishop Makarios was still alive in 1975 in line with the Gospel principle of love and forgiveness. "Unfortunately, the leaders of some parties fail to see these things. They thought they had found an opportunity to politicize the matter and strike at the church, thus amassing personal and party gains for elections," he said.

The archbishop dismisses charges that he has betrayed the memory of Makarios and says that he, alone with the socialist EDEK leader Dr Lissaridhis, dared to demand the return of Archbishop Makarios to the island at a time (August 1974) when others were conveniently tolerating the post-coup regime. "Where were the leaders of AKEL, Democratic Party and PAME then," asks the archbishop. The archbishop contrasts the outcry against the pardon with the silence on the freeing of Sampson from prison to go abroad -- an obvious attack against the Democratic Party. "We are sure that what is being done is intended to cover some dark plots aimed at turning away the attention of the people and at creating conditions for an acceptance of division on the island," he says.

There was a new development when the chairman of the coordinating committee of parties and organizations, Miss Ourania Kokkinou, announced her resignation. This followed a statement from the coordinating committee condemning the church's action in pardoning Bishop Yennadhios. The coordinating committee is boycotted by the socialist EDEK party and the right-wing Rally party and the resignation of Miss Kokkinou leaves only the Democratic Party plus AKEL and its satellite organizations on the committee.

KIPRIANOU, PAPANDREOU MEET, ISSUE STATEMENTS

NC082006 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1730 GMT 8 Apr 82

[Text] President Kiprianou today briefed Greek Prime Minister Papandreou on his contacts in Rome and Frankfurt. The meeting took place at noon at Kastri. The president and Mr Papandreou first held a private meeting, which was followed by a broader conference. That conference was attended by Greek Ambassador in Nicosia Zakharakis; Cyprus Ambassador in Athens Khatzimiltis; the Greek prime minister's diplomatic adviser, Makhairitsas; and officials from both sides. The talks continued later during a working luncheon given by Mr Papandreou. Afterward Mr Papandreou and Mr Kiprianou made statements to newsmen:

[Begin recording] [Papandreou] I am very pleased again to welcome my friend, the president of the Republic of Cyprus, Mr Kiprianou. His presence today is of special importance, of special weight, because, as you know, he is returning from a meeting with the new UN secretary general, Mr Perez de Cuellar, as well as following a meeting in Germany with Mr Willy Brandt, who, as you know, has undertaken an initiative in the Cyprus problem. I ask President Kiprianou to say a few words about his trip.

[Kiprianou] First of all I would also like to express my pleasure at having another opportunity to exchange views on Cyprus developments with Prime Minister Papandreou. Indeed the talks I had in Rome and Germany were substantive and very useful. In Rome I had a very long meeting with the new UN secretary general, Mr Perez de Cuellar, who is an expert on the Cyprus problem and who is very much interested in the Cyprus problem. He considers the Cyprus problem a matter of priority for the United Nations. We had an in-depth discussion on all aspects of the Cyprus problem. We talked about procedures.

The UN secretary general arrived at the conclusion -- I admit I agree with this -- that the dialogue being held in Cyprus must be stepped up and that the basic questions, not the details, be put on the negotiating table so that it may be established at last whether there is any possibility for a change in the so far unacceptable Turkish policy. This would provide us with the opportunity to establish within a short time, I hope, whether there would be a possibility for progress and if not, as we have repeatedly stated, our next step would definitely be to the UN General Assembly with concrete goals, which we are already studying jointly with the Greek Government.

However, along with the holding of the dialogue and the study underway of the possibility for recourse to the UN General Assembly, we will continue this effort to secure the greatest possible international mobility in connection with the Cyprus problem, a thing I am in the pleasant position to say has already begun to be productive. This was clear in all the talk I had.

My talks with Mr Perez de Cuellar were indeed very constructive, and the talk in Rome with Italian President Pertini and Foreign Minister Colombo were also very useful. In Germany we discussed with Mr Brandt the question of his role, which is not a substitute for the UN role or that of the UN secretary general, but on the contrary to reinforce their roles. Mr Brandt particularly will move within the European area. He is already doing so. He considers himself committed to the promotion of a Cyprus solution, or rather to contributing to the promotion of a Cyprus solution.

I firmly believe the internationalization already achieved has been effective, and we will continue this effort because it is solely through international mobilization that the prerequisites for a correct Cyprus solution can be created.

It is not necessary to repeat our goals; our goals are well known. We are handling the question responsibly, depending on developments. It is being realized, and this is clear, that there must be a Cyprus solution with regard to both the external and internal aspects of the problem. But primarily the external aspect refers to the withdrawal of the occupation troops, which constitutes the first basic question, of course having as a goal the complete demilitarization of Cyprus. There is no doubt about this. As for the internal aspect, it is becoming understood that it can and will be a federation, as has been agreed, but that it will be of such a nature that it will secure the unity of the state and the Cypriot people's inalienable rights, including the right of the refugees to return to their ancestral homes.

In general, this time the talks abroad have been very useful. I would like to close my statement by saying that my talks with Prime Minister Papandreou have also been useful, because we have managed, in light of these developments and impressions, to determine our line, which is the one I mentioned, or rather that it is the correct line, and we will continue this line with the belief that better days will dawn for Cyprus and that finally the Cypriot people's struggle will be vindicated. I would like to voice my warm thanks for the alignment of Greece and of Mr Papandreou personally, as well as particularly to extol his contribution to what has been achieved so far.

[Papandreou] I wish to thank the president for his kind words and to assure him that for us, for the Greek people, the question of Cyprus, the freedom of our brothers in Cyprus, is of the highest national priority. I am indeed pleased because the new UN secretary general is looking more eagerly, more actively, into the dialogue so that at last it may be established whether or not this course will lead to a fair Cyprus solution.

I am particularly pleased because Chancellor, former Chancellor, Willy Brandt personally has undertaken the role of catalyst in the European area for the revival of the Cyprus problem and the promotion of a fair solution. And finally I wish to stress the crusade the Greek Government has undertaken to brief and enlighten all peoples and all governments and to emphasize the international aspect of the Cyprus problem, a thing to which we can really contribute from Greece -- our insistence that the international community bears a very heavy responsibility in connection with the invasion and the occupation of 36.3 percent of the territory of the Cyprus Republic by Turkish troops. It is unacceptable -- we wish to stress this -- that we should deal solely with cases of declarations of martial law here and there and to forget this brutal violation of all international regulations. We hope this effort, side by side with the president, with the Government of Cyprus, will be productive. And I believe we have the first signs. [end recording]

CALLER SAYS ARMENIANS SHOT ENVOY, WARNS CANADA

[Excerpts] Athens, 9 Apr (AFP) -- An attack on Kani Gungor, a Turkish commercial envoy in Canada who was critically wounded by gunfire in Ottawa last night, was claimed here today by a telephone caller claiming to represent the Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia.

"Our commando unit named Hagop Barakjian did a military operation in Ottawa, and we take full responsibility for the operation," a caller told AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE's Athens bureau. "We want the Canadian Government not to take any action against our militants, otherwise all Canadian establishments all over the world will be our target," the caller said.

EVREN RETURNS FROM OFFICIAL VISIT TO ROMANIA

[Text] Head of state Kenan Evren returned home today after concluding his official visit to Romania. A joint Turkish-Romanian communique on the visit was also issued today. The special plane carrying the head of state landed at Ankara's Esenboga Airport at 1235. He was received with a ceremony at the airport by National Security Council member and ground forces commander Nurettin Ersin.

The joint communique on Evren's visit to Romania says the two heads of state confirmed their determination to promote the relations of friendship, cooperation and neighborliness between Turkey and Romania within the framework of national independence, sovereignty, equality of rights, noninterference in the internal affairs of both countries and mutual interest and respect. The communique adds that the two heads of state decided to develop relations and cooperation between Turkey and Romania in a manner that will serve the interests of both countries and that will contribute to the strengthening of peace and stability in the Balkans, Europe and the world at large.

The communique also refers to the hope of the two sides for intensification of the existing cooperation in the fields of energy, metallurgy and the [illegible] industry. The communique expresses the satisfaction of the two sides with the economic development program, the agreement for the establishment of ferry services between Turkish and Romanian ports on the Black Sea, which will allow the movement of international highway transport trucks, and the protocol that envisages cooperation between the two countries in the fields of health and medical sciences.

The communique concludes by pointing out the similar views held by the two heads of state on a great number of international issues and to the deep concern expressed by them on problems in various parts of the world. Stressing the importance of cooperation in the Balkans, the two heads of state expressed their agreement on bilateral and multilateral efforts for the transformation of this region into an area of peace and neighborliness. The two heads of state expressed their resolve for the organizing of a meeting of Balkan countries in Bucharest in 1982.

Statement on Talks

[Statement by head of state Kenan Evren at Esenboga Airport on return from Romania 8 April -- recorded]

[Text] During my visit, Honorable Ceausescu and I had the opportunity to review all world issues, especially issues concerning our region. We found that the Middle East developments that cause us concern also cause them concern. We have determined that we share the same views. Moreover, we, like other countries, are disturbed by the fact that European countries are increasingly under difficult conditions because of an atmosphere of insecurity.

We have also determined that we share the same views on the issue of Europe achieving a more secure atmosphere and of easing this escalation and tension.

We reached a full unity of views on further developing and diversifying the economic, industrial and technical cooperation between our two countries based on mutual interests. We have decided on a program to implement what has been agreed upon. According to this program, Turkey and Romania have agreed to cooperate [words indistinct] in the fields of mining, coal and [words indistinct]. Turkey will determine the fields in which cooperation is possible and will then inform Romania. Subsequently Romania will determine the (?factor) of cooperation; thus, cooperation will be realized.

The two countries have also decided to cooperate on prospecting for oil and natural gas. There is the problem of the central Anatolia refinery still under construction. Construction started many years ago, but it has not yet been completed because of, among other reasons, lack of financing for various technical material to be imported from third countries. An agreement was reached on this issue as well. The Romanians said they can supply this technical material. An agreement has been reached to speed up construction of the refinery through use of the material to be supplied by Romania.

The two countries also reached a unity of views on further increasing cooperation in the field of energy by encouraging extensive participation in international tenders. A very beneficial rapprochement has been achieved in the field of steel industry within the framework of the economic cooperation program. The two countries will hold talks to this end and will study opportunities for cooperation in case new projects are envisaged. Opportunities to increase the production of the Eregli and Karabuk iron and steel installations will also be sought.

As you all know, there was the issue of RO-RO and ferry transportation between Turkey and Romania. This issue has at last been concluded and the Turkish and Romanian ministers of transport have signed an agreement according to which RO-RO services will be established between Romania and Trabzon and ferry services, especially at the ports. However, the RO-RO services will soon be actualized. Indeed it may be possible to establish the RO-RO services during 1982. In addition, unity of views has been reached on the issue of seeking new opportunities for cooperation in the transportation of goods between Romania and the Middle East and Turkey and Europe, as well as in the field of telecommunications. These opportunities concerning communications will also be developed.

As you all know, there was the issue of the Romanian ship that sank off Haydarpasa. The ship has still not been removed, and the two sides have agreed to cooperate on the matter. We hope efforts to remove the ship will begin as soon as possible.

In addition, an agreement has been reached on the development of cooperation in the fields of agriculture, tourism, trade and scientific and technical exchanges. Cooperation will be developed in these fields as well. Also the need to increase the volume of trade between the two countries to $700 million by 1985 was expressed. However, Turkish exports to Romania have always been less than its imports. Therefore we will determine what kind of goods we can sell to Romania so we can close this gap. I believe our relations with Romania will develop further in the future.

JANUARY EXPORT FIGURES -- Turkey's exports in January amounted to $446,114,000. The State Statistics Institute announced that, according to preliminary figures, this amount is 8.6 percent more than the corresponding figure for January 1981. This increase was due to metallurgy and industrial exports. Agricultural exports in January dropped by 7.5 percent compared with January 1981. Imports in January 1982 dropped by 22 percent compared with January 1981 and totaled $607,965,000. [Text] [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 6 Apr 82 TA]

REFUGEE SITUATION -- The number of Polish refugees waiting in Austria to be granted political asylum has declined from 30,000 after the proclamation of martial law to less than 24,000 last week. The number of Poles saying in Austria without having applied for political asylum is unknown, according to an Interior Ministry spokesman. According to latest statistics, about 1,000 Poles have returned to their country after the proclamation of martial law. It is to be hoped that by the end of the year only about 10,000 of the Polish refugees now in Austrian camps or private accomodations provided by the Interior Ministry will be left, but there are continually new arrivals of refugees from East bloc countries, lately especially from the CSSR, the ministry spokesman declared. MILITARY SHIPMENTS TO ARGENTINA EMBARGOED

[Text] Rome, 8 Apr (ANSA) -- Italy today followed the lead provided by France, West Germany and Belgium in response to the Argentine seizure of the Falkland Islands and applied an embargo on the shipment of military hardware to the South American nation. Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, announcing the Rome Government decision, referred to the position on the Anglo-Argentine dispute taken by the ten countries of the European Economic Community and the United Nations Security Council resolution passed on Saturday, the day after the Argentine takeover of the South Atlantic islands.

Colombo, in a statement to the cabinet before proposing the embargo, spoke of the dangerous international crisis created by the Argentine move and noted that Italy must again confirm, as a fixed point in the nation's foreign policy, its opposition to the use of force for settling international controversies.

The crisis underway, aggravated by many years of unconclusive negotiations, must be settled through the letter and the spirit of the UN Security Council Resolution 502, which calls for the withdrawal of the Argentine military from the Falklands and a negotiated solution for the dispute, he said.

The foreign minister also disclosed that the problems bound up with economic and financial relations with Argentina are now under study in EEC quarters.

GENSCHER URGES USSR TO AGREE TO REAGAN MEETING

[Text] Bonn, 9 Apr (DPA) -- Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP chairman and foreign minister, has appealed to Moscow to accept U.S. President Ronald Reagan's offer of a meeting with Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev at the UN Special Assembly on disarmament in New York in June. "The Soviet Union now has an opportunity to follow up its words with deeds. Moscow should not reject this peace initiative of President Reagan," Genscher stresses in an article in Saturday edition of the NORDSEEZEITUNG. Moscow is now being tested as to whether it wants direct dialogue or not. The participation of the two leaders in the United States and the Soviet Union in the disarmament conference and their meeting could be a sign of hope. Moscow cannot now disappoint the peoples of the world.

The Soviet Union also has to consider that at the Special Assembly the seriousness of every state's desire to disarm must be proved. "Words are no longer of any use here, only deeds," Genscher stresses. Deeds mean the readiness to be open as regard efforts at arming, they mean balance and above all verifiability, hence the readiness to submit without any reservations to monitoring of the observation of disarmament agreements (on the spot). By contrast with the West, the Soviet Union has refused to do this to date. There is no understandable reason for this refusal. He who has nothing to hide has to agree to verifiability in order to dispel suspicion. "Confidence building is needed, for without trust there is no disarmament," Genscher said.

NAVY UNABLE TO FILL GAPS LEFT BY BRITISH

[By DPA correspondent Friedrich Kuhn]

[Text] Bonn, 11 Apr (DPA) -- Bonn is taking a most skeptical view of the ideas of American Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger on regrouping the fleets of the Atlantic alliance in connection with the Falklands conflict. After London withdrew two thirds of its navy from NATO's joint maritime defense position and sent it to the Falkland Islands, Weinberger suggested that other allies may possibly have to make up for the British in protecting the North Sea and the Mediterranean.

It was learned from informed circles in Bonn over the weekend that the federal navy could not join in even if it wanted to. So far neither the Americans nor NATO have put such wishes to the German Navy. "We cannot do without a single one of our ships to fill the gaps left by the British," a Bundeswehr officer argued. The federal navy is responsible solely for the defense of the Baltic Sea exits and the North Sea. If some of its naval units were to be ordered to leave these areas, then these areas and the coasts of the Federal Republic would be very vulnerable.

German naval circles expressed the hope that the British armada will not be tied up too long off the Falkland area. Otherwise only the American Navy can replace the British capacity. The U.S. Navy would have to move ships from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

It is not believed that the Soviets can exploit the situation of the weakened NATO presence on the Atlantic routes between the United States and Western Europe in the short term if the West-East political situation were to escalate. In that event London would of its own accord order its Falklands fleet back to the traditional defense lines. The early warning periods are adequate.

CHEYSSON CONFIRMS CHILL IN RELATIONS WITH SYRIA

[Text] Paris, 9 Apr (AFP) -- French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson today publicly acknowledged for the first time a deterioration of relations between Syria and France. The minister was answering a question about these relations before the French National Assembly's committee on foreign relations.

Mr Cheysson, according to a commission communique, explained the cooling of these relations in terms of Syrian disapproval of two recent French moves. These were, he said, France's decision to participate in the multinational force that is to police the Sinai following that region's scheduled transfer from Israel to Egypt later this month, and President Francois Mitterrand's recent state visit to Israel.

The question, put forward by commission president Maurice Couve de Murville, a former foreign minister and premier, had suggested that the worsening in the climate between Damascus and Paris could have been a consequence of the assassination of the French ambassador to Lebanon last year.

The ambassador, Louis Delamare, was shot down in a Beirut area under the responsibility of the Syrians in the Arab (?deterrent) force there. Mr Cheysson's reply inferred that the chill between France and Syria was in fact attributable to more recent events.

SOVIETS PROTEST AFGHAN REBEL PRESENCE AT FUNCTION

[Text] Paris, 9 Apr (AFP) -- The Soviet Embassy in Paris protested today to the French Diplomatic Press Association over the presence at an April 1 luncheon of Afghan resistance spokesman Mohammad Ishaq as guest of honor of the association. Embassy adviser Aleksandr Avdeyev conveyed his "regret and astonishment" at a "press parley organised with representatives of Afghan bandits who are killing teachers, intellectuals and doctors, who represent feudal overlords, and are fighting against the Afghan revolution."

Press Association Chairman Georges Broussine dismissed the protest as "unacceptable interference in the activities of the French press."

SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC PARTY FOUNDER REJOINS PS

PM131105 Paris LE MONDE in French 27 Mar 82 p 10

[Text] Social Democratic Party [PSD] Secretary General Eric Hintermann announced his return to the PS Friday, 26 March. Mr Hintermann had been a PS Executive Committee member until the PAU congress in 1975 when he broke away to form the PSD. That movement's aim was to "express a reformist path outside any alliance," since Mr Hintermann was opposed to the left's joint program. Mr Hintermann called on people to vote for Mr Mitterrand in the first round of the 1981 presidential election.

During a press conference Mr Hintermann announced his intention to show his "full solidarity with the left and the PS at a time when the difficulties are starting." In his view, "Social democracy can only be achieved with the Socialists." But that social democracy, he said, "must go further than it has in the North European countries." He therefore announced first the PSD's dissolution, so that as the commune elections approach "nobody can claim to stand for social democracy outside the lists of candidates backed by the PS," second, the creation of a "social democratic association" and finally, his decision to join the PS.

JOSPIN SEES NO 'MASSIVE SHIFT' IN ELECTIONS

[Text] Speaking to Socialist deputies at a meeting in the National Assembly Wednesday, 31 March, Lionel Jospin, PS first secretary and Paris deputy, after reviewing the left's parliamentary record since it came to power, stated that "the trend of May and June 1981 has certainly not been exhausted." "It has not been pushed back or reversed," he said. The analysis of the canton election results, he added, does not reveal "any massive shift from the left to the right." On the other hand, Mr Jospin noted a "very strong" mobilization "by the right and less strong by the left." "We are united and committed to the same fight," he said, with reference to relations between the Socialist Parliamentary Group and the government.

"We have emerged from our euphoria," Mr Jospin added, "just as the right has emerged from the dejection of last spring. We are encountering strong, virulent and sometimes unworthy opposition. That is helping end the intoxication we may have felt and also a certain naivety which we have sometimes shown." Mr Jospin noted that that "intoxication" had sometimes been accompanied by "blustering."

"We know the French right's tendencies," he said. "We must therefore give very serious consideration to the obstacles facing us, but let us take care not to fall into imprecation or verbosity. Let us act, and our actions will speak for us. If there is to be an atmosphere of violence, it must be clearly understood that it can be attributed to the right and not to us. We are not in the Thirties. The right does not have the resources it had in those days. Instead, it is exerting ideological pressure, which is found, for instance, in the debate on a break or austerity."

"We have already said that the debate on a break is a false debate," Mr Jospin added. "We must continue at the same pace. As for austerity, we must of course maintain the major economic balances. That is what we are doing. But the word 'austerity' is often misplaced in the mouths of those who never apply it to themselves." In our political action," the PS first secretary also said, "let us keep a sense of simplicity and commonsense and let us beware of any technocracy." Mr Jospin then listed the main priorities which, in the PS leadership's view, the left must have: "Winning the economic battle; winning the battle for employment; and achieving more practical changes in the eyes of the population (dates of school terms, housing, incomes policy, security, health care, social security)."

"We have many advantages," he said, "particularly the advantage of being faced with a right which is not putting forward any serious alternative."

During the debate which followed, Mr Pierre Joxe, chairman of the Socialist group in the National Assembly, stressed the need to effectively highlight the action taken, to explain what has been done and what has been postponed, altered or abandoned. "We have not made any self-criticism or expressed self-satisfaction," he said at the end of the meeting. Mr Hubert Dubedout (Isere) said for his part that "before thinking of expanding the majority we must first mobilize the one we have."

GOVERNMENT JOINS IN SANCTIONS AGAINST ARGENTINA

[Excerpts] Rome, 12 Apr (ANSA) -- Italy joined its European partners in the collective trade sanctions enacted over the weekend against Argentina in a show of solidarity for Britain, but had "deep regrets" about the tensions building up with the South American state, according to Foreign Ministry sources.

Rome took pains to voice regrets that relations were strained with "a people with whom we share so many close ties and to whose progress we have contributed in every stage" after announcing the news that the EEC had decided to ban all Argentine imports. The Foreign Ministry in Rome urged that negotiations for a fair settlement of the dispute get underway as soon as Argentina ceases its "unacceptable act of force," which made the European Ten rush to the support of the archipelago's British rulers.

CREDIT AGREEMENT WITH BULGARIA NEGOTIATED

[Text] Rome, 11 Apr (ANSA) -- Bulgaria has opened negotiations for a 100 million dollar credit line from Italy for financing a series of industrial projects, the Bulgarian Embassy in Rome disclosed at the weekend in a note on the upcoming Plovdiv Trade Fair, scheduled for May 3 to 9. The 100 million dollars in credits sought from Italy will not be sufficient for getting the projects off the ground, the note explained, but Bulgaria is certain that the credit line will be flanked by "bank credits to bridge the gap."

Italy is one of the principal trading partners of the Eastern European nation with a long series of agreements signed between the Sofia government and the colossal Italian state holding company, IRI, the Ente Nazionale Idrocarburi (ENI), the petrochemical giant Montedison, the Fiat automaker, and Olivetti, business machines and computers. The value of bilateral trade climbed by 17.5 percent last year, as compared to 1980, to reach 390 billion lire (300 million dollars) with Italy showing an 8 million dollar surplus. The Bulgarian gross national product is targeted for a 30-35 percent growth over the next five years.

RED BRIGADES ATTACK POLICE OVER MORO TRIAL

[Text] Rome, 13 Apr (ANSA) -- Three of Italy's crack carabinieri police were recovering from slight injuries in hospital this morning after a Red Brigades attack Monday on the building where 63 members of the urban guerrilla organization go on trial tomorrow on charges related to the kidnapping and slaying of Christian Democrat leader Aldo Moro in 1978. The police agents were hit by salvoes of heavy shot-gun pellets fired from three cars. The attackers covered their flight by hurling two hand-grenades at their pursuers.

The Red Brigades responsibility for the attack was claimed later in an anonymous telephone call to a Roman daily. The woman caller said a full communique would follow. After the attack, the carabinieri guard in the area was strengthened. The trial will be held in a large covered gymnasium specially reinforced for the most important trial against terrorists in Italian history. Moro was kidnapped on March 16, 1978, and his body was left in downtown Rome on May 9.

Of the 63 defendants, nine are still in hiding, eleven have been released on bail, and about ten have agreed to turn state's evidence. The victims of the attack and the police corps received messages of sympathy and solidarity from head-of-state Sandro Pertini and Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini.

BOMB ATTACK ON TRANSFORMER BLACKS OUT BILBAO

[Text] Bilbao, northern Spain, 12 Apr (AFP) -- Part of Bilbao, in the Spanish Basque Country, was blacked out during the night by a bomb attack against an electricity transformer, police said.

The 1.5-kilogram (three pounds) of explosives used in the device was similar to material generally used by the Basque separatist ETA [Basque Fatherland and Liberty] military group, the sources said. No organisation has yet claimed responsibility for the attack.

PRIME MINISTER MAKES OFFICIAL VISIT TO GREECE

[Text] Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo, accompanied by his wife, has left for Athens and Palermo, Italy, for a 2-day official visit to Greece. [sentence as heard] He is also accompanied by Foreign Minister Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca. They are travelling aboard a Spanish Air Force aircraft.

Before departure the prime minister said his talks with President Karamanlis and Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou will deal primarily with the European Community and with Spain's entry into NATO. He added that the change of government in Greece has not affected that country's desire to help Spain join the EEC. This has been gleaned from diplomatic exchanges available to the Spanish Government.

Calvo-Sotelo then said there are no major problems in bilateral relations. He said his trip is also intended to boost trade between the two countries, which at present is tilted slightly in Spain's favor.

This is the sixth trip the prime minister has paid to a European capital, trips aimed at establishing contacts with governments of EEC countries with a view to the negotiations for Spain's entry into NATO and the Common Market.

SHIPS TO EXERCISE PRUDENCE IN FALKLANDS AREA

[Excerpt] Madrid, 12 Apr (AFP) -- The Spanish Government has recommended all Spanish ships that are navigating near the Falkland Islands act with prudence in view of the war zone that has been established by the UK.

Government sources reported today that as of 0400 GMT, the hour in which the maritime restriction area came into force, all Spanish ships navigating in those waters should fly the Spanish flag day and night to avoid any possible incidents.

VIETNAMESE FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVES IN STOCKHOLM

[Text] Stockholm, 12 Apr (AFP) -- Vietnamese Foreign Minster Nguyen Co Thach arrived here today from Paris for a 48-hour visit to Sweden. He was welcomed at the airport by senior Foreign Ministry officials.

He is to meet his counterpart, Ola Ullsten, tomorrow for talks expected to centre on the international situation, particularly in Southeast Asia, and continued Swedish aid to Vietnam. In recent years Stockholm has cut its aid to Vietnam, expressing disapproval of the Vietnamese presence in Kampuchea, which it considers an obstacle to normalising relations. Sweden and Vietnam do not have diplomatic links.

In Paris, Mr Thach had talks with External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson.

LD121756 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1600 GMT 12 Apr 82

[Text] A diplomatic public-relations trip. This is how we can view the visit which the Vietnamese foreign minister, Nguyen Co Thach, will start in Stockholm tomorrow following his visit to France. Aid questions and the problem of Kampuchea will be the two most important topics of discussion during this visit to Sweden. Goeran Skaansberg met the Vietnamese foreign minister on his arrival in Sweden today.

[Begin Nguyen Co Thach recording in English, fading into superimposed Swedish report] We have had 35 years of war in Vietnam and many other difficulties, and we need help from our friends in the reconstruction of the country, but help without political strings. This is stated by the Vietnamese foreign minister, Nguyen Co Thach, who today arrived in Stockholm on an official visit, the first Vietnamese Government-level visit to Sweden for 6 years. The purpose of the visit, Thach says, is to strengthen the links with Sweden and to discuss future Swedish aid to Vietnam. This aid will now decrease slightly from 365 million kronor in this fiscal year to 345 million in the 1982-83 fiscal year. But, Thach says, the scale of the aid is not the most important thing, it is more important that the country providing aid does not set any political conditions. With this, the Vietnamese foreign minister probably refers to the fact that Sweden was almost the only Western country, besides France, which continued to give aid to the Vietnamese despite Vietnam's invasion of the neighboring country of Kampuchea over 3 years ago. This does not mean that Sweden approves the invasion of Kampuchea. It is Sweden's official position that the presence of foreign troops in Kampuchea is a violation of international law.

What, then, will the Vietnamese foreign minister reply to Ola Ullsten when he listens to the Swedish views? I am going to do my best to explain the matter, Nguyen Co Thach says. Unfortunately, there are many misunderstandings on this question, the Vietnamese foreign minister stresses. The problem of Kampuchea is in fact a problem between Indochina and China. No one has the right to interfere in Kampuchea's internal problems, but this is exactly what China does. China wants to force on the people of Kampuchea the Pol Pot regime, and we, Vietnam, are in Kampuchea only because of the threat from China. When that stops we shall leave Kampuchea. [end recording]

HOUSE OF COMMONS RECALLED FOR 14 APRIL SESSION

[Text] The House of Commons is to be recalled from the Easter recess on Wednesday over the Falkland Islands crisis. The recall, just for one day, was agreed today by Mrs Thatcher after a request from opposition leader Mr Michael Foot.

The idea is for the government to give MPs a full statement on today's Downing Street talks between Mrs Thatcher and Mr Alexander Haig, the U.S. secretary of state. The talks have now been going on continuously for more than eight hours, even carrying on during lunch.

During the day, Mr Haig is understood to have had a 30-minute telephone conversation with Senor Nicanor Costa Mendez, the Argentinian foreign minister. Mr Haig, who early today had flown into London from Buenos Aires after ten hours of talks there with the Argentinian Government, came here with "some specific ideas" to avoid a conflict between Britian and the Argentine.

Argentina is said to have offered to withdraw its invasion force from the Falklands if Britain recalls its naval task force and recognizes Argentinian sovereignty.

Defence Secretary Mr John Nott and Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym were also taking part in the Downing Street meeting.

HAIG CITES SOME PROGRESS; DIFFICULTIES REMAIN

LD122040 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2025 GMT 12 Apr 82

[Text] Hopes on an early breakthrough in the Falkland Islands crisis appeared to fade tonight. Emerging from more than 11 hours of talks at Downing Street, U.S. secretary of state, Mr Alexander Haig, said: "We made some progress in these discussions but a number of substantial difficulties remain."

He added: "We will be returning to Buenos Aires this evening as time is slipping away from us." Asked if he was more hopeful of a peaceful settlement of the dispute between Britain and Argentina, he replied: "Not at all; not at all."

Mr Haig said: "There is no truce, hesitation or pause in any of the military preparations, as I understand it, that are under way." He told reporters: "This morning, I said I was bringing some ideas that we had developed in Buenos Aires. Today we had an opportunity to discuss those ideas in detail with the prime minister and with senior cabinet members. We made some progress in these discussions but a number of substantial difficulties remained so I will be returning this evening to Buenos Aires."

Mr Haig refused to discuss details of the negotiations, saying this would "only complicate the process."

Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym, who came to the door of No 10 with Mrs Thatcher to say goodbye to Mr Haig, said: "We have explored very carefully the ideas that Mr Haig brought here. There is no doubt difficulties do still remain. We are both very anxious to resolve this problem by any peaceful means. We are very grateful to Mr Haig for the trouble he has taken and the time he has taken to aid us and the whole world in this endeavour."

Meets Again With Thatcher

[By Ingrid Morris, PA staff reporter]

[Text] American secretary of state, Mr Alexander Haig, today held a third session of talks on the Falklands crisis with the prime minister in Downing Street. Mr Haig, who was orginally due to fly to Argentina in the early hours of the morning, was greeted at the door of Number 10 by Mrs Thatcher. Neither of them would comment on the discussions.

Mr Haig, who began his peace shuttle last Wednesday, has spent almost 40 hours in the air travelling between Washington, Buenos Aires and London. He had been expected to leave for more talks with the Argentinian president, General Leopoldo Galtieri, at 1 am today. The departure time was put back to 9 am and later provisionally revised to 1 pm.

Mr Haig, who spent the night at the Churchill Hotel in central London, is believed to have talked by telephone with President Reagan.

Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym was the first to arrive at Downing Street for today's talks. He walked there from the Foreign Office at 8:45, but declined to comment on the meeting. Mr Haig's convoy of four limousines turned up 25 minutes later.

The prime minister, dressed in black, looked pallid and serious as she greeted the American secretary of state at the door. They posed briefly for photographers before commencing their discussions.

Doubts about Mr Haig's plans for the rest of the day continued, with indications that he may be planning another night in the hotel. His staff showed no indications of checking-out or loading up luggage, and a special press room was set up in the hotel.

Security men remained in the hotel foyer, and several embassy cars remained parked outside. A hotel spokesman said: "We have no details about his programme, but as far as we know there are no indications of a rapid departure."

Mission 'Appears Deadlocked'

[Excerpt] Mr Alexander Haig's Falklands crisis peace shuttle appears deadlocked today after 90 minutes to talks at Number 10 Downing Street.

The U.S. secretary of state was in touch with the Argentinian authorities by phone through the night, and reported back on his discussions to Mrs Thatcher, Defence Secretary Mr John Nott and Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym this morning. He left abruptly 90 minutes after the talks began, and the word from Downing Street later was that fresh problems had arisen in Buenos Aires overnight.

Downing Street had no idea what Mr Haig's next move was to be, though it was being made clear that the Royal Navy task force is still heading for the Falklands. There was no sign of any truce move by Britain. No details of the fresh problems are being given, but it is clear that the peace hopes of yesterday have now evaporated. If anything, the position is now worse than it was last night. After today's meeting, Mrs Thatcher had further talks with the two ministers at the centre of the crisis for about another hour. She is remaining at Downing Street throughout the day.

Britain has still had no word of the missing 27 marines, who are said to be on an Argentinian ship on the high seas. The government has asked the Red Cross to try to find out what has happened to them.

Nor is there any confirmation in London of reports that the Argentinian Fleet has left port for the disputed 200 mile maritime exclusion zone round the Falklands.

Pym Visits Haig at Hotel

LD131428 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1356 GMT 13 Apr 82

[Text] A further round of talks on the Falklands crisis began unexpectedly this afternoon when Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym arrived at U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig's London hotel. Mr Pym, accompanied by Foreign Office officials, arrived at the Churchill Hotel only minutes after Mr Haig's senior aides had been saying that the secretary of state would be flying out of Heathrow Airport at around 4:30 this afternoon.

Mr Pym said only: "I am coming to see Mr Haig before he goes off." It will be the second round of talks the two men have had today following this morning's session at Downing Street. At the hotel there had been rumours and counter rumours about Mr Haig's imminent departure for some time before Mr Pym appeared.

NAVY SHIP CUTS SHORT STAY IN ISRAELI PORT

TA130746 Jerusalem POST in English 13 Apr 82 p 3

[Report by Ya'aqov Friedler]

[Text] Haifa -- The British Navy's oiler-supply ship HMS Olna has been ordered by the British Admiralty to cut short its visit because of the Falkland Islands crisis. The Olna will sail this morning, rather than on Thursday, as scheduled. The Olna arrived last Friday.

The ship's commander, Captain Alan Stanley, yesterday paid a courtesy call on Mayor Arye Gur'el, accompanied by the British air and naval attache, Group Captain Peter Carter. Before its departure, the ship purchased supplies of fresh fruit and vegetables in Haifa.

Captain Stanley said that the Falkland action would be "a new experience" for the navy due to the distances involved "and we'll learn a lot from it." As captain of a supply ship, he envisaged the back-up problem becoming especially difficult "if we stay out there a long time."

On Sunday, a soccer team chosen from among Stanley's men played the Haifa Maccabi youth team and went down 23-1.

PAPANDREOU SPEAKS ON DEFENSE AT MESOLONGION

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou was at Mesolongion today where he attended the celebrations marking the 156th anniversary of the heroic exodus of the Mesolongion defenders. In a brief reply to an address by the Mesolongion mayor, the prime minister said:

[Begin recording] I would like to say at this moment that Mesolongion constitutes for us the foundation stone for exercising our foreign policy, our defense policy, in an era when dark clouds are gathering in skies for mankind -- particularly and especially in our own region, with Cyprus partially under occupation, with the threat from an allied country, Turkey, against the national, inalienable sovereign rights of our country in the Aegean and Thrace. At this hour Mesolongion has a special national significance for us. Its message is that a nation, regardless of how small it may be, when it is really resolved to defend its national territory, its independence, its freedom, can do it. [applause]

Because I am saying these few words today in the presence of foreign friends, I would like to stress that our country is seeking in all ways the promotion and consolidation of peace, peace in the region, peace in the Balkans, peace in Europe, and that this government will proceed with all those initiatives at the Mediterranean, Balkan and European level that would advance the great cause of peace without which all our conquests, political and economic, would be lost in the course of Armageddon. But I would like to tell our friends that we expect of them both understanding and support, and some courage, some courage to stand by the fair struggle of these people who, although having suffered so much, have been done injustices so many times. [applause]

We are seeking support, friendship in all directions. This is an era during which we are counting on our friends. Let them stand by our side, let them remain erect because we are struggling solely for the inalienable rights of these people and of this nation. And we know that first of all and above all, we must depend on our own strength. Today Mesolongion has served -- I believe -- to give fresh impetus to and has strengthened our determination to weather any storm. We believe that with this determination, this tradition and the friendship of our friends abroad, we will win the struggle for the consolidation of peace because peace is our basic goal. Our strength as a nation is the force that serves to turn aside a conflict in our region. [applause]

Mayor of Mesolongion: I wish to thank you with all my heart for this touching day which I myself and all those who have come here will never forget. I thank you from the bottom of my heart. [applause] [end recording]

Speaking to newsmen immediately after and answering a remark that what he said has political significance and constitutes a very important message, the prime minister said: I addressed a message to our foreign friends. This is the time for which Hellenism has been waiting -- and from this support we will determine our course. But we depend on our own strength because only then can there be appreciation, understanding and support. Mr Papandreou concluded: We feel strong because this nation has passion for the cause of freedom and faith in it. For this reason we are optimistic. And this is the message, the optimistic message, that I address from Mesolongion.

PRIME MINISTER SUPPORTS SPAIN'S EEC MEMBERSHIP

[Excerpts] Spanish Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo had a private conversation with Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou at a meeting they held at 1830 today in Maxim Palace.

The Spanish prime minister had arrived at 1120 today on a 2-day official visit to Athens. After their private talk, the two prime ministers made statements to Hellenic Radio Television correspondent Thanos Oikonomopoulos.

[Begin recording -- correspondent] Mr Prime Minister, the Spanish prime minister is here; I believe that the main topics of the talks were the EEC and Spain's future integration. Recently, the Portuguese prime minister also visited Greece and you took a stand on the Portuguese integration. In the case of Spain, what do you have to say following your talks with Mr Calvo-Sotelo?

[Papandreou] Our position on Spain's integration into the EEC is the position I took when, some time ago -- I believe 2 years ago -- I visited Spain. At that time I stated that as long as it is the desire of all the political world, of the democratic political world of Spain -- and also because Spain is facing problems very similar to ours, Spain, Greece, Portugal and southern Italy being the south of Europe -- and as an act of solidarity we will support, without any doubt or delay, Spain's integration despite the fact, of course, that we ourselves are maintaining certain reservations toward the Community, reservations which are presently under discussion by the Community.

Concerning NATO: As you know, we have signed Spain's application to become a member of the Atlantic alliance. Here again I would like to clarify that the question of Greece's relations with the military wing of NATO is also one of the open issues being faced by the country's government. It is clear, however, that as long as the new republic of Spain considers its integration into the Atlantic alliance as something which constitutes an important action, which even affects its internal structure, we cannot but approve it regardlessof any doubts we may have concerning the Atlnatic alliance's usefulness for us. Now is probably not the time to give any details. However, there is no question of principle: We have affixed our signature and we will honor it. [end recording]

60,000 PEOPLE ARRESTED SINCE MARTIAL LAW

[Text] Ankara, 9 Apr (AFP) -- About 60,000 people have been arrested in Turkey since the military coup of September 12, 1980, well-informed sources announced here today. The Martial Law Coordination Office in Ankara had said earlier that 46,721 people were on trial before the military courts which deal with cases of alleged anarchy and terrorism. The office said nearly 44,000 of them were defendants in what are locally known as "clandestine organisation" trials. Over 2,000 are being tried for their union activities, and 660 for their roles in political parties.

The underground groups are mostly either Kurdish separatists or leftists. The rightists, on the other hand, are almost all defendents in the extreme right-wing Nationalist Action Party trial. Most of the Kurdish separatists -- 1,230 of them -- are being tried in the south-eastern city of Diyarbakir. All are accused of "attempting to overthrow the existing constitutional order to establish an independent Marxist-Leninist Kurdish state on Turkish territory," and 184 face the death sentence.

Some 4,000 people -- out of whom 427 face capital punishment -- are charged with belonging to the "Revolutionary Path" (DEV-YOL) group, Turkey's largest leftist underground organisation, in 11 separate trials across Turkey.

INTERIOR MINISTER LANC TO VISIT U.S., CANADA

[Text] On Easter Monday Interior Minister Erwin Lanc will leave for a visit to the United States and afterwards to Canada, to negotiate again on an increased emigration of Polish refugees from Austria. In the six refugee camps, there are still about 23,000 Poles registered. Many of them have had to be put up in hotels and boarding houses because the camps were overcrowded.

In Washington, Lanc will meet with Ambassador Vine, U.S. special deputy for refugee affairs. During a visit to Vienna a few months ago, Vine personally informed himself about the situation of refugees willing to emigrate and those having applied for political asylum, and inspected various refugee camps. Subsequently, Lanc will meet in New York with congressmen and representatives of refugee organizations. On this occasion, Lanc will point out Austria's special position as the most important country of asylum and destination for refugees and persons seeking political asylum, and draw attention to the burdens that have been shouldered by the sacrificing Austrian people for years.

The last leg of the interior minister's trip will be a visit to Canada. There Lanc will also have talks about these same topics with his Canadian counterpart and with the Canadian minister for refugee affairs. In addition, experiences will be exchanged on combating drug trafficking and international terrorism.

In conclusion, the statement appeals to all parties involved to seek a peaceful solution to this conflict in agreement with the generally recognized principles of international law and of the UN Charter.

EAST-WEST INSTITUTE TO SEEK PRIVATE FINANCING

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "Laxenburg Survives Loss of U.S. funds"]

[Text] Vienna -- The International Institute for Applied System Analysis (IIASA) in Laxenburg near Vienna will survive the discontinuation of the financial support by the U.S. Government. The institute is hoping that the loss will be made up in an increase of payments by private American financiers of $300,000 to $1 million. At the same time, however, it will be necessary for the institute to cut its budget by 20 percent as of 1983. At present the new research keypoints are being negotiated at the Laxenburg institute. Last week, U.S. President Reagan wrote a letter to Chancellor Kreisky informing him that the United States would be unable to make further payments to the institute. Since the beginning of this year, the institute has been headed by the Canadian Holling.

PAPER VIEWS NEW ELEMENTS IN EASTER MARCHES

[Commentary signed Mes.: "German Peace Interest"]

[Text] Who will not be reminded by the Easter peace and disarmament demonstration of the Easter marches nearly a quarter of a century ago? And yet, the comparison conveys a wrong picture. At that time the tradition of the Easter marches emerged from the campaign "fight atomic death" which, initiated by scientists, essentially was supported by the SPD as well. Nowadays the governing Social Democratis must also feel like the target of the disarmament demands over Easter.

Another impression: The peace movement of the Eighties, by its repercussions on a small, albeit active, voter potential, has become an influential political force. Granted, according to public opinion polls the vast majority of Germans do not doubt the wisdom of official security policy on the side of the Americans; yet by the same token it seems incontestable that the critical minority meanwhile has an important say in the distribution of parliamentary majorities. To that extent the times since 1958 have drastically changed.

What is striking is the other, the all-German element: Since the peace marchers over here refer to the peace friends rebelling against GDR state propaganda there, it is no longer possible to talk of a communist subverted Easter-march movement steered "from over there" as flatly as it was done at the time. Many people in both German states obviously still speak a common tongue, and if all who believe in the motto, "Create peace without arms," are at odds with the policies of their respective governments, they nevertheless have in common the superior interest whose formulation is being cautiously approached even by those governing in Bonn and East Berlin: that Germany as a whole is the country most severely threatened by nuclear weapons and that, thus, disarmament above all is in Germany's interest.

CHEYSSON CITED ON TOTALITARIANISM, ARMAMENT

[Excerpt] Questioned Wednesday 24 March about French-Soviet relations by the International Union of French-language Journalists and Press, External Relations Minister Cheysson said: "The USSR is close to us geographically. We hope to maintain technological, commercial and economic relations with it. We will maintain them as long as things do not deterioriate," but "we will criticize and condemn the aspects of totalitarian systems that are ideologically and humanly intolerable for a society as close to us as Poland or for other East European countries....

"If, on the other hand, things change for the worse or if the reasoning pursued indicates a preparedness for the worst.... We totally support our allies, the Americans, and say that we cannot allow the excessive armament to continue, especially when this excessive armament involves missiles which threaten Europe and Europe alone, without threatening the United States. We have a very definite and clear-cut, characteristically Atlantic, position."

MAUROY HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE ON ELECTIONS

[Alain Rollat report on press conference given by French Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy on 26 March]

[Text] As presented to the press by Mr Pierre Mauroy on the afternoon of Friday, 26 March, after 4 days of consideration, several meetings with Mr Francois Mitterrand and a cabinet meeting, the first government commentary on the majority's election setback in the canton elections confirmed the extent to which the political game sometimes forces its protagonists into strange contortions.

Indeed, the prime minister strove mainly to play down the importance of the election in order to minimize the failure of the left as a whole whereas when he opened his campaign in Outreau (Pas-de-Calais) on 5 March, he had stressed that these elections would represent "more than an opinion poll" because they constituted "a real test." Had Mr Mauroy forgotten that? No, but he is probably tempted to make up for the opposition triumph. The prime minister's official analysis was limited to four observations:

1 -- The canton election results can be explained more by local situations than by national consideration;

2 -- The redrawing of the canton boundaries carried out by the interior minister "has not made any major change in the traditional over-representation of rural zones," and the proof is that "the PS's advance in the cities is more marked than the national average;"

3 -- Because of the amplifying effect of the majority election system, "the left does not have a majority of seats in several departments in which it nonetheless had the majority of votes in the first round, especially: Aisne, Allier, Ardennes, Aveyron, Charente, Saone-et-Loire, Sarthe, Seine-Maritime, Somme and Essonne;"

4 -- An opposing power center has emerged. According to Mr Mauroy, "The French people are still anxious to balance power. This notion of an opposing power center will be further strengthened by decentralization. The right will therefore benefit from a law and a reform which it fiercely opposed but which we are determined to implement," he added.

Mr Mauroy then explained how he intends to stop the increase in unemployment by the end of the year. Three campaign plans have been drawn up to achieve that:

1 -- The revival of economic activity: "Every effort is being made to make 1982 the year of investment," Mr Mauroy asserted, announcing that he is going to organize "a day of work with employers' representatives." "We will discuss enterprises' costs, local taxation, the financing of UNEDIC and social security." "The government," he stressed, "is determined to make an effort to reduce the amount paid in employment tax."

2 -- The preservation of the major economic balances: "Inflation is slowing down" and "since 24 March the franc has been improving compared with the other currencies, without the Bank of France intervening. At the present exchange rates, our country's competitiveness is guaranteed," Mr Mauroy pointed out.

3 -- Social progress: This should be both "an improvement," "a change in the daily life of millions of French people and should also be one tool in the struggle for employment thanks to the reduction in worktime and a new distribution of labor." The prime minister then assessed the social reforms, stating that "never has such a major set been introduced since the liberation." He pointed out first that the solidarity contracts, whose final application documents have just been published in the Journal Officiel, have "entered the phase of full operation." (The figures he cited, however, seemed very modest.)

Mr Mauroy then analyzed the content of the statutes, again stressing that they had been drawn up "with the participation of all." Before 10 May 1981, he stressed, "government documents allowed no room for negotiation. They were like little green, yellow or even pink pills which had to be swallowed."

Citing the example of retirement at 60 years and hence seeming to answer criticisms from the employers and trade unions, the prime minister reaffirmed that "the government only has decision-making power on the basic system. The state is not intervening in the additional funds. That is what the social partners want." However, a date has been fixed for 15 July and, "if asked, the government will be involved."

Mr Mauroy said that the introduction of retirement at 60, which corresponds to "deep aspiration among the workers" is "a very fine reform."

Stressing the "temporary and onerous" nature of the system of guaranteeing resources, Mr Mauroy expressed his confidence in the negotiations which are going to start between the social partners on additional pensions and are due to start before March 1983.

Henceforth the government is going to strive to consolidate the change in daily life and to show greater firmness in its action. In that connection the sacking of the director of the French Coal Board for failing in his "duty to respect government policy" is revealing. According to Mr Mauroy, the main grievance against Mr Hugon is that he urged other administrators of the energy saving agency to resign, as he had done, in protest at the reduction of its budget.

FRANCO-SOVIET MANNED SPACEFLIGHT STILL ON

[By Serge Berg, AFP science editor]

Hubert Curien, president of the "National Space Study Centre" (CNES) said today: "Our concern is to give to this space event its scientific value, which is an important one, and not make it a political event." "The most likely date for the flight is at the end of next June," he added. Following the proclamation of martial law in Poland last December 13, several hundred French scientists had urged their government to cancel the Franco-Soviet space flight.

French Lieutenant-Colonel Jean-Loup Chretien is scheduled to be launched with two Soviet astronauts in the "Soyuz-T" spacecraft, to join two other Soviet cosmonauts for a week in the Salyut space-laboratory. A second French astronaut, Colonel Patrick Baudy, is standing by in case Lt-Col Chretien is unable to make the trip.

The CNES is expected to give a press conference in the next 10 days to announce further details about the Franco-Soviet flight. Little information has emerged since last October, when a group of French journalists visited the Soviet "City of Stars" near Moscow where the two French astronauts carry out their training. On March 13, the Soviet news agency TASS sent out a brief item stressing that "the Franco-Soviet space team is undergoing pre-flight preparations."

The Paris-based monthly magazine ETUDES SOVIETIQUES reported that Lieutenant-General Andrey Beregovoy, head of the "City of the Stars" training centre, predicted that the joint flight could be made in June, July or August. But the date depends on one important factor: The Soviets have to launch another space-lab as the present "Salyut-6" has been in orbit for three-and-a-half years and its command installations are reportedly "rather tired."

Mr Chrien believes that the launching of "Salyut-7" will be "very soon." But according to some reports the Soviet have run into snags, as reports last October put the launching of "Salyut-7" in February.

DEFENSE MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON MILITARY BUDGET

PM130957 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 21 Mar 82 p 17

[Text] Defense Minister Alberto Oliart told EL PAIS that the government's decision to join the Atlantic alliance has not in the least influenced the major rearmament program envisaged by the government by means of the armed forces budget bill which it recently submitted to the Congress of Deputies for priority processing. "Spain, like any other country, must depend on its own defense strength," Oliart said, adding that "NATO will not provide our national security, though our entry in the alliance could influence subsequent Spanish military budgets."

Question: The majority of criticisms made of the bill stem from the fact that it fails to define the objective and implementation of the plan. What is your opinion about this?

Answer: I believe that it is very clear. The plan's aim is the Spanish armed forces' materiel modernization over the coming 8 years to bring them up the average standard of West European countries.

Question: But there are complaints that it is not known where the 2.3 billion pesetas will be invested.

Answer: The plan intends to continue the same defense policy as we have been pursuing til now, albeit somewhat behind other countries. On the basis of Spanish defense policy, which aims to protect this country's national interests, the plan attempts to renew all branches of the Spanish armed forces -- navy, air force and army. It can also be stated that, as in any other country, specific national defense objectives and plans are secret and are not disclosed to the public. They should be debated by parliament behind closed doors. I believe that, as in all other countries, a minimum degree of discretion must be maintained with regard to defense objectives and programs.

Question: Do you agree with the Spanish Socialist Workers Party's theory for reviewing the implementation of the plan every year?

Answer: Obviously this must be done. Although the bill already envisages a review of the program 4 years after it comes into effect, we agree that the subject should be reviewed every year, which will, of course, happen with the yearly debate on the state budget. The bill already states that the government is obliged to send the Cortes before 1 January 1986 a bill to revise and, if necessary, modify the allocations for the following 4 years and extend the validity of the law until 1994 so as to give continuity to the overall program of investments, modernization and strengthening of the armed forces.

Question: How will this plan strengthen the Spanish arms industry?

Answer: This plan will strengthen and protect not only the Spanish arms industry, but also other kinds of industry, such as optics and electronics. Action to stimulate the arms industry will be stepped up, not only with respect to factories that directly manufacture weapons but also with respect to those that manufacture components incorporated in defense systems, among which priority will be given to the optical, telecommunications and electronics industries.

Question: Of the total investments envisaged, how much will be allocated to the purchase of foreign weapons?

Answer: According to the plan, foreign payments will not account for more than 35 percent of the total, which amounts to 2.3 billion pesetas over 8 years. As can be seen, national industry will benefit, which is our intention.

Question: Is the government's defense policy clearly defined? Is Spain still very dependent on the United States and now on the Atlantic alliance member countries?

Answer: Defense policy is very clear, as I said before, and as for dependence on Washington and on the NATO countries, it is now no greater than before.

CALVO-SOTELO CONCLUDES VISIT TO GREECE

LD131214 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 13 Apr 82

[Excerpts] Spanish Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo has completed his 1-1/2 day official visit to Greece. The main objective of the trip was to seek Greek support for Spanish membership of the Common Market and the Atlantic alliance. According to statements from the Spanish prime minister and foreign minister and the Greek authorities, this objective has been attained. Shortly before the end of his visit the Spanish prime minister had a further meeting with his Greek counterpart, Andreas Papandreou, to tie up matters left from yesterday's meeting.

At a press conference Calvo-Sotelo gave for Spanish journalists just before setting off for Madrid, he said he was satisfied with his brief trip to Athens and the attitude Greece had shown to Spain's joining the EEC and the Atlantic alliance.

Calvo-Sotelo also expressed his admiration for Papandreou, both as a person and a politician, saying that, based on a very good personal understanding, they saw completely eye-to-eye on most general political problems.

Calvo-Sotelo also repeated to the Spanish journalists accompanying him on the trip his feelings that the Mediterranean countries, far from competing over their most typical products, such as olive oil, could obtain preferential treatment for these products within the whole group of community member countries.

BOMBS WRECK JORDAN AIRLINE, EGYPT TOURS OFFICES

[Text] Madrid, 14 Apr (AFP) -- Two bombs early today wrecked the Madrid offices of the Jordanian airline Alia and the Egyptian tourist agency Egypt Tours, police said. The first explosion, at the Alia bureau in the city centre, occurred 30 minutes after midnight, the police said. The blast also caused extensive damage to the nearby offices of Lan Chile, the Chilean national airline.

Soon afterwards an anonymous caller phoned police to warn that another explosion was imminent, though the target was not specified. Within minutes a second bomb went off at the Egypt bureau, also in the city centre. Responsibility for the attacks has not been claimed, police said.

GAS PRODUCTION FORECAST -- Spanish deposits of natural gas will produce around the equivalent of 3.5 million tons of oil by 1985, according to sources in the energy industry. The two main natural gas fields are in Huesca and the Gulf of Cadiz. The former will reach a production level equivalent to 2.8 million tons of oil in 1985, which represents around half the amount of the long-term gas import contracts with Algeria and Libya. By using the Huesca and Gulf of Cadiz deposits to supply Spanish industry, as is envisaged in the national energy plan, it will be possible to reduce the import of oil products and reduce the current very high dependence on oil. MITTERRAND MAKES STOPOVER, MEETS KOIVISTO

LD132040 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1900 GMT 13 Apr 82

[Excerpts] The presidents of France and Finland held talks this evening for about an hour at Helsinki-Vantaa Airport. The talks dealt with the international situation and trade between Finland and France. French President Francois Mitterrand extended an invitation to President Mauno Koivisto to visit France.

When President Mitterrand stepped before the representatives of the press to make a statement on his talks with President Koivisto, he was asked for his view on the concept of Finlandization. President Mitterrand noted the derogatory meaning of the word and said that he takes a negative stand toward such use of the term. He stressed the military and civic courage that Finland has demonstrated in its history. All in all, in Mitterrand's view, the concept of Finlandization is unjust to the Finns. Mitterrand also recalled the contribution made by Helsinki to international politics. He spoke of the necessity for negotiations in the present world situation, mentioning in particular the missile talks in progress in Geneva. According to Mitterrand, he and President Koivisto also discussed the military balance in the world during their talks.

The talks lasted less than an hour, but it seems that they covered many issues. Mitterrand said that he listened with great interest to President Koivisto's views, stressing that he was interested to hear his opinions. Mitterrand said that he would like to return again to Finland soon.

NORWAY

FIRST F-16 SQUADRON ENTERS SERVICE 1 APR

PM131109 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 30 Mar 82 p 11

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA report: "First Norwegian F-16 Squadron Soon Operational"]

[Text] The first Norwegian pursuit squadron of F-16's will become operational on 1 April. From that date 331 Squadron at Bodi Airbase will be ready for action with the new ultra modern pursuit aircraft, North Norway Air Force Commander Maj Gen Alf Granviken told STAVANGER AFTENBLAD.

The F-16's are a replacement for the approximately 20-year-old Lockheed F-104G's and Canadair CF-104G Starfighters in the air force. Some of these aircraft have been taken over by other NATO nations.

It is now 2 years since the first F-16 was delivered to the Norwegian Air Force. Since then delivery pilots and technical pesonnel have acquainted themselves with the aircraft. All experiments and tests carried out have shown that the aircraft has come up to all expectations. In all, Norway has bought 72 General Dynamics F-16's.

Major General Granviken said that 334 Squadron in Rygge will become the next operational air force unit with F-16's during the first half of 1983. Pilots and technical personnel from the squadron are already undergoing training at the airbase.

BRITONS IN ARGENTINA SEND APPEAL TO THATCHER

[Kenneth Clarke dispatch: "Pampas Britons Appeal to No 10:'Don't Use Force'"]

[Text] Buenos Aires -- Mrs Thatcher has been sent a telegram by the association of British and British descended farmers in Argentina in an attempt to persuade her not to order a British attack on Argentinian occupation forces. The telegram carried a warning that any attempt to retake the Falkland Islands by force would "create damage out of all proportion to the value of the islands."

The farmers are mostly descended from Britons who settled in Argentina during the mid-19th century. Many of the farmers have huge estancias or ranches in the pampas. They form an economically important section of the 17,000-strong British community in Argentina. The text of their telegram reads:

"We Britons and sons of Britons farming in Argentina wish to inform her majesty's government that for years and in some cases generations we have lived and worked happily under Argentine Governments of differing political persuasions.

"We have led our traditional British way of life without any hindrance and our experience has led us to believe that the inhabitants of the Falkland Islands have nothing to lose and much to gain by coming under Argentine sovereignty. We consider that their opposition to Argentine rule is based on ignorance of the true conditions of life in Argentina and on misinformation supplied by the Falkland Islands Company.

"We believe that an attempt to regain the islands by force would cause an irrevocable end to the islanders' way of life and offer no prospect for a secure and peaceful future. It would create damage out of all proportion to the value of the islands not only in Argentina but in the whole of Latin America.

"From the British community in Argentina, 2,800 men volunteered and were accepted for service by Britain in the 1939-45 war and 204 died on Britain's behalf. We, their survivors and descendants, urge her majesty's government to abstain from the use of force and negotiate the necessary conditions for the islanders to continue working in peace and tranquillity as indeed 17,000 British subjects already do in Argentina."

One rancher, Mr Gaston Perkins, is interviewed in the current edition of a Buenos Aires magazine which described him as "the English gaucho." Mr Perkins told the magazine that after four generations in Argentina he was proud of his British background but fully supported the government in Buenos Aires over the Falkland Islands dispute.

Falklands Office Raps Appeals

[Ian Glover-James report: "Islanders 'Absolutely Resolute'"]

[Text] Attempts by Anglo-Argentines to persuade the 1,800 Falkland Islanders that life under the Buenos Aires government is acceptable are doomed to failure, according to the islanders' London representatives.

"We have evidence and are convinced that by far the greatest majority of islanders are absolutely resolute and are prepared to risk military action to free the islands," said Air Cmdre Brian Frow, director general of the Falkland Islands Office in London.

The Falkland Islanders and British Government have been approached by British descendants in Argentina with a view to easing their fears about Argentine control of the islands. Last week, the British Community Council, representing the 100,000-strong Anglo-Argentine community, sent a telegram to Mrs Thatcher urging her to seek a peaceful solu ion to the Falklands crisis.

The Buenos Aires government have recognised the propaganda value of the Anglo-Argentine population. An Anglo-Argentine officer is among the senior military figures in charge of occupation forces on the islands. The government is also considering a request from Anglo-Argentine farmers to visit the Falklands and persuade the islanders about the Argentine way of life.

The Anglo-Argentine community has felt vulnerable in the Falklands crisis and almost certainly feels itself under pressure to make a gesture of support to its adopted country.

NAVY POSSIBLY ASSEMBLING MINESWEEPER SQUADRON

[By Robert Hotchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] The Royal Navy may be assembling a squadron of minesweepers to counter any threat to the Falklands task force. Four Hull-based freezer trawlers are being requisitioned as minesweepers in a move being seen as an afterthought by naval planners.

The possibility of sending navy anti-mine ships, including the 30 million pound "Hunt" class plastic-hulled vessels, is not being excluded, although the Ministry of Defence is officially adopting its usual course of not commenting on operational deployments. Previously, the ministry had poured cold water on reports that the Argentinians were laying mines off their coasts and around the Falklands.

A ministry spokesman said the trawlers were needed as "a precaution to complement Royal Navy capability." The trawlers "are suited to make a long journey" and "have very good sea-keeping qualities," said the spokesman. "Our own mine-counter measure vessels are more suitable to their NATO role, which is to operate in our own waters."

Large areas of the seas around the Falklands are more than 600 ft deep -- the maximum practicable for using mines because the volume of water suppresses the explosive blast.

The Hague convention laid down that nations should declare minefields by area but not density of mines. It is understood that the British Government has not been told of any such declaration.

The four trawlers, owned by J. Marr of Hull, bring the total of requisitioned civilian ships for the naval task force to 11. The others are: Canberra -- troopship; MV Elk, container ship for transport of armoured vehicles; Uganda -- hospital ship; Stena Seaspread -- supply ship; BP tankers Tamar, Tay and Esk -- fuel tankers.

The Stena Seaspread, 9,000 tons and owned by Stena Atlantic of Aberdeen, was called up today and is described as "rugged" and ideal for the South Atlantic. She will be manned by a civilian crew but with some Royal Navy personnel for her new role as naval support ship.

Commandeered Ship Returns

[Text] Naples, 13 Apr (AFP) -- It has been learned from a reliable source that the British cruise ship Uganda, which has been commandeered by Great Britain in the wake of the crisis over the Falkland Islands, today arrived in Naples and put ashore all its passengers.

The Uganda arrived in Naples from Alexandria on a cruise through the Mediterranean. It was carrying 994 British secondary students who will have to return to Great Britain by plane.

The Uganda, a 30-year-old, 17,000 ton ship, will sail from the port of Naples tonight bound for Great Britain, where it will be equipped to serve as a hospital ship for the Royal Navy's task force. The 236 crew members were surprised with the news, while the students expressed their disappointment at having to interrupt the cruise.

'Second Wave' Takes Shape

[Text] The navy is to recommission its second assault ship, HMS Intrepid, and is chartering a huge Cunard container vessel to carry Harrier jump jets as a "second wave" to the task force. The Defence Ministry said today that the Cunard roll-on, roll-off container ship Atlantic Conveyor (18,146 tons) would be chartered to carry Harrier jump jets to the South Atlantic. This will double the number of Harriers in the South Atlantic to a total of about 40. Some will be from No 1 Squadron based at Wittering, Cambs. The RAF pilots are now undergoing deck training at the Royal Navy air station at Yeovilton, Somerset.

"We are taking additional measures to provide extended capability for the task force over an extended period," said a Ministry of Defence spokesman. "We are recommissioning Intrepid, the second assault ship, for operational service. This will add significantly to the amphibious capability of our task force."

It is not known when Intrepid, now at Portsmouth, will be ready for sea, but it is said to be "in a very short time." Her sister ship Fearless, with 1,000 marines on board, is already with the task force.

USSR-ARGENTINE 'UNHOLY ALLIANCE' ECONOMIC ONLY

[John Miller report: "Unholy Alliance Between Junta and Kremlin"]

[Excerpt] Increasing Soviet attacks on Britain over her handling of the Falklands crisis are designed to camouflage an unholy alliance between the Kremlin and the right-wing military junta in Buenos Aires.

It appears to be based on Soviet economic self-interest, Russia relying on Argentine exports of food to make good her own agricultural inadequacies. But it is doubted that Moscow's support would go so far as passing to Argentina information about Royal Naval movements gained by Soviet spy satellites as some reports have claimed.

"It is not the sort of thing of the Russians would do in these circumstances," a Whitehall source said yesterday. "In any case it might not be technically possible. But there is no doubt the Russians are doing their best to keep an eye on the fleet and plot its progress."

Moscow was showing no signs yesterday of wanting to become involved in the diplomatic manoeuvering over the Falklands, but it stepped up its anti-British pro-Argentine propaganda campaign.

The Greek reply, which was sent yesterday to Greek ambassador in Ankara, G. Papoulias, so that he may give it to the Turkish Government, notes that:

There is no Turkish minority in Western Thrace -- as Ankara claims -- but equal Greek citizens. This Muslim minority is protected not only by international treaties but also by the Greek constitution itself and the laws. The case of the properties in Western Thrace is pending before Greek justice and concerns the Muslim and Christian inhabitants of a village.

GOVERNMENT VIEWS POSSIBLE ISRAELI LEBANON ATTACK

He further said: It is clear that such an action, if it takes place, would cause incalculable damage in human victims and catastrophies, and would constitute a direct danger of a more general clash in the region and a threat to international peace. Greece believes, the government spokesman concluded, that taking as a yardstick the dangers and the consequences of any such military action, this would be opposed by the international community and the peace-loving forces of humanity and will be avoided.

PORTUGAL

SOARES AIRS VIEWS ON REVISING CONSTITUTION

[Excerpt] Socialist Party [PS] Secretary General Mario Soares stated on television yesterday evening, during a debate organized by the Portuguese Press Club, that the Socialists "are not prisoners of the revision of the constitution." The political leader was referring to the possibility of the dissolution of parliament, which, in his opinion, should not be subordinate to the reformulation of the constitution. However, Soares emphasized that the Socialists are prepared "to make the constitution more flexible," while stressing that "the word socialism is not negotiable" in the new text.

The PS leader, who said that there is "a major leadership crisis in the Democratic Alliance," reiterated his criticisms of the government and, as regards the revision of the constitution, emphasized the existence of several areas of consensus and pointed out others where difficulties persist; specifically, the balance among the state bodies and the composition of the Council of the Republic, the higher Council of National Defense and the Constitutional Court.

Soares, who denied that the current constitution is an obstruction to our economic development and an obstacle to joining the EEC, also declared himself opposed to bringing forward the local elections, emphasizing later, when confronted with his party's internal problems, that those which "matter most at this moment are not those of the PS but those of the Democratic Alliance." Asserting that the "PS is always prepared to be the government," Soares stressed that "at the parliamentary level we have gone as far as we can go" in opposing the current government, adding that "much of the government's weakening" originated in the Socialist motion of censure.

As for relations with the president of the republic, the Socialist leader emphasized the existence of "an institutional dialogue," stressing that the stances adopted demolish "the PCP's attacks as regards agreements with the Democratic Alliance" on the revision of the constitution. He also denied the existence of any pact between the PS "and any politicomilitary power represented by the president of the republic," hinted at by Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa.

The PS secretary general upheld the viewpoint that citizens should vote for blueprints and not for people.

VISA POLICY FOR POLES MADE MORE RESTRICTIVE

[Special DIE PRESSE report by Peter Martos]

[Text] Vienna -- Before the end of April the first wave of Poles will probably apply for permission to emigrate to the West: As has been reported, Warsaw has offered persons who were interned the opportunity to leave the country. While Austrian authorities for the time being are undecided as to how to treat those persons, the issuance of visas is being handled restrictively. There are hardly any persons requesting political asylum, and those who come to the Austrian Embassy in Warsaw with a passport have to show a written guarantee from an Austrian citizen, or possess foreign currency funds. Vienna wants to avoid another increase in the number of Poles requesting political asylum in Austria, for many Polish tourists in the West decide to stay there.

The Austrian Embassy in Warsaw is pursuing a strongly restrictive visa policy. The basic condition for obtaining a visa is naturally the presentation of a passport, which automatically presupposes consent by the Polish authorities. Poles who want to visit Austria as tourists -- according to Interior Ministry spokesman Erich Sellner -- have to prove that their subsistence in Austria is guaranteed. "The statement by an Austrian that Mr X is an acquaintance of his is not sufficient," he says, but adds that a "guarantee" by close relatives is accepted.

Only in exceptional cases are Austrian visas granted to applicants without Austrian sponsors. At present, an exception is made in the case of elderly married couples who leave behind immovables and prove possession of $30 per day per person. Only members of travel groups, for whom Polish authorities request visas, have nothing to worry about.

Even stricter standards apply to Polish citizens who are living in a Western country. The country concerned has to virtually guarantee that the persons concerned will be able to return after their visit to Austria. Thus the Interior Ministry -- according to Sellner -- wants to preclude "quasi-deportations."

Like the missions of other countries, the Austrian Embassy in Warsaw expects a "moderate rush" in April of former internment camp inmates who have been offered the chance to emigrate by the military government. According to official Polish sources, the total of these persons is nearly 2,000, although it is not known how many of them are ready to accept the offer -- which was given added emphasis through pressure. The AFP news agency recently reported that to date less than two dozen released persons have applied for a passport.

On the other hand, about 1,000 Poles have declared their intention to emigrate at various embassies [in Warsaw] without, however, submitting immigration applications. They inquired at first about the job opportunities in their potential new homelands. All of them declared that they were exposed to direct or indirect pressures by Polish authorities; many have lost their jobs and see no chances of finding other employment.

As far as emigration visas are concerned for applicants who might let themselves be deported, Vienna's policy is not yet clear. Generally, visa applicants have to state to the Warsaw Embassy the reason for the trip, as well as to explain specifically what they are afraid of. According to the Interior Ministry, it will be necessary to "decide individually in every case whether or not the statement that one is unemployed is enough." For the time being, while the former internees are not yet coming to the embassy in large numbers, this can only rarely be taken into consideration, it was stated.

Compulsory Policy Extended

[Excerpts] Vice Chancellor Sinowatz declared after yesterday's Council of Ministers session that he hoped that Chancellor Kreisky would run again in the next Nationalrat elections. Asked about the compulsory entry visas for Poles, the vice chancellor declared that this regulation -- originally scheduled to expire in April -- would be maintained for the time being. He said it had been extended because nothing had basically changed: Anyone who felt threatened should continue to have the opportunity to emigrate from Poland.

ARGENTINE BOYCOTT REJECTED BY GOVERNMENT

[Herbert Hutar report]

[Excerpt] Let us turn to Austrian-Argentinian economic relations: The Federal Chamber of Commerce is not interested in straining relations with Buenos Aires, because after constant double-digit -- in terms of percentage -- growth rates, Austria was able last year to export nearly 1 billion schillings worth of goods to Argentina. Thus this country has become Austria's most important export market in South America. Moreover, it is hoped that the Argentines will turn more to Austria should the boycott of the European Community prove effective.

KREISKY WILL DISCUSS ECONOMIC POLICY IN FRG

[Text] Vienna (AZ) -- Next week Chancellor Kreisky will face two important tasks in the FRG: At the Hannover Economic Fair Kreisky will give a speech on the current state of East-West relations, and at the SPD party congress in Munich he will speak on economic world problems from a social-democratic point of view.

"On this occasion I will certainly not fail to mention that I do not agree with everything the FRG Government is doing as regards economic policy," the chancellor declared on Wednesday in a telephone conversation with ARBEITER-ZEITUNG from Mallorca, where he is vacationing and will stay until the weekend. In Munich, Kreisky also wants to discuss problems connected with the construction of the Rhine-Main-Danube canal with Bavarian Minister-President Franz Josef Strauss.

CONSTRUCTION MINISTER REPORTS ON USSR VISIT

[Excerpts] The Austrian Council of Ministers held its 128th session under the chairmanship of Vice Chancellor Sinowatz at the Vienna Chancellery yesterday. Minister for Construction and Technology Sekanina reported on his visit to the USSR 15-19 March. According to his report, it was agreed within the framework of this visit to refer the proposals about the opening of scientific-technical cooperation in the construction and building materials sectors, which were made during the various talks, to the corresponding sections of the Austrian-Soviet joint commission for economic and scientific-technical cooperation. The report was approved by the Council of Ministers.

APEL SEEKS CHANGES IN CIVILIAN NATIONAL SERVICE

[Text] Bonn, 14 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel has called for a significant extension and change in civilian national service. In an interview with Michael Rolland, chairman of the Young Press of North Rhein-Westphalia, Apel said that civilian national service should last at least 20 months. Apel made it clear that he thinks the conscientious objectors' test is a farce and has to be abolished. The coalition parliamentary groups want civilian national service to be increased to 19 months. They believe a written statement on conscientious objection should suffice.

In Apel's view, there are two alternatives to maintaining the 500,000 strength of the Federal Army within the NATO framework: increasing the length of military service and opening certain army areas to female volunteers. This is an alternative worthy of serious discussion. The FRG is the only NATO country which has not yet taken this course. All the same, he did not think that a majority are presently in favor of opening the Federal Army to women.

TELEGRAPHIC, POSTAL LINKS TO POLAND RESTORED

[Text] Bonn, 15 Apr (DPA) -- The Federal Post and Telecommunications Ministry has announced that full telegraphic communications between the Federal Republic and Poland have resumed today. Telegraphic traffic and other postal services between the two countries had ceased with imposition of martial law on 13 December.

Parcels traffic is in full swing, following Bundestag approval in February of free postage for gift parcels. Telegrams from the Federal Republic have, in fact, been accepted by the Polish post office since 19 January, but there has been no guarantee that they have been delivered.

SCHMIDT WILL PARTICIPATE IN UN SPECIAL SESSION

[Text] Bonn, 14 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is to take part in the special UN General Assembly session on disarmament in New York in June. This was announced to newsmen by Government Spokesman Lothar Ruehl today following the cabinet meeting. According to Ruehl, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, who chaired the meeting in the chancellor's absence, stressed the great importance of the special General Assembly session as an opportunity for all states to prove their readiness for real and effective disarmament.

Genscher also reiterated the hope that the Soviet Union will use this opportunity for a talk between President Reagan and Leonid Brezhnev in accordance with Reagan's offer. The Federal Government attaches great importance to such a talk for the safeguarding of peace and for progress on the way to mutual disarmament through negotiations.

HAIG MISSION IN FALKLANDS DISPUTE SUPPORTED

[Text] Bonn, 14 Apr (DPA) -- The Federal Government today "emphatically" supported U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig's efforts to mediate in the Argentine-British conflict over the Falkland Islands. After a cabinet meeting, Government Spokesman Ruehl told newsmen that the Federal Government hopes the American efforts will help prevent armed conflict and smooth the path to a political solution via negotiations.

The Federal Government has stressed to both governments its considerable interest in success for the efforts by the American secretary of state.

Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, who chaired the cabinet meeting in place of the chancellor, reaffirmed the FRG's stance in talks with the British and Argentine ambassadors on Tuesday and supported the demands by the UN Security Council for a cessation of hostilities, the withdrawal of the Argentine troops and a diplomatic solution. Ruehl noted that the Federal Government, together with the EEC partners, has decided on various economic measures against Argentina to lend weight to these demands.

Ruehl stressed that the Federal Government also saw this conflict in the light of its relations with Argentina and the other South American countries, in whose consolidation and progress it continues to be very interested. This was also apparent in the fact that Ruehl referred specifically to the "Falkland/Malvinas islands," thus also including the Argentine name. He explained that this double name is the official title of the islands at the United Nations.

GENSCHER SIGNS MILITARY AGREEMENT WITH U.S.

[Text] Berlin, 15 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Genscher and U.S. Ambassador to Bonn Arthur Burns signed an agreement today at the Foreign Office on German support for American reinforcements in case of crisis or war. The agreement facilitates a more rapid calling up of American reserves and increases the deterrent force of the NATO alliance in the conventional field.

Foreign Minister Genscher stressed that with this agreement the Federal Republic and the United States are giving a signal for the joint security and alliance policy. The agreement documents the Federal Republic's special solidarity with its American partner.

Should the need for defense arise, some 93,000 Bundeswehr reservists will be made available to the U.S. reinforcements as support troops. Great military and political importance is attached in Bonn to the "wartime host nation support" concept, which means support for U.S. troops by the host nation in the event of war.

The German share of the investment in this program, which is to be implemented by 1987, is estimated at DM550 million from a total cost of some DM1.2 billion. It is planned to start implementing the support concept in 1983.

According to Genscher, the new agreement strengthens the deterrent in Central Europe, which is a decisive point for the alliance. He said that this is in both German and alliance interests. "With it we are helping to guarantee the balance."

Genscher pointed out that in conventional arms the Warsaw Pact forces have superiority over NATO. A reliable deterrent has to take this conventional superiority of the other side into account.

Genscher expressly stressed that NATO's proven strategy of flexible response to a possible attack is to merge the conventional and the nuclear capabilities with one another in order to exclude aggression at any level as well as political pressure. Like deterrence and defense, arms control and disarmament are an integral part of the alliance's security policy.

Genscher said that nothing could replace the presence of U.S. forces in Europe as a guarantee of joint security. "But this agreement is also an expression of our continuing readiness for a balanced sharing of burdens and work in the alliance." German-American friendship is firmly rooted in the consciousness of the overwhelming majority of the German population.

German support will extend, among other things, to safeguarding U.S. Air Force and Army installations, to assistance with transport and supplies and to support for U.S. Air Force units situated on joint bases. The weapons and military equipment for U.S. troops are to be stored in depots in the Federal Republic in advance, so that in the event of an alarm only personnel need to be brought in rapidly by air across the Atlantic.

The United States intends, in the event of a crisis, to strengthen the 4 divisions stationed in the Federal Republic by an additional 6 armored, mechanized and infantry divisions within 10 days. In order to be able to use the Bundeswehr support units in the event of a crisis, from 1983 onward so-called "equipment units" are to be set up, for which the German side will require 1,200 military and 600 civilian job slots. These personnel will look after the stored American weapons and supplies.

For some considerable time now the United States has been storing heavy weapons and equipment for at least two divisions on the territory of the Federal Republic, which is used by American soldiers flown in across the Atlantic for the autumn maneuvers.

PAPER VIEWS AMBASSADOR BURNS' CRITICISM OF BONN

[Wilfried Hertz-Eichenrode editorial: "A Friend's Word"]

The essence of his criticism of the most important U.S. ally on the European continent was Burns' statement that the Federal Republic was a country "which has not yet been convinced of the fact that it bears global responsibility." The diplomat's formulation, which certainly was carefully considered, contains two-sided criticism: Criticism of Washington because it has not duly emphasized and convinced the Germans of their real role in world politics, and criticism of Bonn because it shirks tasks which, strictly speaking, are duties -- at least from the American viewpoint.

According to Burns, the Americans miss the Germans' readiness to support the United States to the best of their ability in carrying out its ambitious task as the leading power not only of the Atlantic alliance but also of the Western world. They do not expect the Federal Republic to pose as a big power, but being the protective power of Berlin and of the Germans in the free part of our country, they believe they have a right to demand that Bonn commit itself together with America, also outside NATO's sphere, above all with its financial and economic capacity. Washington is particularly disappointed when the Germans try to take a "more differentiated" stance in the confrontation with the Soviet Union than the Americans find necessary.

Naturally, concrete situations require realistic answers -- also from Bonn. In individual cases differences frequently emerge. But Burns has exposed the roots of a process which may end in an estrangement between Bonn and Washington. There is nothing we can afford less than that.

POPEREN SAYS PS MUST 'WIN POPULAR COOPERATION'

[Unattributed report: "Our Initiatives Should Be Guided By a Concern To Isolate the Privileged Minority"]

[Excerpts] The PS Executive Committee met in Paris on Saturday, 3 April. Two weeks after the canton election, in his progress report presented at the start of the meeting, Mr Jean Poperen, national secretary for coordination and elections, gave the PS leadership's analysis of the consequences of the 14 and 21 March election results.

Mr Poperen noted that "the government is inevitably identified with the party" and that therefore "the PS' victories, in other words its success with the public, depend on the government's success." According to him "resistance to change is growing stronger" because the left is keeping its promises and the "violence" of its adversaries can be explained "by the first signs of (its) success."

Faced with this "formidable resistance to change by conservative forces," the socialists, Mr Poperen thinks, should perhaps "issue fewer warnings and take more action." "How, in a democratic regime, can the majority be refused the means of explaining its policy?" he asked. "It is not enough to be in government to really have power." The PS number two remarked.... "We must accept that fact calmly but treat it seriously and gradually draw all the practical conclusions from it."

"Our initiatives," Mr Poperen stated, "must be guided by a concern to isolate the privileged minority instead of helping to make people increasingly anxious about it; in other words we must consolidate and expand the class front instead of taking the risk of helping to narrow or split it by some extreme or imprudent action." The left, he said, needs an atmosphere "of calm and peace," like the "social peace" which has been maintained for 9 months. However, "that calm would soon change completely if it was the sign of indifference." In those circumstances "winning popular cooperation is the PS' main task for this year."

Since their victories in May and June 1981, Mr Poperen noted, the socialists have appeared to be "too new, too scattered and too nice." They have "learned or relearned realism."

However Realism certainly does not mean backing down from the objectives which have been set; but it makes it necessary to list and plan those objectives more effectively first. Realism also means calmly accepting this fundamental fact: The adversary never drops his guard even when he seems to. Let's not be naive. Political authority is an attribute of democracy and this country, which wants to be governed, knows that well...."

After stressing the danger of a "gap" appearing between the government and the people, Mr Poperen pointed to the danger of the left's "losing on details." From that viewpoint the drafting of the measures announced on the 39-hour week, the new retirement system, and the question of combining a job with a pension did not strike him as "sufficiently thorough." In addition, Mr Poperen reaffirmed that "it is impossible to make the reduction in the working week conditional on a reduction in salary," and that it would be better to "space out" the reduction in gasoline prices and the increase in other fuel prices "have clearly produced more discontent than satifaction."

The PS number two thinks that, in view of trade union divisions and the "diversity of the class front," the socialists should decide which demands have most united support and, as far as the employers are concerned, decide "what concessions we want to obtain immediately" from them. He also noted the "malaise" which may have been produced in popular circles by the disparity between changes in everyday life, which have not always been placed at the forefront, and the rate of change in the sphere of general principles, which may have struck people as too rapid.

DEFENSE MINISTER COMMENTS ON ARMS SALES POLICY

[Unattributed report: "Mr Hernu: France Can Be the Nonaligned Countries' Leader in the Arms Sales Sphere"]

[Excerpt] Saint-Etienne -- "France, which is a loyal Atlantic ally, can, as regards technical assistance in the arms sphere, be the leader of the nonaligned countries, of the countries which have a right to security, without necessarily joining in the game of the two military blocs." That was what Defense Minister Charles Hernu said during his visit to the Creusot-Loire factories in Saint-Chamond (Loire) on Saturday, 3 April during which he spoke of the new "ethics" governing French arms sales to foreign countries.

The defense minister recalled that all arms export contracts will be honored "aside from those with two countries, the Republic of South Africa and Chile" in order not to encourage internal repression and racist policy in those countries.

Addressing the trade unions in the enterprise which manufactures tanks in particular, Mr Hernu said that the French Army intended, in future programming, to purchase 1,000 light tanks independently of export orders from several Latin American countries in the framework of a voluntary French policy to diversify its clientele [sentence as published]. With regard to that South American market, Argentina expects France to continue a contract which has been under discussion since 1979, for the supply of armored troop transport vehicles. The French defense minister intends to visit Brazil and Peru in 1982.

COMPANY DENIES 'FIRM' MIRAGE DEAL WITH INDIA

[Text] Paris, 14 Apr (AFP) -- French aviation company Marcel Dassault-Breguet officials today denied reports that France had signed a firm $3,000 million deal to supply India with 40 Mirage-2000 fighter jets.

But company officials said a memorandum of understanding between the two countries had been signed, though this did not constitute a contract and allowed either party to withdraw from the agreement.

Reliable sources here said the memorandum of understanding was signed last week when an Indian Defence Ministry delegation visited Paris, headed by Mr. K. Ratosgra, general secretary of the foreign affairs department.

The source noted that negotiations between France and India for the sale of Mirage jets started two years ago, part of a general deal under which French authorities agreed to transfer a variety of weapons systems to India. An agreement was signed on January 23 in New Delhi, the source noted.

The first delivery of 40 Mirage jets could take place by the end of 1984 or early 1985, with a total 150 planes being delivered in three stages.

The second stage would involve simultaneous construction of the components of 45 planes in both countries, which would then be assembled at Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd in Banglaore in India.

In the final stage, the Indian aeronautics firm would construct 54 Mirage-2000 fighters under licence.

Informed sources said that negotiations were continuing to decide the financial and technical conditions under which the transfers of French technology would take place so that 110 Mirage jets can be assembled and constructed in India.

Details on how the planes' engines, electronic equipment and weapons systems can be built under licence in both countries remain to be worked out, the source said.

French Ministry of Defence officials said yesterday the contract was "very important" for France because of the number of fighter planes ordered by India, and because of the importance India attaches to the deal as the Indian Government wants to diversify its sources of military supplies.

The Defence Ministry said an official statement would be released in the next few days.

COMMUNIQUE ON JOSPIN-BERLINGUER MEETING ISSUED

[Unattributed report on joint communique issued after meeting between PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer and PS First Secretary Lionel Jospin in Paris on 30 March: "The Joint Communique"]

[Text] The communique on the Berlinguer-Jospin meeting states in particular:

"Areas of agreement emerged in the analysis of the international crisis. Points of agreement emerged in the examination of the crisis of capitalism and of the Eastern bloc countries. A discussion was started on international security problems, the crisis in detente, the dangers stemming from the speeding up of the arms race being conducted by the superpowers, and the need for mutual, balanced and controlled disarmament.

"Broad agreement exists on the rejection of the inevitability of blocs and on the need for cooperation between progressive forces in the developed countries and the Third World countries to transform North-South relations. Broad agreement also exists on the idea that the development of socialism within democracy will find its main area of political support within the West European workers movement.

"At the end of a meeting which they regarded as very constructive the PS and PCI leaders agreed to pursue the exchange of views between the two parties and to establish practical forms of cooperation."

MARCHAIS COMMENTS ON LATIN AMERICAN VISIT

FL141140 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1100 GMT 14 Apr 82

[Text] Georges Marchais, secretary general of the French Communist Party, has said in Paris that he had been able to witness how completely ready the peoples of Cuba and Nicaragua were to face any provocation. Marchais was interviewed by PRENSA LATINA on his return to Paris following a tour of the two Latin American countries that lasted nearly 3 weeks.

Marchais said he was optimistic about the future of his country's relations with Cuba and Nicaragua. Concerning the conflict surrounding Central America and the Caribbean, he said that the joint French-Mexican declaration was evidence of the useful role France could play in the solution of many problems.

The top French Communist leader said his recently concluded trip was very important. Firstly, because his party attaches great importance to relations with the brother party in Cuba, and because of his personal relationship of many years with Fidel Castro, whom he described as his friend.

RED BRIGADES ISSUE COMMUNIQUE ON AMBUSH

LD141804 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1700 GMT 14 Apr 82

[Text] The Red Brigades have renewed their threats against the judges, police and jurors involved in the Moro murder trial. In a six-page typewritten document which a Rome evening newspaper found after receiving a tip from an anonymous telephone call, the leaflet says that in chosing their ground, they have chosen the ground of no escape. [sentence as heard] In connection with the attack last Monday against the carabinieri who guarded the building in which Moro's murder trail opened today, the document says that if there were any wounded, they were among the carabinieri. Thus, they deny that any of the commandoes were wounded.

Details Reported

[Text] Rome, 14 Apr (AFP) -- The Red Brigades have issued a communique claiming responsibility for Monday's armed ambush here of a police patrol wagon, in which three policemen were wounded, an informed source said today. Publication of the communique, discovered following an anonymous telephone call to a newspaper, coincided with the opening of the trial of the alleged kidnappers of the late Aldo Moro. The communique expressed satisfaction at the "political success" of the ambush, although admitted that it had not achieved its goal of wiping out the police patrol.

Analysing the setbacks that the Red Brigades have recently suffered, the communique said that "the cycle begun in 1968 can continue provided a qualified jump is made from underground cells to 'guerrilla party.'"

The communique called for the "revolutionary" movement to unite, adding that creating a "guerrilla party" necessitated a criticism of the false analyses that had prevailed inside the movement.

The closure was ordered by the Council of Islamic Ambassadors in Rome in line with an appeal from King Khalid of Saudi Arabia for a general strike of the Islamic countries

The council also sent telegrams to the Islamic Supreme Council and U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar urging "decisive and dissuasive" U.N. moves against the "Zionists' criminal acts in occupied Palestine".

DEMOCRATIC ACTION PARTY OUTLINES PROGRAM

PM140825 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 30 Mar 82 p 12

[Pilar Cernuda report]

[Text] Madrid -- Francisco Fernandez Ordonez closed the first Democratic Action Party [PAD] congress on Sunday with a speech which brought applause and in which there was no criticism of opponents but containing policies for the future. The congress took place without conflicts and without "wings" running for the Executive Committee, which was elected by a majority.

The PAD enjoyed the moral support of various European and Latin American social democratic parties, and Fernandez Ordonez even announced that he will soon visit the United States to meet with Senator Kennedy. It will not be solely a political visit; he also hopes to return with financial support from the U.S. Democratic Party. One of the very first difficulties which the PAD will encounter will be financing, for lack of sufficient financial support.

Navarrese Deputy Javier Moscoso spoke at the closing session and set out in broad outline what the party's new line will be. "Here we are today with a party, an ideology and a program. There is no room here for those who assumed democratic trappings in order to stay on the bandwagen [para no bajarse del coche oficial]. There is no room here for those who called intolerance holy intolerance. There is no room here for those who always win without caring with whom." He was followed by new Deputy Secretary General Gonzalez Seara, who set out the PAD's education policies.

The last to speak was Fernandez Ordonez, amid the applause of the 500 delegates. Ordonez emphasized the congress' "capacity for enthusiasm when so many voices are prophysying a historical weariness for Spain." He added that in the government, "Nobody any longer makes a proposal, draws up a plan or attempts anything except merely remaining in power." Fernandez Ordonez set out the four basic points of the PAD's program: To rebuild the state and reorganize the administration; to reappraise the economic program; to review the educational, cultural and technological situation; and, last, to broaden the field of freedom.

"In short, we offer a new program, a program of renewal on the rubble of a great collective frustration. We call on Spanish people with centrist and center-left stances, who are prepared with an approach which is not socialist but social democratic to promote a program of real transformation of the country, to tackle an important change with dignity, generosity and effort." He announced that the PAD will run in the election "presenting its own option, alone or in coalition with the parties sharing this blueprint." He concluded with some words by Camus: "We did what we had a duty to do."

Following the closing of the congress a press conference was held at which Fernandez Ordonez was no more explicit about pacts and alliances. He said that reports of negotiations with the Spanish Socialist Workers Party were incorrect and denied that there were contacts with Adolfo Suarez to form a "pivotal party," together with personalities such as Tamames or Morodo. (These rumors arose in the wake of confused statements by Tamames to a Valencian journalist. Both Suarez and Alonso Puerta -- also included in the possible pacts -- have denied these reports.)

In this connection, Fernandez Ordonez asserted that "the pacts will be with parties, not with people. All the rest is speculation." He announced that his party will study the possibility of bringing an action suit against EL ALCAZAR, which on Sunday headlined a report on the PAD by saying that it was demanding "the disappearance of the Civil Guard," which, according to Fernandez Ordonez, is "a lie."

Returning to alliances, he emphasized that under no circumstances, "will we form coalitions with parties which are not progressive, and I have very little hope that the Union of the Democratic Center will become a progressive party."

The new PAD secretary general also stated that "we will continue to support the government for reasons of democratic stability on the state's major issues, but our conception of them need not necessarily coincide with what the government unilaterally decides."

The PAD's first Executive Committee was elected by 447 votes in favor, 25 against and 25 invalid votes, without any alternative list of candidates being put forward, because of the agreements already reached before the congress began.

[Excerpt] Bilbao -- Mario Onaindia and Juan Maria Bandres have been elected secretary general and chairman respectively of Euskadiko Ezkerra [Basque Left] -Left for Socialism -- a party whose constituent congress took place in Lejona last weekend. The new party's Central Committee was enlarged from 90 to 101 members to spread out the posts among the various tendencies. The Aketegui group has 38 members, New Left 33, the people from the Basque Communist Party 38, and the Independents 2. The Central Committee's unitary list won 843 votes in favor, 30 against, 80 abstentions and 2 invalid votes. The appointments of Onaindia and Bandres were confirmed by the plenum with no vote against.

During the final session three communiques from prisoners belonging to Basque Homeland and Liberty's politicomilitary wing were received, which, following a vote, were read out. The documents refer to these prisoners' support for the new party, although expressing disagreements in some fields, such as the stance on the issue of violence.

The various reports were approved without excessive arguments. The greatest disagreements arose over the report "Analysis of the Political Situation in the Basque Country." During the debate, Bandres, Jesus Infante and Markiegui introduced an amendment concerning the issue of armed struggle. The "new left" tendency of EIA had asked that it be not introduced. Finally, it was approved with 539 votes in favor and 366 against. It describes armed struggle as a "gravely destabilizing factor."

SRV FOREIGN MINISTER CONCLUDES 2-DAY VISIT

[Text] Stockholm, 14 Apr (AFP) -- Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach today wound up his two-day official visit to Sweden, having apparently convinced the Swedes of the utility of continued aid to Hanoi.

In talks today with Carl Tham, the Foreign Ministry official responsible for development questions, Mr Nguyen Co Thach discussed the steadily falling volume of financial assistance that his country receives from Sweden. Vietnam has long since been replaced at the top of Stockholm's aid list by Tanzania, and this fiscal year Sweden's aid to Vietnam is down to 345,000,000 crowns (about 57,500,000 dollars), notably because of the Vietnamese intervention in Kampuchea. Mr Nguyen Co Thach said on Monday, when he arrived here from Paris, the first leg of his current international tour, that "we are not coming to beg, but we have projects with which a country like Sweden can help us." A well-informed source said today that Mr Nguyen Co Thach seemed to have convinced Mr Tham of this and to have laid the basis for future negotiations on the subject.

The two sides agreed that Stockholm should continue to assist such Swedish-instituted projects as the Bai Bang paper-manufacturing complex and the Hanoi children's clinic. Sweden, the source said, might also be (?included) in Vietnam's schemes for developing its highways and coastal sea traffic. (On the latter point, observers pointed out that Sweden's shipbuilding industry has been hard-hit by the world recession and is seeking new markets.)

Mr Nguyen Co Thach also met today with Prime Minister Thorbjoern Faelldin and discussed Hanoi's policy in Southeast Asia.

In talks yesterday, Foreign Minister Ola Ullstein told Mr Nguyen Co Thach that Sweden disapproves the continuing Vietnamese presence in Cambodia. Mr Nguyen Co Thach told him that Vietnam would pull some of its troops out of Cambodia if Thailand ceased to be a base for "actions hostile to the people of Kampuchea."

Mr Nguyen Co Thach leaves tomorrow for Berlin, from where he will go on to visit Brussels, Bonn, Moscow and New Delhi.

NAVY ORDERS NEW ANTISUBMARINE DEVICES

PM131559 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 5 Apr 82 p 15

[Erik Liden report: "New Antisubmarine Weapons"]

[Text] The Swedish Navy has now ordered mini depth charges and acoustic "bombs" worth 800,000 kroner. This significantly increases the navy's chances of forcing foreign submarines to the surface.

After the submarine incident off Huvudskaer in September 1980, when for almost 3 weeks a submarine, probably Russian, frustrated Swedish submarine pursuit units' attempts to force it to the surface, Navy chief Per Rudberg proposed that experiments be started to produce a mini depth charge which could be used in all situations without risk to the lives of the submarine crew. This depth charge has not been thoroughly tested by the Defense Materiel Administration and ordered in large quantities. A small explosive charge blows a small hole in the submarine's hull, which means that the submarine must surface immediately.

The acoustic bomb attaches itself to the submarine's hull magnetically if it is dropped within 5-10 meters of the boat. Acoustic signals then disturb the crew and can also be followed from the surface. To remove the bomb the submarine must come to the surface, open the hatches and a member of the crew leave the boat and the detach it. Swedish Armed Forces Commander in Chief Lennart Ljung has also proposed tougher measures against foreign submarines and the Riksdag is expected to approve these at the same time as the defense bill, 3 June.

THATCHER ADDRESSES THIRD EMERGENCY SESSION

[Speech by Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher in the House of Commons during the third emergency debate on the Falklands crisis -- live]

[Text] Mr Speaker, Sir: It is right that at this time of grave concern over the Falkland Islands and their people, that Parliament should be recalled so that the government may report and the House may discuss the latest developments. Our objective, endorsed by all sides of the House in recent debates, is that the people of the Falkland Islands shall be free to determine their own way of life and their own future. The wishes of the islanders must be paramount for they cannot be freely expressed, let alone implemented, while the present illegal Argentine occupation continues. [shouts of "Hear, hear"] That is why our immediate goal in recent days has been to secure the withdrawal of all Argentine forces in accordance with Resolution 502 of the UN Security Council and to secure the restoration of British administration. Our strategy has been based on a combination of diplomatic, military and economic pressures, and I would like to deal with each of these in turn.

First of all, Mr Speaker, we seek a peaceful solution by diplomatic effort. This, too, is in accordance with the Security Council resolution. In this approach we have been helped by the widespread disapproval of the use of force which the Argentine aggression has aroused across the world and also by the tireless efforts of Secretary of State Haig, who has now paid two visits to this country and one to Buenos Aires. On his first visit last Thursday, we impressed upon him the great depth of feeling on this issue not only of Parliament but of the British people as a whole. We may not express our views in the same way as the masses gathered in Buenos Aires, but we feel them every bit as strongly. [Shouts of "hear, hear"] Indeed, even more profoundly because Britons are involved. We made it clear to Mr Haig that withdrawal of the invaders' troops must come first, that the sovereignty of the islands is not affected by the act of invasion, and that when it comes to future negotiations, what matters most is what the Falkland Islanders themselves wish. On his second visit on Easter Monday and yesterday, Mr Haig put forward certain ideas as a basis for discussion, ideas concerning the withdrawal of troops and its supervision and an interim period during which negotiations on the future of the islands would be conducted. Our talks were long and detailed, as the House would expect. Some things we could not consider because they flouted our basic principles; others we had to examine carefully and suggest alternatives. The talks were constructive and some progress was made. At the end of Monday, Mr Haig was prepared to return to Buenos Aires in pursuit of a peaceful solution. However, Argentina, late that night, put forward to him other proposals which we could not possibly have accepted. But yesterday, the position appeared to have eased. Further ideas are now being considered, and Secretary Haig has returned to Washington before proceeding -- he hopes shortly -- to Buenos Aires. Mr Speaker, that meeting, in our view, will be crucial.

These discussions are complex, changing and difficult; the more so because they are taking place between a military junta and a democratic government of a free people, [shouts of "Hear, hear"] and one which is not prepared to compromise that democracy and that liberty which the British Falkland Islanders regard as their birthright. We seek and shall continue to seek a diplomatic solution, and the House will realize that it would jeopardize that aim were I to give further details at this stage. Indeed, Secretary Haig has been scrupulous in his adherence to confidentiality in pursuit of the larger objective. We shall continue genuinely to negotiate through the good offices of Mr Haig, to whose skill and perseverance I pay warm tribute. [shouts of "Hear, hear"]

Mr Speaker, diplomatic efforts are more likely to succeed if they are backed by military strength. At 0500 London time on Monday, April 12, the maritime exclusion zone of 200 miles around the Falkland Islands came into effect.

From that time, any Argentine warships and Argentine naval auxiliaries found within this zone are treated as hostile and are liable to be attacked by British forces. We see this measure as the first step towards achieving the withdrawal of Argentine forces. It appears to have exerted influence in Argentina, whose navy has been concentrated outside the zone. If the zone is challenged, we shall take that as the clearest evidence that the search for a peaceful solution has been abandoned. We shall then take the necessary action, let no one doubt that.

The naval task force is proceeding with all speed toward the South Atlantic. It's a formidable force comprising two aircraft carriers, five guided-missile destroyers, seven frigates, an assault ship with five landing ships, together with supporting vessels. The composition of the force and the speed with which it was assembled and put to sea clearly demonstrate our determination. [shouts of "Hear, hear"] Morale on board the ships in the task force is very high. The ships and aircraft are carrying out exercises on passage, and by the time the force arrives off the Falklands it will be at a very high state of fighting efficiency.

[Interjection by Labor MP Tam Dalyell] [Words indistinct] that if it arrives off the Falklands that there is sufficient air cover against a landbased air force from the Argentines.

[Mrs Thatcher resumes speaking] Mr Speaker, I will have something to say about air cover in a moment. May I say that I have every confidence in all aspects of this task force. A number of civilian ships have now been chartered or requisitioned. These include the Canberra, for use as a troop ship, and the Uganda, which will be available as a hospital ship. Recourse to the merchant marine is traditional in time of naval emergency, and their response has been wholehearted on this occasion as in the past. Men and equipment continue to be flown out to Ascension Island to meet up with the task force. These additional elements will enhance the fighting capability of the force and the range of operations which can be undertaken. Nimrod maritime patrol aircraft are now patrolling the South Atlantic in support of our fleet.

Sustaining a substantial force 8,000 miles from the UK is a considerable undertaking. As the Ministry of Defense announced this morning, additional measures are now in hand to provide extra capability for the force over an extended period. In particular, the second assault ship, HMS Intrepid, is being recommissioned for operational service. She will significantly add to the amphibious capability of the task force now entering the South Atlantic, which already contains her sister ship, HMS Fearless. Arrangements are in hand to adapt a large cargo ship for the sealift of additional Harriers. This will nearly double the size of the Harrier force in the South Atlantic. All these aircraft have a formidable air-combat and ground-attack capability.

Our diplomacy, Mr Speaker, is backed by strength, and we have the resolve to use that strength if necessary.

The third aspect of our pressure against Argentina has been economic. We've been urging our friends and allies to take action parallel to our own, and we have achieved a heartening degree of success. The most significant measure has been the decisions of our nine partners in the European Community to join us not just in an arms embargo, but also in stopping all imports from Argentina. [shouts of "Hear, hear"] This is a very important step, unprecedented in its scope and the rapidity of the decision. Last year, about a quarter of all of Argentina's economy of this measure will, therefore, be considerable and it cannot be without influence on the leaders in the present crisis. And I should like warmly to thank our European partners for rallying to our support. [shouts of "Hear, hear"] It was an effective demonstration of Community solidarity. The decision can't have been easy for our partners given the commercial interests at stake, but they were the first to realize that if aggression were allowed to succeed in the Falkland Islands, it would be encouraged the world over.

Other friends, too, have been quick to help. And I should like to thank Australia, New Zealand and Canada for their sturdy and swift action.

They've decided to ban imports from Argentina, to stop export credits and to halt all sales of military equipment. New Zealand has also banned exports to Argentina. We're grateful also to many other countries in the Commonwealth who supported us by condemning the Argentine invasion.

Mr Speaker, what have the Argentines been able to produce to balance this solidarity in support of our cause? Some Latin American countries have, of course, repeated their support for the Argentine claims to sovereignty. We always knew they would. But only one of them has supported the Argentine invasion, and nearly all have made clear their distaste and disapproval that Argentina should have resorted to aggression. Almost the only country whose position has been shifting towards Argentina is the Soviet Union. We can only guess at the cynical calculations which lie behind this move. [shouts of "Hear, hear"] But Soviet support for Argentina is hardly likely to share the world's confidence in the justice of our cause, and it will not alter our determination to achieve our objectives.

Mr Speaker, one of our first concerns has been and remains the safety of the British subjects who have been caught up in the consequences of the crisis. They include -- apart from the Falkland Islanders themselves -- the marines and the British Antarctic survey scientists on South Georgia and the British community in Argentina. In spite of all our efforts we've not been able to secure reliable information about the 22 marines who are on South Georgia and the 13 British Antarctic survey personnel who are believed to have been evacuated from Grytviken at the same time. According to Argentine reports, these people are on a ship heading for the mainland. There are also reports that the six marines and the one member of the crew of Endurance who were captured on the Falkland Islands are now in Argentina. Finally, there are 13 members of the British Antarctic survey team and 2 other British subjects who remain on South Georgia. The survey team's most recent contact, on 12 April, with its headquarters in this country indicates that they are safe and well.

On 5 April we asked the Swiss Government, as a protecting power, to pursue all these cases urgently with the Argentine Government. We trust their efforts will soon produce the information which we and their families so anxiously seek. On the same day we also sought the assistance of the International Red Cross with regard to the position of the population in the Falkland Islands. So far, the Argentine Government has not responded to their request to visit the islands.

Last night a party of 35 people from the islands, including the chief secretary, arrived in Montevideo, and a report from the chief secretary on the conditions in the islands is expected at any moment. Recently, Mr Speaker, the government received a message from the British Community Council in Argentina urging a peaceful solution to the present conflict and asking that due consideration be given to the strong British presence in Argentina and the size of the British community there. We have replied, recognizing the contribution which the British community has made to the development of Argentina, but making it plain that we have a duty to respond to the unprovoked aggression against the Falkland Islands and insisting that Argentina should comply with the mandatory resolution of the Security Council calling upon it to withdraw its troops.

[Interjection by Labor MP Tam Dalyell] Before she comes to the end of her speech, I wonder if I can repeat the question about air power. Does she not remember what happened to the Prince of Wales and the Repulse? And does she not know that there are at least 68 Skyhawks in the Argentine Air Force, plus Mirages with the R-530s? This is a formidable force. If we are to go near the Falkland Islands, would she at least answer that question?

[Thatcher] I have indicated to the honorable gentleman and to the House that we have taken steps to double the provision of the Harriers, and we believe that that will provide the air cover which the whole House and the honorable gentlemen seek. And I trust that he and the whole House will express confidence in our naval fleet, marines and air force, for that is the least that they are entitled to have from this House.

Mr Speaker, we are also being urged from some quarters to avoid armed confrontation at all costs and to seek conciliation. Of course we, too, want a peaceful solution, but it was not Britain who broke the peace, and if the argument of no force at any price were to be adopted at this stage, it would serve only to perpetuate occupation of those very territories which have themselves been seized by force.

Mr Speaker, in any negotiations over the coming days we shall be guided by the following principles: We shall continue to insist on Argentine withdrawal from the Falkland Islands and dependencies. We shall remain ready to exercise our right to resort to force in self-defense under Article 51 of the UN Charter until the occupying forces leave the islands. Our naval task force sails on towards its destination. We remain fully confident of its ability to take whatever measures may be necessary. Meanwhile, its very existence and its progress toward the Falkland Islands reinforce the efforts we are making for a diplomatic solution. That solution must safeguard the principle that the wishes of the islanders shall remain paramount. There is no reason to believe that they would prefer any alternative to the resumption of the administration which they enjoyed before Argentina committed aggression. It may be that their recent experiences will have caused their views on the future to change, but until they've had the chance freely to express their views, the British Government will not assume that the islanders' wishes are different from what they were before.

We have a long and proud history of recognizing the right of others to determine their own destiny. Indeed, in that respect we have an experience unrivalled by any other nation in the world. But that right must be upheld universally and not least where it is challenged by those who are hardly conspicuous for their own devotion to democracy and liberty. The eyes of the world are now focused on the Falkland Islands. Others are watching anxiously to see whether brute force or the rule of law will triumph.

Mr Speaker, wherever naked aggression occurs, it must be overcome. The cost now, however high, must be set against the cost we would one day have to pay if this principle went by default. And that is why through diplomatic, economic and, if necessary, through military means we shall persevere until freedom and democracy are restored to the people of the Falkland Islands.

Pym Speaks

[Speech by Foreign Secretary Francis Pym in House of Commons during the third emergency debate on the Falklands crisis -- live]

[Text] Mr Speaker, I agree with the right honorable gentleman [Denis Healy, Labor Party Shadow Foreign Secretary] that this has been indeed a very useful debate. The House has addressed itself to the gravity of the real issues involved. If the House understands very well, beyond that I think the British people understand very well. The debate has shown a very broad measure of agreement and a broad measure of support for the actions which the government has taken and is taking. And I think it's a very good example, Mr Speaker, of the way in which our democratic procedures in Parliament are a source of strength for our nation.

Now of course, there have been a number of dissenting voices on both sides, and quite naturally and rightly so. But I think it has been as heartening to us as it must have been discouraging to the Argentine aggressors to hear the degree of unity that has been reflected in this debate -- as mentioned most recently by the right honorable gentleman and member for Battersea -- unity in the resolve that the rule of law be reestablished by the withdrawal of the invader of the Falklands in accordance with the mandatory resolution of the Security Council in which, of course, Argentina is in breach; the unity in our determination to do all we can to achieve a solution by peaceful means provided that such a solution is in accordance with the basic prinicples which successive British governments have upheld, principles which we know to be essential if small countries are not to be at the mercy of their larger neighbors; and unity also, Mr Speaker, in sober recognition of our right to use force in self-defense -- that is unquestionable -- and in recognition that if need be it will be exercised.

At the outset, I want to give to the House a first report which I have just received from the chief secretary in the Falklands administration. He arrived last night in Montevideo. He stated that he and other senior officials who left with him have all been deported from the Falklands. Until his departure, the administration in Port Stanley had succeeded in maintaining essential services for the islands, including medical services, water, electricity, telephones and police. But restriction had been imposed on the radio-telephone links with outlying farms and the internal air service had been stopped. According to the chief secretary, the conduct of the Argentine forces is so far correct. The report contains no indication that there is serious hardship among the people of the Falkland Islands. But the deportation of the senior officials is, of course, a concern, and underlined the need for the involvement of the International Red Cross, which her majesty's government is going to pursue.

Mr Speaker, last week I spoke to the House of the determination with which we are pursuing our efforts to secure Argentine withdrawal from the Falkland Islands. They have absolutely no right whatsoever to be there and they must go. The whole of this business started with them. The entire blame for the crisis rests on Argentina. And this act of aggression -- unprovoked, illegal and unforgiveable -- has to be reversed. The House and the country, I believe, and the world, would prefer it reversed by peaceful means. And in the interests of avoiding bloodshed, we are working with all our strength for just such a peaceful solution, a solution consistent with our commitment to the Falkland Islands.

My right honorable friend, the prime minister, outlined at the beginning of this debate the steps that have been taken so far, the discussions that we have had with Mr Secretary Haig and the ideas, or some of the ideas, which have been produced and proceeds on that apace. Now I cannot say -- in fact nobody can say -- whether a peaceful solution will prove possible. If it does not, Argentina knows what to expect, and let them not doubt it. And I would here like to join the right honorable gentleman for Leeds East in thanking Mr Secretary Haig for this work that he has undertaken. Certainly it is onerous. He's not only shown intellectual stamina, if I may say so he has shown great physical stamina. And he has approached this task which is very difficult, with great willingness and with great thoroughness, and I think the House and the country are in his debt.

Mr Speaker, the right honorable gentleman referred to the process being contemplated in two phases. He referred, of course, first of all to the withdrawal -- and that is an absolute prerequisite for any progress of any kind whatsoever. And at that stage he made some ideas and referred to ideas in relation to the UN and the possibility of the UN presence, which another honorable gentleman has raised, and made other suggestions, upon which I would prefer not to comment. But I would say to him that I would of course, take a very careful note to what he has said. And then he went on to refer in the second phase to negotiation for a longer term solution, and later on in my speech I would like to say something about that. But I have certainly noted his ideas, and indeed I will consider again very carefully all the other ideas that the right honorable and honorable members have made in the course of the debate.

Mr Speaker, our clear resolve and the international support that we have mustered from our friends and partners are beginning to tell. Argentina has still the time to be having second thoughts. Certainly they have been invaded by doubts of their own from time to time. We now need not only to maintain the pressures, but to build them up wherever we can. Britain's support for the islanders is no empty commitment and I think our response, our national response, to this crisis has certainly demonstrated that. It was Argentina's great mistake to imagine that there would be a lack of will on Britain's part to defend the Falkland Islands if need arose. In this country we have a lot of experience of dealing with unprovoked aggression and invaders. Unfortunately we have, but we have it. And we understand the vital need not to permit aggression to succeed.

And it makes no difference to us whether that takes place on our doorsteps or 8,000 miles away. Freedom under the law is what is at stake. The Argentinians presumably reckoned that if they presented us with a fait accompli and just did the thing, we would not take steps to reverse it, that they would be met with a great fuss and ballyhoo, but not with any action. They were wrong, Mr Speaker. They never imagined that we'd back our commitments with diplomatic and economic measures that were needed to uphold it, let alone the military measures, which are surely having their effect.

The task force is, as we know, sailing on its course towards the South Atlantic and it will build up as operational requirements dictate. My right honorable friend announced today one element in that buildup; of course, there will be others in due course. And I do think it is a remarkable tribute to the Royal Navy -- I know the House would expect no less, nonetheless, it is a remarkable fact that they did mount that task force and that it sailed with the speed and with the efficiency with which it did sail.

Now Argentina reckoned without the response of the international community. I don't think they were in any way prepared for what was going to happen. No doubt they expected the world to deprecate the use of force, but in their ill-judged enthusiasm, and perhaps even a bit of excitement, they failed to foresee the revulsion and the anxiety felt by nations all round the world at seeing an act of aggression -- a large country against a small nearby territory. I think they were unprepared for the resolution passed by the Security Council. I certainly think they were unprepared for the response that we received from the international community by way of economic measures. They failed to realize that countries all round the world would see their act as totally repugnant and intolerable and would condemn it almost unanimously. And I think they also failed to see the strength which that condemnation would give to Britain in her efforts to rally support to the cause of repelling aggressors.

In other words, Mr Speaker, I think they misjudged it from the start. They anticipated what might happen, but they didn't get it right. And I think Argentina must now be dismayed at the solidarity shown to Britain by our major allies. She did not see that the U.S. will be bound to condemn the invasion, and I think I'm right in saying, if I can say to the right honorable gentleman, the U.S. has already banned the export of arms to Argentina as a step. And of course she supported us very strongly in the UN resolution and is, of course, at the moment playing this crucial role in the negotiations for a peaceful settlement, which is quite certainly what the House has indicated it would like to see achieved.

She did not reckon with the close ties that link the nations of the Commonwealth and these ties, Mr Speaker, are at their strongest when democracy itself is challenged. Above all, I think she totally failed to foresee the strong political solidarity that so many years of common endeavor have built up in the European Community. The Community's decision to ban all imports from Argentina was wholly unexpected in Buenos Aires. Condemnations and diplomatic sanctions they perhaps could have lived with, as they thought about it; to see about a quarter of their export trade wiped out at a stroke was a body blow to their already rather shaky economy. And all the evidence suggests, Mr Speaker, that they were very surprised indeed by this, and this is one of the actions that we had taken supported by our friends that has undoubtedly affected their attitude to the situation in which they now find themselves.

I'm glad to tell the House that the steps to the complete embargo on imports were agreed in Brussels today. They come into force as soon as they can be published, which will probably be on 16 April. And I would like to express to the House, the government, I think the whole House's gratitude for this powerful positive action taken by the European Community.

[Denis Healey] Could the right honorable gentleman tell us whether the Community has accepted the advice of the commission that the ban on the imports should last in the first instance only for 2 weeks?

[Pym] Mr Speaker, in the first instance the Community have agreed that they should last for 1 month and in the course of that period, of course, the position can be reexamined with a view to extending them, modifying them or whatever; but the initial period is for 1 month. Mr Speaker, I should also like to mention a point raised by the right honorable member for Plymouth-Devonport. Guarantees is one point he had raised -- they are a matter for national rather for Community action. I understand that there is actually a gathering consensus among the Ten that in present circumstances in Argentina there will not be put in practice any new offers of official export credits. So, in other words, the pressure there is mounting very considerably. The very positive response by our friends to our call for pressure on Argentina rests, Mr Speaker, I believe, fundamentally in the firm legal grounds of the UN Charter and the Security Council resolution. Because, after the history of the second world war there is no doubt that the desire for a better way of settling international disputes was actually founded in the UN, and all nations subscribed to that and that is the basis upon which we obtained the support.

But by contrast, Argentina's friends in Latin America can find no such basis for supporting her. And the right honorable gentleman, the leader of the opposition, if I may say so, put this point extremely fairly and cogently in his speech. And following that and the doubt about their position, I think it's fair to say that their gestures have been, to say the least, unenthusiastic. Despite the agreement of some of them with Argentina's interpretation of the sovereignty issue, they have nearly all refused to condone the use of force. They have, in fact, joined their voices to those of our own supporters in favor of a peaceful settlement, if such can be achieved.

Mr Speaker, many honorable members have raised the principle of self-determination and the wishes of the islanders, and certainly no one pays more attention to that or gives more weight to it than her majesty's government. But, in response to the right honorable gentlemen, we have not set our faces against any idea of change in the future. But what we cannot accept is that some form of change be imposed on the islanders. That is the point.

Now of course, the views of the islanders at the moment cannot be known. They are bound to have been affected by the trauma they've gone through. For my part, I've always taken the view that as the result of it they would be likely to want to be even more British than they were before -- if that is possible -- but nobody knows. And there is no doubt about it we shall have to take a great deal of care ascertaining those views accurately when the present invasion is over. We cannot ascertain it at the moment.

If I think about it at this range, Mr Speaker, I think they will need time after the crisis is over to reflect about the situation and consider the prospects of the alternative. And I don't think they ought to be unduly hurried in it. We hear talk of suddenly taking a quick poll or something, but I don't think that will do at all. They'll want to consider it in their own way before we come to any conclusion about it, and I think that it's really important that we should enable them to do that. But we shall, Mr Speaker, continue to be guided by their wishes. I've noted what my honorable friend the member for Newbury said on this point. I'm sure...

[Tony Bedwell -- interrupting] We've not had a great deal of detail about what was being discussed in New York at the end of February on the agenda. We know what the communique said; we know what the resignation speech of the junior minister said when he conveyed very little indeed. Was, in fact, one of the items on the agenda then -- and if the honorable gentleman can't give it to me now, perhaps at another time -- the question of some kind of delegation of sovereignty over the Islands of Falkland?

It has been referred to by some people, and argued, of course, in Argentina and other places, that this is a kind of colonial problem. Of course, it isn't anything of the kind. It's quite a different issue. Quite a different issue, and all I'm trying to convey to the House is that the wishes of the islanders are all important as far as we are concerned and that implies quite clearly that if some other kind of government is required by the islanders, then we wouldn't wish to stand in their way, and I don't think the House would stand in their way. So that is our position.

My honorable friend the member for Newbury spoke on this point and a number of my other honorable friends. I'm sure that we would want to insure that all the islanders had an opportunity to make their views known, but obviously we've got to wait some time before we can do that. Now I quite agree with my honorable friend the member for Bromsgrove -- and the right honorable gentleman touched on this point -- about the need to think about, even prepare, plans for the long-term future. Obviously, that's what we want to settle as best we can. Now I won't speak now on that aspect. My overriding concern now and in the immediate future is to get into a position when long-term proposals can become relevant. That's why the priority of the invading Argentinians going from the islands is absolutely crucial, so we can get on with the process which will lead to this long-term settlement. In the meantime, there is of course no reason whatsoever why we should not be thinking about the possibilities, and indeed that is happening. But, as I say, my immediate concern is to make sure that we can put any long-term plans that we decide upon into practice in due course.

The honorable gentleman, the member for Inverness, asked about the position concerning South Georgia. Argentina claims sovereignty over the Falkland Islands and Falkland dependencies, including South Georgia. As the House knows, Argentine forces invaded South Georgia on 4 April. The maritime exclusion zone, however, covers only the waters surrounding the Falkland Islands themselves. And he asked, in addition, whether there have been any incidents in the maritime exclusion zone. The answer is that there have not been so far. Whether this remains the case will, of course, depend on the Argentines themselves. We have made our position in relation to the zone quite clear and quite specific and they know quite well what will happen if they violate it. And, of course, the creation of that zone is the beginning of the process which makes withdrawal itself possible. So I would say to the honorable gentleman: Nothing so far and it's up to the Argentines. And as my right honorable friend told the House earlier, the Argentinian Navy is concentrating outside the zone and we hope very much of course, that that will continue to be so. Because we believe that the Argentinians, like ourselves, desire above all else a peaceful solution if it can be achieved without prejudice to the principles involved. And it is to us vitally important that they stay outside of that zone so no incidents are invited.

Mr Speaker, the British task force is moving steadily towards its destination. Our diplomatic action has yielded magnificent support from our friends in the form of concrete action parallel to our own. It's deeds that they have done, as well as words. The costs of aggression are being made clearer every day. The pressure is mounting on Argentina. The vise is tightening, as Mr Haig's admirable efforts continue, we shall see whether reason and responsibility will prevail in Buenos Aires. Should Mr Haig's diplomacy fail to produce a settlement, it will not be for lack of effort or of reasonable flexibility on his part, or on ours, or on Argentina's.

Britain will remain determined to achieve peace, if possible, but ready for conflict, if necessary, because we shall not be deflected from the objectives reaffirmed today by the prime minister in the House. Her priority is the withdrawal of the Argentine forces from the Falkland Islands as a first step to a settlement which accords with the wishes of the islanders. In the name of international law and order, they must go.

FOREIGN SECRETARY INTERVIEWED ON SITUATION

[Interview given by Foreign Secretary Francis Pym to BBC radio correspondent John Morgan following the 14 April House of Commons debate in London on the Falkland Islands crisis -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Do you expect the support you had in the House today to survive an outbreak of fighting in the Falklands?

[Answer] I think it depends enormously on the sequence of events and the circumstances in which that might arise. Everybody wants a peaceful solution -- obviously they do -- and not only in Britain but all round the world. That is why we are striving so hard to come to a conclusion. We just don't know whether the Haig mission, whether the Haig negotiating technique, will bring it off. We desperately hope that it does. If it doesn't, we are, of course, in a different situation. That we are preparing for all the time -- the task force over to the South Atlantic. You see, there is an enormous principle involved, an illegal invasion, aggression by a large country against a small neighboring country, and the British people understand that very well. We have got a lot of experience of it. Other countries understand it very well, too, and I think one of the reasons why we got such good support, such a huge majority in the Security Council for the resolution a couple of weeks ago, was because the consequences of not dealing with this completely unjustified and illegal act of aggression would for a lot of other small countries be very serious indeed. But I think the support that we retain in the House of Commons and in the country will depend very much on the responsibility with which they feel that we are using the power that we have and the skill with which we use it and the use to which we put it. I think that's the important thing at that time.

[Question] Do you think that the secretary of state, Mr Haig, was surprised or even disappointed at your very firm response to his first initiative, that the strength of the prime minister's case surprised him?

[Answer] I don't think it surprised him. He's a tough negotiator. He's a tough character, and that's an advantage in a situation of this kind. But you see, it's obviously vital that there's a withdrawal, that was our first requirement, and the United Nations had so voted and, actually, the Argentine is in violation of a United Nations resolution which is mandatory. They are required to fulfill it and at the moment they are flouting it, so there's a worldwide interest there and obviously Britain would insist upon that. But then there's the matter of restoring British administration which was according to the wishes of the islanders, and then there is the long-term question of what the future status of the island should be, how it should be governed, and we have always taken the view that that must really be dependent upon what the people who live there really want.

[Question] (?There have been) notions, Mr Pym, about the condominium, perhaps an Argentine flag flying alongside the British or a UN force; but is it fair to speculate that perhaps President Reagan thought that you would immediately accept this kind of thing because of his peculiar relationship with the Argentine?

[Answer] Well, all I would say about that is that after withdrawal, when it has been properly verified, then obviously there has got to be some arrangement made about how the islands are going to be governed in the immediate future, and there are a number of possible ways in which that could be achieved. But the vital thing is to get withdrawal and then reestablish normality in the island, which will take obviously quite a little time, and in months -- and then give the islanders a chance to reassess their position after this traumatic and, I should think, very uncomfortable experience so they can see how they would like to go on in the future, and it seems to us that their views must be a very important factor here. Paramount is the word that has been used, and I think that that's quite fair, because, you see, we aren't keeping the islands just because they are British, and we intend to keep them and the people don't mind one way or another. We are only keeping them because the people in the islands have wanted it that way.

But if after this awful experience they wanted some different arrangement, they wanted to be independent or they wanted some other plan, we wouldn't stand in their way. But, of course, you can't establish what those views are now until the Argentinian forces have withdrawn and normal life, or more or less normal life, has been reestablished for a period of time.

[Question] When troops are launched, or when navies are launched, Foreign Secretary, it becomes a very hazardous matter. If it were to come about that Britain were by chance to be the first to fire, do you think that this would have a profound effect both on British public opinion and world opinion?

[Answer] Let's make it quite clear. The first to have fired are the Argentinians. They invaded; they have no right there, absolutely none. They are under an obligation by the United Nations, a mandatory resolution, to go. They have started this war. We are not going to start a war by firing. They have started it, and this is the whole point. They are the aggressor. They are the invader. And we don't want to see the world suddenly find itself in a position when the small countries are overrun with the great powerful big countries nearby because they are richer or stronger. That's exactly what it is all about. So, let's get it quite clear, they started it, not us.

[Question] When you see the Russians becoming involved in a hostile fashion, the Brazilian Navy being mobilized and Chile in this unpleasant relationship with Argentina anyway, does it as foreign secretary strike you as a perilous moment as you appraise the risk of a war spreading?

[Answer] Yes, of course its a perilous moment, and I'm afraid the position is that the Soviet Union is highly likely to become very involved.

[Question] Did you find it disconcerting that someone like Mrs Jean Kirkpatrick, the American ambassador at the UN, has made some sort of general remark suggesting that perhaps if the Argentine actually does own the island historically, then moving troops into them is not armed aggression, that perhaps you haven't had the overwhelming support you might have expected, given the Russians' behavior, from the United States?

[Answer] We certainly have had overwhelming support. And remember, the United States has banned the export of arms. They did support us in that resolution, and as Secretary Haig is at the moment trying with all his might to achieve a successful negotiation and is in a kind of negotiating position and dealing with both sides, it seems to me not unreasonable that he stands on his position as it is at the moment. If one or two people, Mrs Kirkpatrick you mentioned, make comments which many of us would find ill-judged and not accurate or necessarily accurate, one mustn't take the tone from that. One has to look at the scene as a whole, and what we are doing at the moment -- and I think the British people want us to do -- is to do everything that it is possible to do to conclude this dispute by peaceful means.

[Question] Are you aware, Foreign Secretary, of the kind of political speculation that is surrounding this crisis, which affects your government, which affects the prime minister? Do you see it is a matter on which your government stands or falls?

[Answer] One mustn't put any issue in those terms, and I don't think anybody could judge from the debates we have had in the House of Commons last week or this week that that is the (?motion). There is a great anxiety in this country about it. This is a very big issue. It's a long time since we have been involved in an issue of international law and order -- that's what it is -- and we have always been champions of freedom, always champions of liberty. We are still champions of liberty and that's what its all about.

OFFICIALS APPLAUD EEC TRADE BAN ON ARGENTINA

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Brussels]

[Text] Government officials tonight applauded the EEC's trade ban arrangements against Argentina as "an impressive example of Community co-operation." After a day of complex talks in Brussels on how to enforce sanctions by 10 countries on Argentina's 1 billion pounds worth of exports to the Common Market every year, UK negotiating officials were elated at the outcome.

They consider a one-month trade ban, directly binding on all EEC firms, is vital political support for Britain in diplomatic efforts to end the invasion of the Falkland Islands. The ban comes into force on Friday and ends on May 17.

Common Market ambassadors will then meet again to consider its extension, modification or cancellation in the light of future developments in the crisis.

The ban was agreed after a round of tough discussions in Brussels on Saturday, and was only waiting for the legal details to be ironed out today. It will come as a severe blow to Argentina, which now loses its largest single export market.

EEC countries take a wide range of goods, from corned beef and other agricultural products, to textiles, machinery, steel and leather. But the unprecedented sanctions will mean some sacrifices among Community countries themselves.

Although many of the imported goods which are now to be blocked are plentiful in the EEC, several member-states rely on Argentina and its supply of raw hides for leather for the footwear industry. After beef, leather is the biggest item exported by Argentina to the Community.

Fears of an adverse effect on the Community's own economy led some member-states to press for a relatively brief period of action against Argentina. The EEC Commission itself was talking about a 15-day ban, and UK officials in Brussels were surprised and pleased at successfully negotiating a 1-month agreement before review.

One spokesman said about the decision: "This is a very significant factor in the response by the Community and the 10 governments to Argentina's seizure of the Falkland Islands. "The speed of the decision for a ban and the regulation implementing it is an impressive example of community co-operation bringing together the political and economic work of the community."

MINISTRY DENIES RUMORS OF FALKLANDS INCIDENT

[Text] The Ministry of Defence tonight reacted to a persistent rumour sweeping the city that there had been a sinking in the 200-mile military exclusion zone around the Falklands.

The Navy department said: "We have no knowledge that any incident has occurred involving Royal Navy and Argentinian vessels." Sources said later that the ministry was 99 percent certain that it was only a rumour.

REPORTS OF BLOCKADE PENETRATION BEING STUDIED

[Excerpt] Reports that two Argentine boats have penetrated the British blockade of the Falkland Islands were being studied by Ministry of Defence chiefs today.

Argentina has claimed that two motor torpedo boats entered the restricted 200 mile zone earlier this week and docked at Port Stanley. A Ministry of Defence spokesman in London said today: "We have no knowledge that the zone has been penetrated."

THATCHER, CABINET MEMBERS BRIEFED BY MOD

[By PA staff reporter Alan Jones]

[Text] The prime minister and senior members of her cabinet today met Ministry of Defense [MOD] chiefs in London for a top level briefing on the Falklands crisis. Mrs Thatcher was joined by Foreign Secretary Francis Pym and Home Secretary William Whitelaw for a two hour session at the MOD headquarters in London.

They met chiefs of staff and defence secretary, John Nott, for what was described as a "detailed briefing" on the latest position. An MOD spokesman said: "This was part of the normal procedure for briefing the prime minister. There was nothing abnormal about it except that she was being briefed in this building." Several police officers were stationed outside the MOD which is just a few hundred yards from Downing Street.

In a statement, the Defence Ministry said that since the 200 mile blockade of the Falklands was set up on Monday no "major Argentine warship" had entered the zone. The spokesman said he had no authoritative report concerning the Argentine claim that two motor torpedo boats penetrated the 200 mile area around the Falklands earlier this week.

The statement read: "Since the maritime exclusion zone was established no Argentine major warship or naval auxiliary has entered the zone. "Indeed, our reports have confirmed that the vast majority of their navy has either remained or returned to Argentine mainland ports.

"This situation has not changed, but there are some indications which suggest that some elements of the Argentine fleet may come out of harbour and in that case we would expect them to sail south. If they put ships to sea we can only speculate on their intentions in the present dangerous situation, but in the light of their undoubted knowledge of British resolve and military capabilities we do not believe they would risk breaching the zone.

"They may, however, sail close to the Argentine mainland and even skirt the maritime exclusion zone in an attempt to score some propaganda advantage and bolster up morale in Argentina."

INHABITANTS OF GIBRALTAR CONCERNED OVER FUTURE

[Guy Rais dispatch: "Gibraltar Dockyard Disruption Planned"]

[Text] Gibraltar -- Gibraltar's dockyard workers plan disruptive action as soon as the Falklands crisis is resolved. Mr Joe Bessano of the Gibraltar Socialist Workers Party and leader of the Transport and General Workers Union said: "We have no intention of exploiting Britain's difficulty in the Falkland Islands and any British Naval vessel which puts into harbour will be given every facility while the crisis lasts."

Some 3,000 workers are employed in the dockyard and under terms of closure some 1,000 jobs will be lost. The Trades Council has confirmed its opposition to the replacement of the naval yard by a private operator and has pledged to fight the closure. The announcement in the Commons last November of the dockyard closure next March, followed by Spain's agreement three months ago to lift the "siege" of the Rock in return for talks on the colony's future, has upset almost all the 30,000 inhabitants.

They see the dockyard closure as the first possible step in a change of sovereignty of Gibraltar which has been a British possession for 278 years. Mr Bessano, a minority labor member in Gibraltar's assembly (local parliament) who has rigorously opposed moves towards any integration with Spain, and who attended talks on the dockyard's future in London recently, said: "Any deal Britain makes with Argentina over the Falkland Islands could seriously affect Gibraltor's future. Spain would be quick to exploit the situation, undermining Britain's position." He claimed that Britain's decision to offer the dockyard to a commercial firm was "tantamount to political blackmail." "I believe Spain will offer to put business in the way of any commercial firm which takes over the dockyard in return for some consessions by the British Government," he said.

Mr Bessano described as a "substantial carrot" Britain's offer of a 25 million pound subsidy to any commercial firm which kept the naval yard going. "If the government wanted to keep the yard for the navy we could use this subsidy to retain control," he said.

"We offered to accept cut-backs and take in private work next year in the naval yard to cut down the 10 milliin pound subsidy which the government estimates it costs to run the naval docks. But all our suggestions have been rejected. What will happen in future years if the government's subsidy to a commercial firm is swallowed up and profits fall? The firm will pull out and the yard will be in total jeopardy."

Mr Bessano said he was still hopeful that the British Government might rescind its decision in the light of conventional ships needed for the Falkland Islands. "The whole question of the dockyard has been put back into the melting pot and it is vital that the dockyard remains in the navy's hands."

Sir Joshua Hassan, Gibraltar's chief minister, yesterday rejected Mr Bessano's assertion that Gibraltar might lose its soveriegnty and accused him of making political capital out of the issue.

Gibraltar's police force has been increased by 25 men in anticipation of a possible crime wave when the frontier is reopened in June, 13 years after it was shut by Spain. Many Gibraltarians never lock their doors and leave their cars open as there is virtually no crime on the Rock. But with many thousands of visitors expected, both British and Spanish, tighter security will be in force.

DENKTAS CITES CONCLUSIONS AFTER GENEVA MEETING

Denktas said that during his talks with the UN secretary general it was agreed that the pace of the intercommunal talks should be accelerated. Denktas added that he expressed his views to the UN secretary general to the effect that a solution could be reached through the intercommunal talks if both sides acknowledged [words indistinct], the geographic situation and the realities in Cyprus.

Recalling that the Turkish Cypriot community desired the establishment of a bizonal, bicommunal and federal republic in Cyprus, Denktas said that this principle was agreed upon during the agreements of 1975 and the summit meetings of 1977.

Denktas said that he expected to meet once more with Perez de Cuellar in New York in June in a bid to reassess the developments in the intercommunal talks. He added that this would not be a summit meeting.

SPOKESMAN DENIES KIPRIANOU-DENKTAS MEETING SET

NC141047 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 14 Apr 82

[Text] In answer to a question on whether there will be a Kiprianou-Denktas meeting in June, the government spokesman has stated that no question of a summit meeting has been raised.

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS PARTICIPANTS REPORT

[Text] Another meeting was held at the Ledra Palace Hotel today within the framework of the inter-Cypriot talks. In a written statement; Mr Gobbi, special envoy of the UN secretary general in Cyprus, said that Mr Perez de Cuellar's recent meetings with President Kiprianou and Mr Kenktas in Rome and Geneva have created a favorable atmosphere for the talks. He said that both the secretary general and Mr Gobbi find encouraging the fact that all three parties have described the talks as useful and have agreed to accelerate them.

The statement adds that the talks are again the focus of efforts for a fair and lasting settlement of the Cyprus problem and that the UN secretary general will not hesitate -- if found necessary -- to undertake a more active role in the talks. The statement also says that, as announced, there will be a further appraisal of the situation in June when the two leaders meet again with the UN secretary general. In the meantime, the statement adds, Mr Gobbi will continue to exercise his good offices on behalf of the UN secretary general. In conclusion, the statement says that Mr Gobbi expresses the hope that the good climate created by the Rome and the Geneva meetings will contribute to the progress of the talks.

Answering a question on the meaning of the acceleration of the inter-Cypriot talks, the UN press spokesman said that there will be serious consultations aimed at having more frequent meetings but, he added, it is up to the interlocutors to fix the number of necessary meetings.

In his statement, the Greek Cypriot representative at the talks, Mr Ioannidhis, said that during today's meeting discussion was to be continued on the three basic freedoms, which is a difficult question on which we attach great importance, he said.

Referring to the Rome and Geneva meetings, Mr Ioannidhis said that our side favors acceleration of the talks and that the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus is expected to suggest to the two sides ways to achieve this. Mr Ioannidhis expressed the hope that the acceleration of the talks will begin as soon as next week.

The Turkish Cypriot interlocutor, Mr Onan, also said that during the meeting discussion was to be continued on the three basic freedoms. On the question of accelerating the talks, Mr Onan said that in principle the Turkish Cypriot side does not object to their acceleration, provided they will be fruitful and really productive. He also said that in the future there will probably be six to eight meetings a month.

A UN communique says that during today's meeting the intercommunal talks were continued according to the agenda that had been agreed and that further discussions were held on the issues of freedom of movement, freedom of settlement and the right to own property. The next meeting will be on Wednesday, 21 April.

LIBYA MAY USE OIL TO PAY ARREARS TO TRADERS

[Text] The possibility [of] Libya paying with oil for the 20 million pounds arrears which Libyan importers owe to Cypriot traders is one of the subjects to be discussed when a Cyprus trade delegation headed by the director general of the Ministry of Commerce and Industry, Mr M. Erotokritos, goes to Tripoli.

The inclusion of the director of the oil refinery in the delegation indicates that discussions will take place on the matter.

The visit of the Cyprus delegation [to] negotiate improved trade traffic between Cyprus and Libya and the payment of the outstanding debt, mostly clothing, was arranged during the visit last month of Foreign Minister Mr Rolandhis.

The members of the delegation could go during the weekend provided Al-Qadhdhafi's administration signals its approval for the timing.

The delegation includes representatives from the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Finance, members of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry and of the Employers Federation, the director of the oil refinery and officials of the Ministry of Commerce and Industry. The director general, Mr M. Erotokritos, will head the delegation.

Informed sources commenting on the possible oil deal pointed out that there are snags about the price which will have to be overcome. Libyan oil is $35.50 per barrel and the international price now is only $28, a difference of $7.50. It is estimated that this difference would mean for Cyprus an extra 2.5 million pounds on the cost of oil from Libya compared with the international price. Cyprus imported 11.2 million pounds worth of Libyan oil in 1981.

PAPANDREOU SPEAKS AT AHEPA LUNCHEON IN ATHENS

NC150646 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1800 GMT 14 Apr 82

[Excerpts] Speaking at a banquet given in his honor today by the visiting delegation of the American Hellenic Educational and Progressive Association [AHEPA], Prime Minister Papandreou asked for the support of U.S. Hellenism so our country can overcome the difficult times it is facing. [passage indistinct] The banquet was attended by Coordination Minister Lazaris, Minister to Prime Minister Koutsoyiorgas, Deputy Foreign Minister Papoulias, Deputy Minister to the Prime Minister Maroudhas, Deputy Minister of National Education and Religious Moralis and U.S. Ambassador in Athens Stearns.

Earlier, the prime minister was addressed by AHEPA Supreme President Coffinas, who praised Mr Papandreou's personality. Replying to the AHEPA supreme president's address, Prime Minister Papandreou said:

[Begin recording] I have been indeed looking forward to this meeting with the leadership of Hellenism in the United States. However, I must admit that I did not expect to be so moved by your very kind (?words). You have said that you really feel at ease with me, as I feel at ease with you, because we both have -- [word indistinct] you and myself -- many common experiences, struggles. Both you and we, apparently, began our careers in America, sometimes under difficult conditions, later under easier ones. We are linked with these common experiences and the fact that really in this big country -- America -- our nationality, our origins have not been an obstacle to the development of our personalities and careers.

I have been very touched by your words. I truly feel that as prime minister of this country I am shouldering at this difficult period mainly and primarily the defense of our country's national interests and of Hellenism in general. Really, our country is passing through a particularly difficult period, I will not go any further. Cyprus is under partial occupation -- 36.4 percent of the Megalonisos is under Turkish occupation. In the Aegean, we are faced with the threat of an expansionist Turkey, and we are trying in every possible way -- words, public opinion, friendly countries abroad -- to create the essential support to confront the national dangers. At the same time, we depend on the forces of our great people, who are determined to defend the country's sovereign rights and preserve justice for our race.

Mr President and friends of AHEPA, I must say that we see Greece as the metropolis of Hellenism, which extends throughout the world -- Australia, Canada and northern Europe but mainly in the United States, where there are 3 million Americans of Greek origin. [Passage indistinct] we really believe that this Hellenism in particular -- the Hellenism of America, a powerful country, on the decisions of which mankind's very survival depends -- that on this bastion, without wanting to ignore in any way the fact that as American citizens you have obligations toward the (?policy) of the country, without wanting to ignore all this, we believe that your presence, your support for the great problems our country is facing may be the key to overcoming the national problems, national crisis and consolidation of peace in the area, for safeguarding this country's borders, for liberation and independence of Cyprus.

On this occasion I would like to express to you, on behalf of the Greek Government, our gratitude for your support until now. We follow your work closely and we know how significant your contribution to the major, top-priority issue of Cyprus has been. We must say -- because I always like to tell the truth in all directions -- that mother Greece has not behaved toward you in the manner and generosity which it should have demonstrated to its sons who succeeded in [words indistinct] at the most difficult parts of the world. So, while I ask you to forgive the state for its omissions and mistakes, at the same time I assure you that my government will do whatever possible to strengthen the ties -- [words indistinct] I have also said to you privately we are little, we are suffering a little from loneliness because our race does not have close cousins and brothers; we must extend the hand beyond the continents and great seas and together, united, be able to (?perfect) the independence and sovereignty of this country and offer on a worldwide scale what we also offered the past -- democracy and dignity. [end recording]

TURKMEN CONDEMNS ISRAELI ACTIONS IN TERRITORIES

In an opening speech Turkmen recalled that unarmed and innocent people as well as holy places were faced with attacks in Israeli-occupied Jerusalem. He pointed out that the aggressive policy pursued by Israel prevented the achievement of peace and stability in the Middle East, something wanted for years, and that it led to escalation of tension in the region. He described as ruthless Israel's moves to force the Arab and Palestinian people in the occupied territories to emigrate, its policies of settlement and annexation in these lands and its oppression and cruelty to the people in the region.

Turkmen said the latest incident in which religious sites were attacked in Jerusalem has caused deep sorrow. Turkmen said: The Islamic world, which is based on humanitarian values such as human love, friendship and mutual respect, must prove that it is unified again today in order to protest the [words indistinct] in occupied Jerusalem and oppose the methods of oppression and suppression aimed at the Muslims. Turkmen said that by pursuing an expansionist and aggressive policy in the region, Israel was trying to eliminate the just national [word indistinct] of the Palestinian people.

Noting that Turkey was on the side of the Arab cause, both in the international field and in bilateral relations, Turkmen said: The Turkish nation is aware and proud that it has a historic role and responsibility for the protection of Jerusalem, the Palestinian lands and the Arab and Islamic (?demands). Foreign Minister Turkmen stated that for the stability and security of the Middle East, the Palestinian problem must have a just, all-inclusive and lasting solution. He said Turkey was convinced that the problem would be resolved, sooner or later, in a way the Palestinians wanted.

Turkmen concluded by saying: Today we declare before world opinion that we are in unity and solidarity with our Palestinian brothers -- whom Israel is trying to keep under oppression and fear -- and with the Islamic countries that pray for the Palestinians' holy struggle and that are in moral and spiritual solidarity with the Palestinians. We call on the world community to take effective measures to ensure that Israel withdraws from the occupied holy Jerusalem and Arab lands, that it abides by the UN resolutions and that it stops, before it is too late, its provocations in the West Bank and southern Lebanon. After Turkmen, representatives of Saudi Arabia, Libya, Jordan and the PLO addressed the meeting and thanked Turkey for its support for the Palestinian cause.

ANKARA RECEIVES GREEK REPLY ON W. THRACE NOTE

[Text] The Greek Government's reply to Turkey's note regarding efforts to nationalize the registered lands of the Western Thrace Turks has been delivered to the Turkish Foreign Ministry. The reply, which was delivered by the Greek ambassador to Oktay Cankardes, Foreign Ministry deputy under secretary, notes that the rights of the Western Thrace Turks are protected by the Greek Constitution and other laws. The Greek Government's reply says there are no Turks in Western Thrace, only a Muslim minority, and that they are equal Greek citizens.

Replying to journalists, Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman said the concept of equality mentioned in Greece's reply exists so far only on paper and that Turkey wants to see this equality exist in reality. Akiman said the attitude of the Turkish Government will be determined in view of the Greek Government's reply and the developments in Iskece [Xhanti].

GENSCHER: BONN PLEASED WITH U.S. ARMS MOVES

[Text] Bonn, 15 Apr (DPA) -- Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today received Ambassador Paul Nitze, head of the U.S. delegation at the Geneva negotiations with the Soviet Union on the limitation of medium-range weapons, for detailed talks. According to the Foreign Office, he expressed the satisfaction of the government at the "serious and responsible" conduct of the U.S. delegation, particularly in representing the positions worked out jointly within the alliance.

He said the Federal Government attaches "great importance" to the zero option put forward by Washington, that is, to the bilateral renunciation of medium-range weapons. The hopes of all the peoples of Europe are pinned to this Western negotiating proposal. The government expects that the Soviet Union will no longer close its mind to this proposal. Genscher expressed concern about the Soviet attempt to include the weapons systems of third states in the negotiations. This represents a complication that could draw out the negotiations, while it is the aim of the West to bring the negotiations to an end with positive results as soon as possible.

The foreign minister also told Nitze that he and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt pointed out to the Soviet Union at every possible opportunity that only a specific outcome to negotiations in terms of a bilateral renunciation of medium-range weapons can make deployment of the planned U.S. systems on the Western side superfluous. A significant attempt to achieve real disarmament is represented, in Genscher's view, by Washington's plant to conduct the hoped-for negotiations on intercontinental strategic systems (START) not only with the aim of limiting the systems but also with the aim of achieving a "significant reduction."

Ambassador Nitze will be received on Friday in Hamburg by Chancellor Schmidt for detailed talks, it was announced tonight by a government spokesman. The talks will center on the assessment and present state of the Geneva negotiations and on Western positions for its continuation, scheduled for 20 May.

BUNDESTAG DELEGATION VISITS DISARMAMENT COMMITTEE

[Text] Geneva, 15 Apr (DPA) -- Egon Bahr, chairman of the Bundestag subcommittee on disarmament and arms control, spoke here today in favor of U.S.-Soviet contacts on disarmament at the highest level. The fate of the forthcoming UN General Assembly special session on disarmament depends primarily on whether direct contact between U.S. President Ronald Reagan and Soviet head of state Leonid Brezhnev takes place, Bahr said. Bahr is on a 1-day factfinding visit to the international disarmament committee. CDU/CSU foreign policy spokesman Alois Mertes is one of the group of Bundestag deputies led by Bahr.

According to Bahr, the basic problem of all disarmament efforts is the fact "that the political ability to solve arms control problems takes more time than the technical ability to create new weapons systems." Politics lag behind and are constantly being overtaken by new developments.

On efforts to ban chemical weapons, Bahr said it is "reasonable, if necessary first of all, to ban chemical weapons in both German states." Mertes reaffirmed the demand for a complete and verifiable ban on chemical weapons. On the basis of an initiative by the CDU/CSU parliamentary group, he advocated a zero option to end the present situation of 10 - 1 in favor of the East in chemical weapons.

The Bundestag delegation took part in a session of the international disarmament committee, to which 40 states belong. Later the German delegates met for separate talks with the delegation leaders of several countries, including Soviet Ambassador Viktor Israelyan.

GOVERNMENT SETS IMPORT BAN ON ARGENTINE GOODS

[Text] Bonn, 15 Apr (DPA) -- Effective immediately, Argentinian goods may not be imported. The Federal Economics Ministry today approved two instructions by the EEC Commission halting the import of all products of Argentinian origin. The ministry said this afternoon that the instructions come into force with their publication in the official gazette of the European Community on 16 April. They will initially remain in force until 17 May. Exempted from the import ban are goods supplied under existing contracts and those already being shipped.

BANK OFFICIAL RECEIVED IN MOSCOW BY KOSTANDOV

[Text] Moscow, 15 Apr (DPA) -- The spokesman of the board of the Deutschebank, Friedrich Wilhelm Christians, was received in Moscow today by Leonid Kostandov, deputy chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers. Christians, who is on a factfinding tour of the Soviet Union, and Kostandov, chairman of the German-Soviet economic commission, discussed, according to the Soviets, possibilities for economic cooperation between the two countries.

It was said that the talks, attended by the head of the Soviet state bank, Alkhimov, also touched on problems of financing deals between companies in the FRG and the USSR. In connection with the Western European-Soviet natural gas deal, the Deutschebank is leading the consortium entrusted with advance financing of the pipeline construction.

The Soviets were angry at the beginning of the year, when the consortium, with the events in Poland in mind, rejected a 100-percent refinancing of the first payments of DM300 million to the group. Afterwards, in February, French banks granted 100-percent financing in connection with the Soviet-French part of the gas deal. This annoyed German banking circles.

SCHMIDT RAPS U.S.-FRG MEDIA ANTIGOVERNMENT MOOD

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 15 Apr (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is convinced that "those Social Democrats who would rather go into opposition will remain in a very small minority at the national party conference." In a ZDF Television interview, Schmidt went on to say that at the party conference he and Chairman Willy Brandt will show those who would prefer to go into opposition what they will be putting at stake if there were no social-liberal coalition in Bonn. A CDU/CSU government would give priority to the second part of the NATO dual decision -- a nuclear arms build-up in Western Europe. There would not be anything left of the willingness to negotiate with the Soviet Union -- the "partnership between opponents."

Asked about the present disapproval of the SPD, Schmidt stressed that after the 1982 summer break there all "still 2 whole parliamentary years ahead of us." "We will work in these 2 years, and I am quite certain we will work successfully." Public moods are partially manipulated. "At present I can see that the German media is working together with U.S. media to denigrate the reputation, the standing of the Federal Government. That will come to an end again. One cannot keep on belly-aching forever."

MITTERRAND ADDRESSES EMPEROR'S BANQUET IN TOKYO

OW160537 Tokyo NHK Television Network in Japanese 1213 GMT 15 Apr 82

[Speech by President Francois Mitterrand at Imperial Palace banquet in Tokyo -- live; Mitterrand in French followed by passage-by-passage translation]

[Text] Your Majesty the Emperor, Your Majesty the Empress: In your great capital city tonight I am deeply appreciative of the wonderful hospitality Your Majesties have accorded to my colleagues since my wife and I arrived in Tokyo yesterday. We feel we are wrapped in the warmth of the words just given by Your Majesty the Emperor, your care and attention, and this delicate ceremony, which represents the essence of Japanese hospitality. All this, I believe, is testimony of the bonds of good will and friendship binding the peoples of Japan and France.

Sixty years have passed since Your Majesty visited our country for the first time. Later, in 1971, Your Majesty again visited France along with Her Majesty the Empress. As for me, since I have had the opportunity to visit your country twice in the past several years, my eyes have been opened to your country and I have felt the goodness of your country. But, today I have the honor of being the French Republic's first president to pay an official visit to Japan. Tonight I feel honored to be invited to this new palace, whose solemnity, harmony and unadorned grandeur seem to symbolize the art and the soul of Japan.

Our countries are among the nations with the longest histories in the world. We have built our two countries, which are among the oldest countries in history. Both of us have no fears about the future. We have rich histories and are blessed with a bright future. Our two countries have made the common choice of building up the free world and possessing modern technology, while basing ourselves on our own culture. Inview of the common desire of the two countries, their similarity and uniqueness in various fields and the uncertainty of the international situation surrounding them. I believe we must make giant strides in relations between our two countries. At this new palace, I would like to call for a new start in French-Japanese relations and exchanges. I think our two countries must do many things in order to understand each other in the true sense of the world and to continue to understand each other. Cooperation in the community of industrialized nations and in the Third World -- this is a necessary and pressing task. This is because there is a great need for such cooperation.

Tonight I would like to lay particular stress on the need for dialogue between our two countries in the cultural field. The cultures of our two countries have similarities and, of course, differences. They are similar in that they are alive with traditions and yet are tied to the present. But our two cultures are different in content, in art forms and values which they try to convey. I think a dialogue between our two countries in the cultural field is not only possible but would also be fruitful. This is clear from my encounters and contacts since yesterday, and it will become clearer from future encounters and contacts and various events which will be interwoven with my current visit. This will be made all the more clear in the future.

However, as momentum for this kind of exhcnage, I earnestly hope that during my current stay in Japan a wide-ranging dialogue in the true sense of the word will begin between our two countries and will be continued thereafter. This dialogue has just begun today, but I think our eyes are focused on the Paris summit and the coming UN General Assembly session. In the name of the French people, I pray for the happiness and prosperity of the Japanese people. I propose a toast to the health of Your Majesty the Emperior and Your Majesty the Empress, who are revered by all the Japanese people as the symbol of their unity. Please join with me.

LE MONDE VIEWS RESULTS OF SRV MINISTER'S VISIT

[Editorial: "Dialogue Between Paris and Hanoi"]

[Text] The Vietnamese foreign minister's visit to Paris marked an undoubted rapprochement between France and Vietnam. At least Mr Nguyen Co Thach met with attentive interlocutors who were anxious to listen to him. Mr Claude Cheysson, who had had a meeting lasting nearly 5 hours with him on Friday, planned to see him again on a private basis before he left the French capital.

However, although there is a determination to talk -- the French external relations minister has even accepted in principle an invitation to visit Hanoi -- the areas of agreement are still limited. The most obvious ones are to be found in the sphere of bilateral relations and it does not seem that the Vietnamese regime's concept of human rights and respect for them was an obstacle to dialogue for French diplomacy.

In any case both sides are expressing satisfaction and the joint commissions of experts are being entrusted with the job of completing the agreements on principles which have been reached. This is true of the rescheduling of the Vietnamese debt and the plans for cooperation in the sectors of light industry, energy, transport and cultural and scientific exchanges.

In the same spirit, the "human cases" do not raise any insoluble problems since the Hanoi government says it is prepared to gradually grant exit visas to those of its residents who wish to come to France. For its part France has announced that aid in the form of 6,000 tons of grain will be supplied to Vietnam. Finally, and this is more of an innovation, there are plans for regular consultations on political questions to be held between senior officials from the two countries' foreign ministries.

However it is on that political level that there is still a wide gap between Paris and Hanoi. In what was probably a highly diplomatic spirit Mr Cheysson felt able to say that "there is agreement between us in hoping that the Kampuchean people will one day be able to express themselves freely without internal or external threat." However he added, "our positions are different on the means of attaining that."

For his part Mr Thach stated that the question of France recognizing the pro-Vietnamese regime in Phnom Penh "was not raised." And although he spoke of a possible contribution by France to the search for peace in Southeast Asia, he did so while trusting to the French Government's "capacity for imagination." If agreement does exist, according to Mr Thach, it is on the view that the problems of that part of the world should be settled "by the countries in the region." But French diplomacy does not feel any more capable of taking an initiative now than it did before.

Moreover, according to the Vietnamese foreign minister, the only real obstacle to peace in Southeast Asia is China, toward which he was very harsh, accusing Beijing of systematically maintaining tension in the region and of maintaining "the tools of its expansionism" there.

It goes without saying that, in that view of international relations, the Vietnamese diplomat could not allow any hint of the slightest cloud in relations between Hanoi and Moscow, although Mr Thach refused to admit that a "military alliance" proper binds his country to the USSR.

FIRMS DENY ISRAELI REPORTS OF SYRIAN ARMS DEALS

[Excerpts] Rome, 16 Apr (ANSA) -- A rain of denials from the managing directors of three Italian defense contractors and aeronautics companies fell Thursday on a story published by the Tel Aviv daily MA'ARIV reporting that negotiations were underway between the Italian firms and an Arab company for the construction of a missile plant in Syria and the sale of military helicopters to the Arab state.

According to the account filed from Paris by MA'ARIV correspondent (Tamara Golan), run in the Thursday edition, the Italian firms of Snia Viscosa and Aermacchi and the head of a company, identified only by his last name, (Camposampiero), which manufactures missiles and helicopters, were dealing for the Syrian contract with T.A.G., an Arab company owned by the Saudi Arabian multimillionaire, (Akram Hodja). The story said that T.A.G. was operating as the purchasing agent for the Damascus government in the armaments sector.

The managing director of BPD Defense and Space, a subsidiary of the Snia Viscosa group, (Giuseppe Sirignani), strongly declared that there was no basis whatsoever for the support when asked by ANSA to comment on the MA'ARIV story. He went on to point out that BPD Defense and Space manufactures rockets, projectiles and propellants but not missiles of any type. A similar denial of any knowledge of dealings along these lines came from (Ermanno Bazzocchi), the managing director of Aermacchi, manufacturers of training jets and ground support aircraft but not of helicopters. (Bazzocchi) excluded "in the most absolute fashion that the story could have any basis in fact or that (his company) has ever had dealings or relations with either Syria or T.A.G."

The Italian managing directed identified in the MA'ARIV piece as (Camposampiero) is (Corrado Camposampiero), the head of Siai-Marchetti, a subsidiary of the Agusta group and controlled by the state-owned EFIM. Siai-Marchetti manufactures fixed-wing aircraft and helicopter parts for the parent company, Agusta. After denying any ties with T.A.G. (Camposampiero) said that he had run across the name of the Arab company once as a formula one racing sponsor. Also a spokesman for Agusta, not cited in the MA'ARIV article, said that the Italian helicopter manufacturer has never entered into negotiations with either Syria or the Saudi based company for the sales or production of helicopters.

2-MONTH FIGURES RELEASED ON PRODUCTION INDEX

[Text] Rome, 16 Apr (ANSA) -- The erratic trend of the Italian production index was confirmed by the latest figures released by the National Statistics Institute (ISTAT), which reported a 1.3 percent climb in output in February, as compared to February last year, but a 0.4 percent decline for the first two months of the year taken together. Since last summer, the production index has zigged and zagged between a 0.4 percent incraase for the November-January period and an 8.1 percent spurt reported for the September-November quarter.

ESCAPED WOMAN TERRORIST ARRESTED IN TURIN

SOARES' CHANGE OF POLICY ON ALLIANCE CRITICIZED

[Text] Mario Soares' interview on channel 2, far from dispelling the studied ambiguities and deliberate equivocations which have been characterizing the Socialist Party [PS] leadership group's most recent stances, served above all to confirm that the PS secretary general is persisting in a stance which, prompted by distinct interests and aimed at previous goals, is clearly inappropriate and contrary to the urgent emerging needs of the current political situation.

In fact the interview confirmed again that, if, on one hand, it is true that the PS secretary general is today asserting very different, and even contrary, things from those he asserted systematically for months at a stretch, it is also true that at the level of the practical consequences of the current PS stance on the central problem of necessary political solutions, a real and actual collaborationism with the "Democratic Alliance" persists.

It has not been too long since Mario Soares used to proclaim (as fervently as the "Democratic Alliance") that the "Democratic Alliance" was entitled to govern for 4 years. Today, in words, he deems it certain that this will not be the case. It has not been too long since Mario Soares and other PS leaders, at every crisis of the "Democratic Alliance" and its governments, immediately hastened diligently to offer understanding and protection. Today, in words, M. Soares is emphasizing the "Democratic Alliance's" difficulties as demonstrating its failure and making a show of repeating that, if it depended on the PS, the "Democratic Alliance" government would not last even 1 more day.

It has not been too long since Mario Soares used to describe the proposal for dissolution of the Assembly of the Republic before the completion of the revision of the constitution as an attempt at "subversion of the institutions." Today he is stating wisely that revision of the constitution will not fail to continue later with the new assembly. It has not been too long since Mario Soares, as regards the demand for dismissal of the government, used to brandish immediately the specter of "destabilization," and PORTUGAL HOJE was obliquely warning the president of the republic of the terrible responsibilities he would shoulder if he were responsive to that demand. Today, in words, Mario Soares is calmly acknowledging that the dismissal of the government is within the president's legitimate authority.

It has not been too long (12 February is recent) since the PS' principal struggle was against those who were struggling against the "Democratic Alliance" and its policy of national disaster. Today it is curbing its hostile words toward the workers movement and the PCP and accusing the "Democratic Alliance" of conducting a policy of national disaster. It has not been too long since the PS used to become indignant and speak of unacceptable acts of interference when the president of the republic expressed grave anxieties about the solutions initiated in the process of revision of the constitution. Today, in words, Mario Soares is accepting the need for the PS to heed suggestions from the president as regards revision of that state body's powers.

But if something has changed in Mario Soares' words and in the PS' public stances, it is clearly neither because the PS leadership's underlying policy and basic aims have changed nor because its agreements with the "Democratic Alliance," specifically on revision of the constitution, have disappeared. The move from yesterday's words and acts of collaboration to today's words, which are tougher and more critical toward the "Democratic Alliance," is happening in the PS' language because of the militant action by the workers movement, the PCP's tireless activity and firmness, the extensive condemnation of the PS-"Democratic Alliance" agreements on the revision of the constitution, the workers' struggle, the magnificent mass mobilization, the success and lessons of the 12 February general strike, the extraordinary expression of popular discontent and the winning over of an ever-increasing number of Portuguese people to the conviction that the ousting of the "Democratic Alliance" government and an early election are the only democratic and constitutional solution appropriate to the depth and gravity of the political, economic and social crisis into which the "Democratic Alliance" has plunged the country.

In short, encountering grave obstacles and opposition to consumating the plans for alliance with the "Democratic Alliance" in matters crucial to the life of democracy, and becoming aware that shameless capitulationism would result for the PS, even at the electoral level, in a considerable disaster, the leadership group decided to endorse in words the popular discontent, to feign firm opposition to the "Democratic Alliance," and to adopt outwardly something of the central demands of the people's movement and of the most consistent democratic forces, but in terms that do not facilitate their real satisfaction.

So the major and real aim of this new stance is not the rapid ousting of the "Democratic Alliance" from the government and an effective democratic solution guaranteed by means of an election, but essentially: First, to conceal with a smokescreen of tough accusations against the "Democratic Alliance" the agreements with the "Democratic Alliance" in the revision of the constitution, which have not been altered, specifically as regards the crucial problem of the government's control and manipulation of the armed forces and of the president of the republic's powers and constitutional status; second, to latch onto the popular discontent in order to regain ground, positions and popular support, without at the same time committing oneself and shouldering responsibilities or making real efforts to mobilize the necessary and urgent solutions. Mario Soares' interview, amid stunts, ruses, nuances and ambiguities, fully confirmed this.

It is thus that Mario Soares was seen and heard to accept the Balsemao government's dismissal -- but immediately also accept that another "Democratic Alliance" government could be formed. It is thus that Mario Soares was seen and heard to accept the dissolution of the Assembly of the Republic before the completion of the revision of the constitution -- but immediately not only give clear priority to the revision of the constitution but display great impatience that it be completed soon.

It is thus that Mario Soares was neither seen nor heard to emphasize the need, once the "Democratic Alliance" government has been dismissed, to ensure the formation of a caretaker government to guarantee elections under democratic conditions. It is thus that Mario Soares was seen and heard to acknowledge that the "Democratic Alliance's" parliamentary majority no longer corresponds to the electorate's political will -- and immediately state that the existence of a parliamentary majority would be an "obstacle" to the president of the republic's possible decisions. It is thus that Mario Soares was seen and heard to accuse the "Democratic Alliance" of wishing to remain in power at all costs -- and not mention that the transfer (proposed by the PS) to the government of the president of the republic's military powers would mean offering the "Democratic Alliance" a crucial instrument for its remaining in power unlawfully.

And it is thus that Mario Soares was seen and heard to cry out against the "Democratic Alliance's" policy of national disaster -- while refusing to endorse clearly the undeferrable solutions to end the "Democratic Alliance's" policy of national disaster. And it is thus that Mario Soares was seen and heard to say that the "Democratic Alliance" government would not last even another day through the PS' will -- while refusing a clear and effective political contribution by the PS to ensuring that that national will (and the PS' alleged will) is respected.

FALKLANDS DEPUTY GOVERNOR BACK; DESCRIBES SCENE

[By Roger Williams]

[Text] Hungry Argentinian soldiers were begging the Falklanders for food, Deputy Governor Mr Dick Baker said tonight when he arrived in London after ordered off the island. Rations did not seem to be getting through to the troops, and the islanders, who were showing passive resistance, he said, were being asked for supplies. "They come to the doors; they came to mine. They told me in sign language what they wanted. They looked very miserable. People are giving them food, as we did. As my wife said, it could be your own son standing there," said Mr Baker, who flew back to Britain with 30 other islanders.

About half had been ordered to leave and other had various reasons for going, he said. Mr Baker was given a de-briefing session with Foreign Office officials, led by Foreign Office Minister Cranley Onslow, before being allowed to speak to reporters at Gatwick Airport.

Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym in a BBC special broadcast to the islands tonight, said he was very concerned at the deportation of senior officials and administrators and was renewing his efforts to get an International Red Cross team on to the islands. "We understand that there is no ill-treatment but we are concerned that the senior administrators should have been withdrawn. "We are very worried about the Falklands Islanders. Almost everybody is thinking about them for part of the day. They are behind us in trying to get the Argentinian forces to withdraw, hopefully by peaceful means, but the principle of what is at sake is very well understood here," he said.

Mr Baker, whose official title is chief secretary, said the general attitude of the soldiers was "very correct." "They have tried to be correct, though invariably with a large force of young, some of them undisciplined, chaps around, there are going to be some lapses. There have been one or two mostly empty houses being broken into, and one or two garages with things stolen. It's just people who are curious, looking for souvenirs. But the Argentine officers take this very seriously, although they have difficulties in investigating."

He had heard no reports of any violence and declined to comment on whether islanders were putting up any active resistance or if they had managed to hide any arms. "There is what you might call passive resistance," he said. "What we have been doing is to maintain the essential services for the normal life of the islands to go on -- to do anything that is good for the Falkland Islanders. Morale is very good indeed. Morale among the occupying forces I am not so sure about."

Some areas had been barred to the islanders, but generally there was a certain amount of freedom to move around. The Argentinians claimed the islanders could leave if they wished, but this was a "catch 22" because they themsleves controlled all flights. He said the Falklanders were naturally "very cross and extremely upset" at the invasion, of which they had about 12 hours warning. "It was pretty clear something was going to happen. There were a number of us who still thought there wouldn't be an invasion even though we thought forces were massing. We thought it was a threat for us to come to the negotiating table. I still think it was a reasonable thing to think."

Mr Baker, who was at Government House during the invasion, said, "I take my hat off to the Royal Marines who were on the islands. They resisted as best they could until it got to the stage where the governor had his very difficult decision to make." He had seen one dead Argentinian, and three others wounded, though there had been reports of bodies being washed up.

The Argentinians had wanted him to leave with the governor, Mr Rex Hunt, but Mr Hunt won him a reprieve. "As senior member of the British administration, obviously the Argentines wouldn't want me there. I was under sentence of departure all the time I was there. Once they had their so-called governor sworn in, they told me I would have to leave. I got the Order of the Boot, you might say."

Mr Baker praised the media, in particular the BBC World Service, for the amount of news that was reaching the islanders. Of his own future, he said: "I certainly intend to go back if I can."

ADMIRAL DENIES PEER'S CLAIMS OF CARRIER DEFECTS

[Desmond Wettern report: "Defects in Hermes Denied"]

[Text] Admiral Sir Henry Leach, the first sea lord, last night denied a claim by the 81-year-old Labour peer, Lord Wigg, that the carrier Hermes, in the Falklands' task force, had "lost speed and has slowed down."

Hermes, 23,900 tons, "had no defects," Sir Henry declared. "She is fully operational and has no limitations on her speed nor any impediments in her full operating capability. Her capability has been augmented with the addition of further Sea Harrier fighters."

In Parliament yesterday Lord Wigg had gone on to say that in operating Sea Harrier fighters it would be necessary to increase the ship's speed. "We are virtually sending this force in with no effective air cover," he claimed.

But unlike conventional carrier aircraft, the Sea Harrier does not require a carrier to steam at full speed into the wind before launch. "Ski jump" ramps have been fitted in Hermes and Invincible, 19,500 tons, to enable the aircraft to take off with a heavier fuel and weapon load and the aircraft's radius of action is considerably greater than the 200 miles claimed by Lord Wigg.

BRITAIN SEEN IN 'STRONG POSITION' FOR SETTLEMENT

[Editorial: "Bargain From Strength"]

[Excerpts] The fact is that our position is a good deal stronger than it was a week ago. Things are going very well for us. No one can doubt that it is primarily the advance of the Royal Navy across the Atlantic, rather than the good offices of Mr Haig, which has provoked second thoughts in the Argentine Government. There is nothing to be gained and much to be lost by recalling the fleet now. If so much has been gained in a week, what might one or two more weeks achieve? It is true that Gen Galtieri must have his breaking point when he can offer no more concessions and still manage to survive politically. But it would be wrong to assume that he is necessarily incapable now of offering more substantial terms that he has done.

Part of the greatly improved position has been achieved through the frankly astonishing backing of other countries, firstly through the United Nations Security Council resolution, then through our friends in the Commonwealth, and finally from the European Community. Mrs Thatcher will also have been keenly aware of the effect of an over hasty and too generous compromise on her own survival and that of her government. As it is, the policies of her government have greatly strengthened our position. Compromise now would go against all she has said and done and might harm her and her government irreparably.

GOVERNMENT UNHAPPY AT UN SPOKESMAN'S STATEMENT

[Text] In connection with reports carried by some papers on the terminology used in the UN press spokesman's statement in Cyprus the day before yesterday, it has been announced that as soon as it received the text of the statement, the government acted immediately and made representations to Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, because of the unacceptable use of the term "two leaders" and because of other terms included in the statement.

TURKISH CYPRIOTS RETURN GREEK CYPRIOT FUGITIVE

[Text] A 25-year-old Greek Cypriot, Ioannidhis Konstantinou (Piscalidhis), who crossed over to the Federated State after murdering his girl friend, (Christalla Moesseos), was today handed over to UNFICYP to be returned to the Greek Cypriot authorities.

The minister of foreign affairs and defense, Mr Atakol, said in a statement today that the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus was not a haven for criminals and for this reason (Piscalidhis) was being handed over to the Greek Cypriot administration. He stressed that the government of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus was against the free and unpunished circultion of people in one zone after committing a crime in the other. He said that the authorities in both zones should take measures against such incidents. Mr Atakol finally called on the Greek Cypriot administration to adopt the same policies and hand over Turkish Cypriots who were wanted for criminal actions in the Turkish Cypriot zone and had crossed over to the Greek Cypriot zone.

ATAKOL OPPOSES TIES BY NORTH WITH ISRAEL

[Text] The government spokesman and minister of foreign affairs and defense, Mr Atakol, has said that the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus has always been anxious to prevent the establishment of any commercial, economic or cultural relations with Israel. Mr Atakol was announcing today the decision of the Council of Ministers adopted last night. He said that the Federated State had always seriously condemned and will continue to condemn every unjust and antagonistic Israeli act against Arabs, and especially Palestinians.

He added that information had been received that some commercial establishments had indirectly established relations with Israel without any decision or approval by the Federated State Government. He stressed that the Council of Ministers had decided to emphasize once again its determination to prevent the establishment of any commercial, economic or cultural relations with Israel and to strongly condemn the increasing Israeli acts of injustices and antagonism against the Palestinians.

PAPANDREOU QUESTIONED ON EC, NATO MEMBERSHIP

PM150909 Brussels LE SOIR in French 1 Apr 82 p 7

[Maroun Labaki interview with Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou -- date and place not given]

[Text] [Question] Prime Minister, at a summit meeting on Tuesday you presented your proposals for the modification of Greece's EEC membership treaty. What exactly did you tell your counterparts?

[Answer] I presented them with the memorandum with which they are already familiar. I said that Mr Karamanlis' decision, as prime minister, to request Common Market membership for Greece was a political decision and that our decision to request a new statute for Greece within the EEC framework is also a political decision. As a Mediterranean and southern European country, Greece faces problems it cannot resolve within the framework of a club for the wealthy of Europe. The rules of the Treaty of Rome are rules for advanced industrial economies, and so there is a North-South problem. This problem is now a Greek problem; tomorrow it will be a Portuguese and Spanish problem.

If we want a broad EEC, including southern Europe, the EEC rules must be changed. Indeed, it is impossible for us to observe them all if we want to attain our aim, which is the implementation of our own economic and social program. I have not yet told them what we would do if they refused our proposals. It is not a matter of blackmail; if they do not understand our problem, we shall see what should be done. I must add that the European Council has accepted our porposal that the [EC] Commission examine our memorandum and that in May it submit its recommendations to the foreign ministers. There will then be a dialogue between the Greek Government and the council or the commission. That will depend on the nature of the issues in question.

[Question] Are you in favor of a two-speed Europe?

[Answer] You see, I really believe that if there are rules that apply to everyone in the EC -- rules suitable for the advanced economies -- the disparity between living standards in the North and South will increase. This is what has happened in Italy, with its southern problem. The alternative, for the South, is to find a solution outside the EC. A two-speed Europe is therefore conceivable, and this is what we are going to examine.

[Question] Is there not some mistrust among Greek Socialists with regard to the idea of Europe?

[Answer] As a Socialist, it is impossible for me not to recognize that at present the EC is a club of capitalist countries. Except for the Common Agricultural Policy, Europe is a customs union which guarantees freedom of movement for capital and the workforce, which gives advanced capitalism the opportunity to accumulate even more capital. The EC is not a federation with a responsibility for underprivileged regions. There is no community conscience to protect and improve the lot of the poor regions, since regional funds are only a small part of the budget. Furthermore, EC policy does not particularly favor the workers or the underprivileged classes.

Last, I cannot accept a discussion of Europe restricted solely to Western Europe. As far as we are concerned, you cannot talk about a united and federal Europe if you limit the concept to Western Europe. We are opposed to both the Warsaw Pact and NATO in this respect. The attainment of this united Europe will not happen soon -- we are realists -- but we must prepare our way of thinking and always bear in mind that there is the major problem of the division of Europe.

[Question] Are you optimistic or pessimistic about the development of your relations with your community partners?

[Answers] I am optimistic about the Greek memorandum, but I am not optimistic about the community's future. We may now have reached deadlock on two questions: agricultural prices and the British budget contribution. I do not see how those problems could be solved.

[Question] NATO is a structure with which you do not identify. Do you plan to leave it?

[Answer] I don't want to give a firm answer to that question for tactical and strategic reasons. The problem of whether or not to remain in the Atlantic alliance's integrated military structure is closely linked with relations between Greece and Turkey. When Greece returned to NATO around 2 years ago under Mr Rallis' government, it was on the basis of the Rogers agreement. (He is now Supreme Allied Commander Europe -- LE SOIR) That agreement was vague on all the vital questions relating to Greece's defense.

The most important aspect is that of operational control of the Aegean airspace. According to the way Turkey and the United States interpret the Rogers agreement, Greece would not be entrusted with the defense of the Greek islands in the eastern Aegean in case of conflict, and that is unacceptable to us, especially since the country to which it would be entrusted has a 120,000-strong "Aegean Army" equipped with 180 landing craft.

The situation is deadlocked now. We can wait. We have more difficult and urgent problems. After 5 months in office I have learned that it is impossible to solve all problems at once. In any case, I am saying we will not give up any part of our territory. We are prepared to defend our country and are capable of doing so. We are strong.

We experience Turkish provocations daily, and these make dialogue impossible. There is constant danger because when our airspace is violated our air force reacts. One day there may be an accident....We have asked the alliance to guarantee Greece's integrity, which is its basic duty, but it is doing nothing. Turkey is vetoing that guarantee.

GREEK MOTIVES ON W. THRACE TURKS EXAMINED

NC161004 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 13 Apr 82 p 9

["The World Turns" column, by Prof Haluk Ulman: "It Does Not Befit Civilization"]

[Excerpts] The efforts by Greece to seize, through the decision of the court, the land belonging to the Turkish Muslim minority in the village of Inhanli in Xanthi District, Western Thrace -- lands these people have been cultivating for over a century -- has again attracted the attention of Turkish opinion to Western Thrace and to the Turks living there.

The Greek administration alleges that these lands used to belong to the Ottoman treasury and were later transferred to the Greek treasury through international treaties. In reality, this is nothing but an effort to give a legal character to a de facto situation it seeks to create. It is odd that all of a sudden Greece would remember that these lands, which have been cultivated for so many years, now belong to the Greek treasury. The truth is that the issue is not a legal issue; it is a political one. Whenever relations between Turkey and Greece deteriorate, Greek governments have tried to make the Turks in Western Thrace foot the bill. This is what is happening now. As a matter of fact, none of the Greek governments have ever been friendly toward the Turkish Muslims in Western Thrace.

The attempt to seize the lands of the Western Thrace Turks -- an attempt which constitutes a new dimension in the already continuing oppressive measures imposed on them -- is part and parcel of the unfriendly policy Papandreou has begun to implement against Turkey. His intention is to force Turkey into taking countermeasures against the oppression so he can bring up the question of the Istanbul Greeks before the world.

Those Greeks who have chosen to stay behind in Istanbul continue to benefit from all the rights and freedoms recognized under the international treaties. We know those who have left are lamenting the day they did so.

It is natural that there should be differences between two neighboring countries. But attempting to make innocent people living under its sovereignty pay the bill, and using them as trump cards in its policies, is not appropriate for any civilized nation. Both Greece and Turkey have to exercise great care in this respect, but Papandreou is the one who has to exercise the utmost care.

GUTIERREZ DIAZ BACK IN AS PSUC SECRETARY GENERAL

[Margarita Saenz-Diez report]

Hours before his appointment, Gutierrez Diaz was insisting, when asked by journalists about his immediate political future, that anything was possible as regards the PSUC secretary generalship. In fact, in addition to maintaining a stance of apparent ignorance of the tense negotiations taking place todistribute power in the party, he was expressing with that reply indirect acknowledgement of something that was made clear at the sixth PSUC congress: the Leninists' pressures were influencing the situation. At any event, early in the morning the new secretary general was urging the delegates to forget their differences and build unity. "We have in our hands an instrument that can make us optimistic," he said, after paying tribute to the outgoing executive committee's conduct and, specifically, to former Secretary General Francisco Frutos.

FRENCH PRESIDENT SPEAKS ON ECONOMIC SUMMIT

[Text] Vancouver, Canada, 19 Apr (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand flew home at 0600 today after a brief stop-over here for talks with Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau at the close of an official five-day visit to Japan. The two leaders discussed the agenda of the seven-nation Western summit meeting at Versailles in two months time, notably dialogue with the Third World, relations with the Soviet bloc, and U.S. interest rates.

Mr Mitterrand told correspondents after the meeting that the Versailles conference would not be "a tribunal" for judging American monetary policy or trade friction with Japan.

The business of the conference, he said, was to define measures in the long and the short term, "which should lead, albeit progressively, to bringing the world economy under control." He added that at Versailles "there will be no taking sides with one country against another" but that the participants would be intent on "reaching a consensus."

Mr Trudeau spoke of the "disappointment" of the industrial countries, that with only two months to the Versailles conference, undertakings given by the United States at the Montebello conference last year had still not materialized.

"We shall be on the side of those who will be enjoining the United States to conduct a more stable and less unpredictable monetary policy," he told the press conference.

Trudeau Speaks

[Excerpts] The Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, is talking to our special correspondent Jean-Luc Hesse.

[Begin Trudeau recording] The Americans, as you will remember, told us last summer to show a little patience, that if we should wait 6 months, 8 months, then we would see a tangible improvement. Well, we are all disappointed. I believe the Americans are the first to be so, because this did not happen, and I think that Canada's position is no different from that of the Europeans in this field, or that of the Japanese, and I would even say of the Americans, too, in that we want lower interest rates. We know that the economic interdependence between the countries which we represent is very strong and that we cannot manage our economies in an abstract way. We must take into consideration each other's interest rates and for this reason we are on the side of those are enjoining the United States to have a fiscal and monetary policy that will lead, we hope, to lower interest rates, and we shall urge the American authorities to have a more stable monetary policy. [end recording]

GENSCHER REACTS TO FALL BREZHNEV-REAGAN MEETING

[Text] Bonn, 18 Apr (DPA) -- FDP Chairman and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher sees Soviet state and party chief Leonid Brezhnev's agreement in principle to a meeting with U.S. President Ronald Reagan in the fall as an "encouraging signal." In his first reaction to Brezhnev's intentions, Genscher said on Sunday, according to FDP Spokesman Herbert Schmuelling, that he would welcome the meeting taking place in June as Reagan intended, since the Federal Government hopes it would give positive impetus to limiting the medium-range missiles build-up.

Genscher, who has repeatedly called on the Soviet Union during the last week not turn down the U.S. President's proposal for such a meeting, stated that the Soviet Union's desire to put off the meeting until the fall does not affect its importance. The Bonn NATO summit on 9-10 June will be used by the allies to prepare for the meeting.

OFFICIAL WARNS AGAINST EEC-U.S. 'TRADE WAR'

[Text] Bonn, 17 Apr (DPA) -- The Federal Government takes the American warning against possible import restriction by the EEC on U.S. agricultural products "very seriously," according to State Secretary Georg Gallus of the Federal Food Ministry. On no account must a trade war between the EEC and the United States be allowed to start, Gallus said in an interview with Deutschlandfunk on Saturday. The French demands for restrictions on grain substitutes from the U.S. should therefore not be acceded to.

On the other hand, the United States must open its market more to refining products from the Community if it wants to continue to deliver substitutes to Europe, in the view of the state secretary. Gallus is flying to the United States in June in order to discuss further cooperation in the agricultural sector with U.S. Government representatives.

SCHMIDT EMPHASIZES UNITY WITH U.S. ON DISARMAMENT

[Text] Hamburg, 16 Apr (DPA) -- Between the Federal Republic and the United States there are no differences of opinion on arms control and disarmament questions. Chancellor Helmut Schmidt emphasized this on Friday evening in Hamburg after a talk with Ambassador Paul Nitze, head of the U.S. delegation at the Geneva negotiations on the limitation of medium-range missiles.

Speaking to journalists Schmidt emphasized, following the exchange of views which lasted several hours at his home, that it was important to the Federal Republic that an affirmation of the basic guidelines of the disarmament questions be achieved at the forthcoming NATO summit meeting in Bonn. He had told Nitze that he will welcome a meeting between U.S. President Ronald Reagan and Soviet General Secretary Leonid Brezhnev during the forthcoming United Nations meeting in New York in June.

According to Schmidt, the Western alliance is vitally interested in seeing the threat of the Soviet SS-20 missiles removed. The Federal Republic is in favor of a zero solution, Schmidt said and once again affirmed his adherence to the NATO dual decision. Ambassador Nitze had strengthned his confidence in serious negotiations in Geneva, Schmidt said.

Nitze, who has "already" briefed Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher on the state of the disarmament talks in Bonn on Thursday, told journalists in a brief statement that the negotiations in Geneva had shown some progress. However, it should not be overlooked that there still exist grave differences of opinion between the delegations of the two countries.

MINISTER, SECURITY OFFICIALS VISIT SAUDI ARABIA

[Text] Bonn, 18 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Interior Minister Gerhart Baum on Sunday flew to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia for a 3-day visit. He is to discuss issues of bilateral interest and inspect Saudi security installations there. According to unofficial information, Baum is accompanied by Siegfried Froehlich, secretary of state responsible for internal security, and other specialists from departments concerned with security. It was also said that last year a Saudi special task force was trained for a lenghty period by the Ninth Federal Frontier Unit. The Ministry of Interior has so far declined to comment on the matter.

BANK OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON MOSCOW PIPELINE TALKS

[Text] Moscow, 18 Apr (DPA) -- Friedrich Wilhelm Christians, spokesman for the Management Board of Deutsche Bank, has held negotiations in Moscow on the implementation of the skelton agreement on credits to finance German deliveries for the construction of the Soviet natural gas pipeline. Before his return this evening, Christians said that both sides have taken a step forward.

Christians had meetings in Moscow with Leonid Kostandov, Soviet deputy premier and cochairman of the German-Soviet economic commission; Foreign Trade Minister Nikolay Patolichev; and the head of the Soviet state bank, Alkhimov.

Deutsche Bank leads a consortium of German banks providing provisional finance for the natural gas pipeline, and concluded a skeleton agreement last July. After an inspection trip to Urengoy in Western Siberia, Christians said that he is "very impressed" with the natural gas pipeline construction work he had seen there. The pipeline is to carry Soviet gas to several West European countries, beginning in 1984. The Federal Republic is to receive 10.5 billion cubic meters a year.

Christians said that his talks had not concerned the 15 percent of the financing to be provided by the Soviet Union. At the beginning of this year, Deutsche Bank refused a Soviet request for a 100 percent credit to cover the initial payments of DM300 million.

JOHANNES RAU TO BE NEW SPD DEPUTY CHAIRMAN

LD171856 Hamburg DPA in Gemman 1823 GMT 17 Apr 82

[Text] Munich,17 Apr (DPA) -- The SPD Bundestag Presidium unanimously proposed on Saturday evening in Munich that North Rhine-Westphalian Minister President Johannes Rau (51) be the new depty chairman of the SPD. This was stated by SPD Executive Spokesman Wolfgang Clement to the press after the SPD meeting.

Earlier, the former deputy chairman of the SPD, Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, said that he will return to his former post of state minister in the chancellor's office. SPD Chairman Willy Brandt, according to Clement, expressed understanding for Wischnewski's decision.

Wishnewski Addresses Congress

[Excerpt] Munich, 19 Apr (DPA) -- At the opening of the 27th SPD national congress, Party Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wishnewski has called on the 400 delegates to openly support the decisions together. In his welcome address today in Munich, Wischnewski also demanded that the 5-day party congress be a "milestone" in the party's history to win back for the SPD lost confidence and to acquire fresh confidence.

Wischnewski emphasized that economic and employment policy will be at the forefront of discussions. The predominant domestic policy requirement of the eighties is to guarantee work and to reduce unemployment. In addition, Social Democrats must contribute to the preservation and safeguarding of peace in the world.

Referring to demands by the Bonn coalition partners, the FDP, that the Social Democrats should only make decisions in Munich on questions of interest to the FDP in the Government alliance, Wischenewski stated that the Munich congress is a party congress of the Social Democrats, and "not the party congress of the coalition."

CHANGES IN SCHMIDT'S CABINET PREVIEWED

[Text] Bonn, 16 Apr (DPA) -- In the forthcoming cabinet reshuffle there will be no switch between the SPD politicians Hans Apel and Horst Ehmke. Leading circles of the SPD Parliamentary Group on Friday in Bonn firmly rejected speculation that Ehmke will replace Apel as defense minister, or that Apel for his part will become Parliamentary Group deputy spokesman. It was also said that Ehmke had told Chancellor Helmut Schmidt that he still sees his political work as being within the Parliamentary Group, for which Schmidt showed understanding.

On Friday in Bonn only one thing was certain: That party Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski will once again become minister of state in the chancellor's office and former Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling, at present head of the FRG's permanent mission in East Berlin, will also return to his old post.

Schmidt: No Major Changes

[Excerpt] Munich, 18 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Schmidt told the SPD council that he does not propose a major cabinet reshuffle. He said that he would not allow public speculation about ministerial changes to affect his competence to make decisions. "I have been put in charge for a term and I shall be in charge for a term. I will not relinquish this charge," he said. Schmidt said that he would talk to the SPD Parliamentary Party about personnel issues affecting the Federal Government, but only after he had talked to the federal president. As quoted by Party Spokesman Clement, Schmidt very clearly stated that the policy statement of November 1980 still applies and is the government's policy guide. There is no reason to depart from this well-advised and agreed SPD-FDP policy.

MITTERRAND, IN JAPAN, OUTLINES NUCLEAR POLICY

[Text] Francois Mitterrand in Japan: After speaking at length about economic matters yesterday in Tokyo, today is more a political day. The French president this morning received the leaders of the main Japanese polical parties. He then made a speech in the Japanese parliament in the presence of 700 deputies and senators. Later he answered questions by journalists, in itself an event, since the practice of direct dialogue between journalists and foreign personalities is not a Japanese custom. In this country, which still suffers the trauma of Hiroshima, many questions were asked of President Mitterrand regarding French nuclear policy. Here is the French president's answer:

[Begin recording] In many long years as opposition deputy in my country I, together with the party I was representing, have rejected France's nuclear arming. As the elected president of the republic, since our national security and defense for 20 years now have been based entirely on a nuclear deterrent strategy, and since without this deterrent force France has no other national defense, I have no right to leave my country defenseless. However, as Shotoku-Taishi, one of the country's most illustrious heads of state used to say, forgive me if I say it in Japanese: [speaks briefly in Japanese] -- although I should have said it in French: Peace and harmony should become an object of reverence. [end recording]

Mitterrand paid tribute to former Foreign Affairs Minister Louis de Guiringaud, who committed suicide yesterday. He has written to Madame de Guiringaud. The head of state writes: In Louis de Guringaud I salute a valuable fighter for liberation, a great diplomat with a depth of knowledge of his fellow man and an indefatigable minister of foreign affairs.

INDIA SIGNS AGREEMENT FOR 40 MIRAGE-2000S

[Text] Paris, 16 Apr (AFP) -- An agreement for France to supply India with 40 Mirage-2,000 fighter planes from 1984 was signed here on April 8, LE MONDE newspaper reported here today. The report said the deal was worth 5,000 million francs (about 800 million dollars).

LE MONDE said the French Dassault-Breguet Group, with representatives of the Snecma, Thomson-CSF and Matra firms, had exchanged letters with Indian Defence Secretary P. K. Kaul. The exchange was accompanied by an advance payment by India of five percent, or 250 million francs, which would be repayable except for expenses incurred.

The paper added that the exchange of letters should be followed in the six months from April 1 by the drafting of the final agreement, but if the talks were not completed within this limit, the exchange of letters would be taken as a firm contract. The report recalled that negotiations began in 1978 and that the plane was evaluated in France by Indian experts in January and February 1981.

After the left won power in France a year ago, the French Government decided to encourage contacts with India, the paper said. This resulted in a visit last August by Mr Kaul. Talks on the deal speeded up in the second quarter of 1981, and a draft accord between the two governments was reached in February this year. This was not limited to the Mirage deal, but also covered other aspects of possible French arms exports.

The paper said that following this, a Soviet mission led by Defence Minister Dmitriy Ustinov tried to dissuade India from buying the Mirage, and offered assembly in India of the MIG-27 Flogger, Model D or J.

This competition enabled India to obtain a 10-percent reduction of official price estimates by France, and credit at 9.25 percent instead of the 9.9 percent over nine years initially envisaged.

Under the deal, the French group will supply four two-seater versions fro training and 36 single seaters. LE MONDE said that under the arrangement, India has the option of acquiring another 110 planes, some of which would be assembled in India, while others would be built there under licence.

OFFICIAL COMPARES GIBRALTAR WITH FALKLANDS

[Begin Camunas recording] Naturally, we support the Argentine claim over the Malvinas Islands. On our own territory we, too, have and suffer a relatively similar case which concerns the Rock of Gibraltar. But with the same clarity and conviction with which we defend these moves towards decolonization we Spaniards defend a peaceful and political channel of negotiation with the United Kingdom. We would consider it extremely serious and disturbing for interntional peace if Argentina and Great Britain were to engage in armed conflict. [end recording]

CABINET MAKES HIGH-LEVEL MILITARY APPOINTMENTS

[Text] Today's meetings of the Council of Ministers ended at 1445 this afternoon. It was attended by all the members of the cabinet except the foreign minister, who is accompanying the king and queen on their trip to Norway. As an advance report on the military appointments [decided on at today's cabinet meeting], we should point out those of Lt Gen Arozarens Giron as the new captain-general of the First Military Region, which is based in Madrid; Lt Gen Saenz de Santa Maria replaces Arozarena Giron in the command of the Fourth Military Region, Barcelona; Gen Soteras Casamayor, who has been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant General, has been appointed to fill the vacant post left by Saenz de Santa Maria, the captaincy-general of the Seventh Military Region [in Valladolid].

The Council of Ministers has agreed to withdraw the draft law on university autonomy from parliamentary consideration. This afternoon the government will probably communicate this decision to the presidency of congress through the proper channels.

The usual press conference by the secretary of state for information will be held at Moncloa Palace at 2000 today and will be attended by the minister of education.

TERRORISTS ATTACK MILITARY BUS IN BARCELONA

[Text] The captaincy-general of the Fourth Military Region [Barcelona] has issued a note on an attack this morning on a military bus in Barcelona.

The note says that at about 0815 today at the point where Carlos III Street meets the Avenida de Madrid there was apparently an attack on a military vehicle taking commanders, officers and noncommissioned officers to their respective posts. The presumed attack, according to the note, occurred when a shot was fired from a grenade launcher which fortunately did not hit the vehicle in question, but exploded against the wall of a nearby building. There were no casualties. The group of youths who took part in the attack escaped in a Renault-12. Apparently, the person who fired the shot is 1.65 meters tall.

Police Patrol Attacked

[Summary] Pamplona -- At 0315 this morning one policeman was killed and two were injured, one of them seriously, when a terrorist commando fired a grenade at a police armored vehicle on patrol in Pamplona. Apparently, there were eight policemen in the patrol and they were able to repel the attack. It was reported that a terrorist had been arrested, but this has not been confirmed.

One of the injured policemen has had a leg amputated and is being treated in the intensive care unit at the Navarre Hospital -- his condition is described as very grave. The other policeman suffered only slight injuries.

Barracks Machinegunned

[Text] San Sebastian, Spain, 18 Apr (AFP) -- A barracks of the paramilitary Guardia Civil was machinegunned at the Basque town of Eibar near here tonight in the seventh terrorist incident in Spain in less than a week, a reliable source reported. One person was wounded, the source said.

Basque terrorists, whose latest attacks have destroyed an armored police car in Pamplona and blown up a Madrid telephone exchange, have warned that they would attack police and Guardia Civil barracks (where the troopers' families also live) if the Madrid government did not pull all such forces out of the Basque country in northern Spain within a month.

MEETING CALLED AFTER PHONE EXCHANGE ATTACK

[Text] Madrid, 18 Apr (AFP) -- Spanish Interior Minister Juan Jose Roson held an emergency meeting today with high security officials following a terrorist bomb attack on a telephone exchange here. The meeting was on how to react to the terrorist offensive launched by the Basque ETA [Basque Fatherland and Liberty] separatist movement, presumed to have carried out today's attack.

The attack, on a major telephone exchange in northern Madrid, caused only minor injuries to the passers-by but seriously disturbed telephone communications in the capital, a police source said. Some 20,000 phones served directly by the five-story exchange were put out of order by the attack, carried out by a commando, and Madrid's national and international phone service was affected.

Madrid Civil Governor Mariano Nicolas said the attack was almost certainly by ETA. Authorities had been watching for such an attack, he said. ETA had designated the phone company as a "privileged target," accusing it of working with the police for telephone and mail surveillance. Three phone company representatives at St. Sebastain in Spain's Basque Country have been assassinated since October 1980.

Five young people posing as police reportedly subdued the ten employees at the exchange at about midnight and then placed four 20 kilogram (44.4 pound) charges of explosive. The attackers, who seemed to know the exchange well, were there for about an hour and a half. The explosion, at 3:30 am, blew out the facade of the exchange building.

The employees were able to leave the building five minutes before the explosion, police said, and the injuries of the two passers-by were only slight.

Phone company president Salvador Sanchez Teran, who rushed to the scene of the explosion, said the damage was serious and it would take a long time to restore lost service. He did not say exactly how long this would be.

While the attack had not yet been claimed, police sources said it was part of the recent ETA offensive. GOMA-2 is the preferred explosive of the Basque terrorists. Police sources said the attack showed ETA's desire to intensify its fight against all institutions it feels are allied with the government.

Four grenade attacks, two claimed by ETA, have taken place since Wednesday against Civil Guards, police and soldiers. One person was killed and six injured, one seriously, in an attack yesterday in Pamplona, in Navarra Province bordering on the Basque Country.

In another development, Madrid's Chamartin train station was evacuated today and surveillance increased at Madrid-Barajas Airport following an anonymous telephone call to a Madrid newspaper which said bombs had been placed in these two places, a police source said.

The caller said at 0700 GMT that the bombs would go off within two hours and signed off his call with "Gora Euzkadi" (long live the Basque Country). When no bombs had gone off by 0900 GMT, train traffic, which had been halted, was resumed.

ETA set off two bombs in June, 1979, at the train station and airport, killing six people and wounding about 100.

Police later said the attack was carried out by the two five-member commando teams, instead of one as previously reported, and had injured five and not two as initially reported. Besides the five-man team which, disguised as policemen, went into the exchange building, another five-strong look-out team, including a woman, stayed outside and fled on foot after firing at a police car on routine patrol.

The first commando team, all from 25-30 years old and speaking perfect Spanish, appeared at the door to the exchange at 2:00 am. They told the two security guards there they were making a special inspection for the upcoming football World Cup, in Madrid in June, police said.

After subduing all the employees in the building, they unsuccessfully looked for the fuel tank for the building's heating system and then placed four 20 kg (44.4 pounds) charges of plastic explosive.

Two phone company employees inside the building were slightly wounded as was a man getting out of a taxi at the moment of the explosion, a fireman and a beggar.

Some 700,000 people in Catalonia in northeastern Spain had no telephone communications with Madrid and central Spain following the explosion. Police blocked off the area around the exchange building and increased their patrols in the capital.

Armed Forces Will Aid Police

[Text] Madrid, 18 Apr (AFP) -- The Spanish Government today announced that the armed forces would henceforth assist the police in fighting terrorism, informed sources reported. The decision was taken following two emergency cabinet meetings chaired by Premier Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo, summoned in response to a spectacular pre-dawn attack on a major telephone exchange here. It put out of action some 20,000 Madrid telephones and affected regional communications by 700,000 subscribers. The attack was attributed here to the military wing of the Basque independence movement, ETA.

Under the new government plans, the army will take over from the police in the surveillance of vital installations, such as communications centers, electrical and nuclear power plants, with a view to freeing police for tracking down and capturing terrorists. The government also put all security forces in a state of alert and cancelled leaves.

[Statement by Spanish Minister of Interior Juan Jose Roson on measures adopted on 18 April to counteract ETA attacks, place not specified -- recorded]

[Text] On behalf of the government, it is my duty to admit that a serious situation exists following the bloody attacks that ETA has staged during last few days. But equally on behalf of the government, it is my duty to tell the Spanish people that we are going to display solidarity in our reaction; we are going to win this last battle that ETA has so dramatically provoked.

We held a meeting this morning chaired by the prime minister and we made a number of decisions. First and foremost among those was to put the state security forces on general alert throughout the country. The Interior Ministry had previously ordered such an alert, but following these latest events the efforts of the police and the Civil Guard must be stepped up even more. Secondly, the government decided that cooperation will be initiated between the armed forces and the various sections of the state security forces. A series of duties connected with civilian security which are currently performed by the latter will be assumed by the three branches of the armed forces. These duties will be assumed by the armed forces tomorrow or the day after and will thus permit a sizeable mixed force of police and the Civil Guard to be used in antiterrorist work. Finally, this use of the armed forces will make it possible to increase the number of installations we can protect throughout the country.

With these measures decided upon this morning and put into effect at a series of meetings held this afternoon, the government is demonstrating its unwavering resolve to meet with appropriate means this brutal challenge thrown down a few days ago by ETA-military. The government, again through me, calls on all Spaniards to assist the state security forces. The government is convinced that if we all display solidarity in the face of the ETA onslaught we will attain our immediate goal of routing this last brutal attack on national harmony.

[Excerpt] The government is offering 10 million pesetas reward to anyone providing information which leads to the apprehension of any ETA terrorist. They could be hiding out in Madrid, Barcelona, Bilbao ard Pamplona.

CHARGES DROPPED AGAINST ALLEGED SPY FOR USSR

[Text] Copenhagen, 18 Apr (AFP) -- Charges against a Danish writer involved in the Nordic denuclearised zone campaign and suspected of spying for the Soviet Union have been dropped in a surprise move by Danish Justice Minister Ole Espersen. The writer, Arne Herloev Petersen, 39, was arrested last November for spying following charges by the Danish intelligence services that he had 24 meetings over 18 months with Vladimir Merkulov, the second secretary of the Soviet Embassy. It was also claimed that he had received cash from the Soviet Embassy here to finance the Nordic zone campaign. Mr Merkulov was expelled from Denmark for spying just before Mr Petersen's arrest.

Mr Petersen was released after three days in prison, but the charges against him were never dropped. Danish Foreign Minister Kjelo Olesen said last November that the authorities had proof that Mr Petersen and Mr Merkulov were spies.

In his statement yesterday, the Danish justice minister said three Soviet diplomats had in turn contacted Mr Petersen in order to use him to influence public opinion. Mr Petersen took documents from the Soviet Embassy to the North Korean Embassy in Copenhagen, supposedly written by an American journalist, in an attempt to increase tension between China and North Korea, the minister said.

The minister's statement said he decided to drop charges against Mr Petersen firstly because of "freedom of expression," secondly because Danish interests were not sufficiently damaged to warrant prosecution, and thirdly because the Soviet diplomats involved in the scandal have already left the country. On Danish television last night Mr Petersen said he has not yet decided whether he will sue for damages.

SOVIET AMBASSADOR TOLD TO BACK UN RESOLUTION

[Text] Britain expects the Soviet Union to support the UN Security Council resolution calling for Argentine withdrawal of the Falklands, Mr Douglas Hurd, the senior Foreign Office minister, yesterday told Mr Viktor Popov, the Soviet ambassador in London.

He drew the ambassador's attention to Mrs Thatcher's remarks in the Commons debate on Wednesday when she referred to the fact that the Soviet Union was almost the only country which has moved closer to Argentina. Mr Hurd stressed that colonialism was not involved in the dispute so far as Britain was concerned. The issue was the islanders' right to self-determination.

WHITEHALL 'MYSTIFIED' BY AIR BLOCKADE REPORT

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] There was mystification in Whitehall today over reports from the Argentine that Britain had imposed a 200-mile air exclusion zone around the Falklands in addition to the maritime zone already in force. Government sources denied the reports and said Britain could declare exclusion zones only where and when it had the capability to enforce them.

Meanwhile there was caution in London over reports of increasing optimism in Buenos Aires over the peace moves of American Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig. The view in London is unchanged -- Argentinian troops must leave the Falklands unconditionally before any negotiations can take place. Mrs Thatcher is at Chequers and has not been in touch with Mr Haig in Buenos Aires today. But British officials still expect that the secretary of state will return to London, possibly over the weekend.

THATCHER RETURNS TO LONDON TO REVIEW SITUATION

[Text] Mrs Thatcher sped back to Downing Street tonight for another stocktaking meeting on the Falklands crisis with senior ministers at No 10. She had been just over 24 hours at Chequers before returning to London for tonight's meeting.

The move does not reflect any sudden developments in the crisis, and the Downing Street meeting tonight is described as "stocktaking." The indication in Whitehall tonight is that U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig will now return to Washington from his current talks in Buenos Aires and not direct to London as had earlier been expected. The belief remains that Mr Haig will fly on to London again later.

Mrs Thatcher is now expected to remain at Downing Street and to keep in close contact with her senior ministers who are directly handling the crisis. But precise developments still depend on the outcome of what Mrs Thatcher herself has described as the latest "crucial" talks between Mr Haig and the Argentinians.

Tonight's meeting was a time for reviewing the situation, and for considering what might be said to Mr Haig if and when he returns to London.

It was later learned that Defence Secretary Mr John Nott was also at the meeting tonight. Mrs Thatcher has still had no direct contact either with Mr Haig or with the U.S. Government, but the ministers are standing by awaiting word of the outcome of the Buenos Aires talks.

A government spokesman tonight described as "absolute rubbish" reports that a package deal had been agreed in principle by Foreign Secretary Mr Pym which involved a phased withdrawal of Argentine troops to be followed by a tripartite administration -- Britain, the Argentine and the US -- and a cash offer for islanders who wished to leave.

ITV DETAILS HAIG 'FIVE POINT PEACE PLAN'

LD181646 London ITV Television Network in English 1100 GMT 18 Apr 82

[Excerpts] This morning "Weekend World" is in a position to reveal the full details of the Haig peace plan and we will be trying to work out its likely chances of success.

[Windsor] Mr Haig's main lever in dealing with the Argentinian Government might well have been to point out that up to very recently the United States had been restraining the British Government, that if the Argentine Government itself did not show more flexibility, it was likely to come up very shortly against the entire might of the Royal Navy, and the Royal Navy is still a very powerful force; it is much more powerful both in terms of weaponry and in terms of sophistication than the Argentine Navy, and the Argentine Navy is likely to be sunk virtually in its entirety if it dares tangle with the Royal Navy between the Falkland Islands and the Argentine coastline. In this sense, what Mr Haig might well have been able to say is that they would pay a very heavy price for showing no flexibility in the present situation and they could not count on any real international support. They would be alone against Britain and they would lose.

[Waldon] According to our sources in Washington, Mr Haig seems to have believed that the Argentinians had recognized this and undergone a change of heart. They seemed more willing to compromise. So in his talks in Buenos Aires on Friday, he presented the leadership of the junta with his peace plan. Since those talks began, details of the Haig peace plan have come into the hands of "Weekend World." They were obtained from sources close to President Reagan in Washington. These sources suggest that as a sweetener for the plan, Mrs Thatcher has slowed down the progress of the task force toward the South Atlantic, but we have been unable to confirm this. The plan itself consists of five points. Under point one, it is proposed that both sides should reserve their positions on the sovereignty of the Falklands for an interim period. Under point two, the interim period should last up to 5 years while negotiations on sovereignty are carried out. Point three proposes that a group of nations should administer the islands after an Argentinian withdrawal and during the interim period. In addition, the British naval task should turn back. Point four proposes that the administering nations should comprise Britain, Argentina, the United States, and six others, namely Canada, and two Latin American nations, two European nations and one in Asia. Finally, and most importantly, point five proposes that the interim period should end with a vote by the Falklanders on the future status of the island. It has of course not been possible for us to confirm the details of the plan with the leaders of the junta in Argentina. But we were able to confirm its substance with sources in the State Department close to Mr Haig.

NO CASH CEILING PLACED ON FALKLANDS OPERATION

PM161225 London THE DAILY TELEGRAM in English 16 Apr 82 p 5

[James Wightman report: "'No Cash Limit' for Operation To Free Islands"]

[Text] Although the cost of the Falklands military operation cannot yet be assessed, the government has imposed no cash ceiling, Mr Brittan, chief secretary to the Treasury, said last night.

"The needs of the task force must and will come first," he said. Mr Brittan, who has cabinet responsibility for government expenditure, was speaking to businessmen in Oxford.

He stressed that the cost of the operation could and would be met "in ways consistent with the government's economic strategy." He added: "Not all of this cost will be additional. Additional expenditure arises only where the cost of the operation proves to be greater than that of the costs to which the forces concerned would otherwise have been assigned. At this stage the extra cost represents a very small proportion of the defence budget of over 14 billion pounds. There is therefore no cash or budgetary problem immediately in prospect."

Mr Brittan also denied suggestions that the ability to respond to the crisis in the Falklands, or others like it, has been weakened by the government's so-called "cuts" in defence spending. "This is complete nonsense," he said. "So, far from cutting defence spending, we have actually increased it from the level of 7.5 billion pounds which we inherited in 1978/79 to over 14 billion pounds today. This cash increase of over 85 per cent represents a real increase of about 11 per cent.

"This financial year we will be spending half a billion pounds more in real terms on conventional naval forces than was spent in the year before we came into office. As to the future, we will still be spending more on the conventional navy even when expenditure on modernising the strategic deterrent is at its peak, than in 1978/79.

"The navy still enjoys as high a proportion of the defence budget -- 28 per cent -- as it did in that year, and a higher proportion than it did 20 or 30 years ago." Mr Bittan said a massive modernisation programme for the fleet was in hand. Spending on equipment would exceed 2,200 million pounds in 1982/83.

"Some critics have complained of the forthcoming loss to the fleet of the aircraft carriers, Invincible and Hermes. This criticism is simply ludicrous, because it ignores the crucial facts that two carriers will continue to be kept in service.

"Illustrious, which is to replace Invincible, will join the fleet later this year and the construction of Ark Royal to replace Hermes is proceeding satisfactorily. But this is not to be achieved by neglecting other aspects of the navy. In February we ordered the eighth Broadswork-class frigate, and the build-up of the Sheffield-class destroyer force is progressing well.

"These vessels will all be equipped with effective modern weaponry. The Sting Ray torpedo will enter service shortly and the development of a new heavyweight torpedo was recently announced; the torpedo procurement programme now totals more than 2 billion pounds."

Mr Brittan added: "Of course, some of today's vessels will be disposed of or scrapped before long. But it is inconceivable that the pattern of our forces should remain static. The significant feature of our defence policy today is that the current programmes of modernisation and re-building will actually leave us with more major ships and submarines operational in 1985 than there are today."

ARGENTINA REQUESTS U.S. SATELLITE PICTURES

[By PA defense correspondent Robert Hutchinson]

[Text] Argentina has officially asked the United States Government to supply them with spy satellite pictures of the movements of the British fleet. According to highly sensitive information reaching the PRESS ASSOCIATION tonight the Americans are now considering this request but it "looks likely that Washington will agree."

The request was made in the last 24 hours as U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig flew into Buenos Aires for more talks aimed at averting the Falklands crisis. It was not made directly to Mr Haig, but, said the sources, "at the highest level."

President Reagan is the only man able to take the decision on the plea, it is understood in Washington. The sources, hitherto impeccable, said the British Government had not been told of the position.

The request -- at a crucial time in the American diplomatic initiative to seek a peaceful solution -- has put the Americans on the horns of a dilemma. They have sought, throughout Mr Haig's "shuttle diplomacy," to appear as "even-handed allies," friends to both sides in the worsening dispute.

The Buenos Aires government has taken advantage of this when the Argentine fleet is reported to be at sea and the British task force is heading inexorably south to the Falklands.

Although never confirmed, it seems plan that American spy satellites have provided Britain with vital information. The Argentines, therefore, are saying: "If you are a friend to both, treat us both equally."

In London, where there was no confirmation of the request, the situation must raise memories of Suez, where British and French military action was thwarted by American diplomatic pressure.

U.S.: Not Supplying Intel

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] The United States is not supplying satellite intelligence to Argentina, according to a statement from the U.S. Embassy in London today. And the Americans are not supplying "any other kinds" of intelligence to Argentina regarding British movements, said a spokesman.

A British Defence Ministry spokesman could not comment on the PRESS ASSOCIATION report that the Argentine Government had asked Washington to supply spy satellite pictures of the British task force heading for the Falklands. The Americans, it was reported, were now considering the request.

Opposition Demands Statement

[Text] Mr John Silkin, Shadow Defence Secretary, said late tonight he would be demanding a government statement in the Commons on Monday on whether the Americans had agreed to provide the Argentines with spy pictures of the Royal Naval task force now heading south to the Falklands Islands.

Mr Silkin said: "What we will want to know on Monday when the House resumes is a full account of the government's attitude and whether it authorized or even knew about this report. We will need an explanation first, it it is true, and second, what the government's attitude is towards it."

25 SHIPS CHARTERED, REQUISITIONED FOR FORCE

[Text] The government has now chartered or requisitioned 25 ships to boost the Falklands task force.

The 12 requisitioned and 13 chartered vessels, which include tankers, trawlers and tugs, are either on their way to join the task force in the Atlantic or are being modified in preparation for their new role.

The Ministry of Defence has chartered the ships under a normal commercial agreement, whereas the requisitioning is backed by legislation. The cost has yet to be worked out between the ministry and the shipping companies concerned.

A Department of Trade spokesman said the cost of chartering or requisitioning a ship would be "fairly similar." The ships requisitioned are: The Canberra, which will be used as a troop ship; the Uganda, which is being converted into a hospital ship; the Elk, being used as a container ship for carrying vehicles; the Salvageman, Irishman, and Yorkshireman, all tugs; the Farnella, Cordella, Northella, Junella and Pict, which will be used as minesweeping trawlers and the Stena Seaspread, a diving support vessel, which will be used as a repair and maintenance ship.

The 13 chartered ships are: the Tamar, Esk, Tay, Test, Dart, and Trent, all BP tankers; the Fort Toronot, a water carrier; the Fawley, an Esso tanker; the Eburna, a Shell tanker, the Orionman, a tanker; the Finnanger, a Norwegian transport ship; the Ivy Fern, a BP tanker; and the Atlantic Conveyor, the Cunard-owned container ship.

A row has broken out over the 18,500-ton Atlantic Conveyor which has been moved from Liverpool's recession-hit docks to be refitted at Devonport. Merseyside Council chiefs have protested to Mrs Thatcher that the work should have been carried out locally.

RETURNED RAF TECHS PROVIDE INFORMATION

[By Robert Hutchingson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] Two RAF [Royal Air Force] technicians who remained in the Falklands after the Argentine invasion have provided intelligence men with "invaluable" information on the military position there, it was disclosed today. The two RAF men, Chief Technicians Noel Robson, 37 and Keith Stuart 34, were still at the Defence Ministry today in a "long and involved" briefing session.

They brought back a number of photographs they took of the Argentine military preparations around Port Stanley. Last night they spent some time with chief of the air staff, Air Chief Marshal Sir Michael Beetham.

A Defence Ministry spokesman said today: "We are now able to confirm absolutely that the runway in the Falkland Islands has not been extended. It remains at about 4,000 ft long." The invaders had built more aircraft parking spaces "of a temporary nature."

The RAF men's information was "invaluable" and "not only important in itself but also illustrative of some of the wrong information which is being circulated." Throughout the Argentinians were aware that the two men were RAF personnel, on loan to the islands to maintain the islander and two Beaver aircraft used to carry government officials and mail.

The Defence Ministry disclosure of the value of the two RAF senior noncommissioned officers has led to speculation that the Royal Marines believed to be held on the Argentine mainland might not now be released. And it could herald a crackdown by the Falklands occupation forces on identify cards and cameras held by the civilian population.

Chief Tech Robson said after landing: "We were wearing civilian clothes out there and we were hardly going to step forward and introduce ourselves. But even after they checked us off against the records, they didn't seem to take much notice of us."

I was actually allowed back on the airfield at one time. I was standing about while the military preparations were going on all around me and I couldn't help thinking 'This is a bit odd.'"

Chief Tech Stuart, who returned with his wife Ann, said the first waves of Argentine troops had been followed by mostly young, inexperienced troops who were becoming steadily demoralized. "With the news of the task force on the way, they are not in a happy frame of mine. I saw one young soldier in tears at the airport, asking someone to get a message to his mother in Buenos Aires."

DEFENSE MINISTRY: ARGENTINE FLEET AT SEA

[By Alan Jones, PA staff reporter]

[Text] The Ministry of Defence now believes that most of the Argentine fleet is at sea. But a ministry spokesman said today that no major Argentine vessel had breached the 200-mile maritime exclusion zone which Britain has imposed around the Falkland Islands. The Defence Ministry would still give no details of the exact location of the task force heading for the Falklands beyond saying that the fleet was "en route and on time."

The spokesman said: "All the evidence we have suggests that most of the Argentine fleet is at sea and that they are all off the coast of Argentina." He would not say if the Argentine ships were heading towards the no-go area. "We have no reports of any major Argentine vessel breaching the zone," added the spokesman.

BRITISH JOURNALISTS UNDER ARREST IN ARGENTINA

[Text] Three British journalists are under arrest in Argentina, according to reports reaching London tonight from Buenos Aires. Simon Winchester of the SUNDAY TIMES, and Ian Mather and Tony Prime, a writer/photographer team from THE OBSERVER, have not been in touch with their papers all week since leaving the capital to tour various Argentinian cities.

The foreign editor of the SUNDAY TIMES, Mr Cal McChrystal, said tonight that sources in Buenos Aires have reported that all three are under arrest in the country's southernmost port of Ushuaia on Tierra del Fuego.

The journalists are understood to have intended to fly back to Buenos Aires on Wednesday. The Swiss Embassy in Buenos Aires, which is looking after British interests there, is taking the matter up with the Argentinian Foreign Ministry.

OBSERVER editor Mr Donald Trelford said early today that he understood the three journalists could face spy charges on Monday. "We understand there is a possibility that the three of them will be facing charges on Monday of suspicion of military espionage," he said. He added that the information has come from a "source" in Argentina.

It is understood that the Argentine authorities are doubting whether the three men are bona fide journalists. "Obviously we are very concerned to establish that they are bona fide journalists. They are in no sense guilty of military espionage. We are doing everything possible to secure their release," added Mr Trelford who has been in touch with the Foreign Office.

The paper might send a representative to Argentina today to help try to secure the journalists' release, Mr Trelford said.

Foreign Office Confirms

LD181738 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1700 GMT 18 Apr 82

[Text] The three British journalists arrested in Argentina on suspicion of spying will appear in court tomorrow, the Foreign Office in London confirmed tonight. Simon Winchester of THE SUNDAY TIMES and Ian Mather and Tony Prime of THE OBSERVER are being held in the country's southernmost port of Ushuaia on the island of Tierra del Fuego.

It is understood they are being held incommunicado at a naval base. A Foreign Office spokesman said the three would appear before a judge to see if the case should go ahead.

Both newspapers have strenuously denied any suggestion that the three could be guilty of military espionage. Representatives of THE SUNDAY TIMES and THE OBSERVER are on their way to Argentina in a bid to secure the release of the journalists.

Mr Frank Giles, editor of THE SUNDAY TIMES, said tonight he hoped Mr Winchester could convince the authorities he was a bona fide journalist. "I have heard from sources in Argentina that the three will apear before a civil judge who will decide if there is a case against them. If there is, then charges will be made and they will have to stand trial."

The three members of a Canadian television crew arrested in southern Argentina on Saturday have now been released.

SURVEY TEAM REMOVED FROM SOUTH GEORGIA ISLAND

LD171710 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1655 GMT 17 Apr 82

[Text] Thirteen members of the British Antarctic survey team, from whom nothing has been heard since the Argentinian takeover of South Georgia two weeks ago, were believed to be in Buenos Aires today. Both the survey headquarters in Cambridge and the Foreign Office were tonight trying to confirm their arrival in the Argentinian capital.

And it was expected that negotiations would continue to have the 13 flown back to Britain. "We are very pleased they're safe," said the survey's deputy director, Mr Ray Adie today.

He said he understood the 13 had been held by the Argentinians in Grytviken on South Georgia and then taken off the island by boat. Said Mr Adie: "We think they were taken to the port of Comodoro Rivadavia and from there on to Buenos Aires."

The 13, led by their base commander Mr Steve Martin, had been carrying out various tests on South Georgia. These included meteorological observations, atmospheric studies, seismology tests for the possibility of Andes earthquakes and studies for possible variations in the earth's magnetic field.

"Some of the 13 had been on South Georgia for two years, others were half-way through their two-year stay and some were just there for this summer season," said Mr Adie. "I know they'll be very disappointed to give up their work."

A Foreign Office spokesman said today: "We are still trying to confirm they are in Buenos Aires. If they wish to fly home, we will try to get that arranged."

The British Antarctic survey gave the names of the 13 today as Steve Martin, Chris Bales, Bob Headland, Dermot Hopkins, Brian Lockwood, Alex Pinheiro Torres, Brian Stanswood, David Morris, Chris Drage, Neil Shaw, Bob Banner, Pete Bayman and Terry Whitaker. Most are bachelors and in their early 20s.

SOVIET 'BEAR' PLANE SPIES ON NAVAL TASK FORCE

[A.J. McIlroy dispatch: "Soviet Spy Plane Caught Out by Harrier"]

[Text] Aboard the HMS Invincible -- A long-range "Bear" spy plane has been spotted flying below 1,000 ft within surveillance distance of the British task force. The aircraft carriers Invincible, 19,500 tons, Hermes, 23,900 tons, and support ships have been under intermittent Soviet surveillance since their departure from Britain 11 days ago, Capt Jeremy Black, in command of Invincible, said yesterday.

Earlier a Russian intelligence gathering vessel was spotted close to the convoy. The "Bear" was sighted by a pilot of 801 Harrier Squadron from Invincible. It is an educated guess by the pilots that it had probably taken off on its mission from the Cuban-operated military airfield near Luanda, the Angolan capital.

The four-engined Russian Tupolev 142 equipped with sophisticated electronic surveillance equipment, was intercepted by one of the jump jet Harriers. The Russian plane has a range of 7,000 miles.

In a briefing yesterday, Capt Black said: "Surveillance is obviously an important tool in the hands of governments and the military in particular. He who knows what the situation really is rather than what it is stated to be is in a really strong position.

"The Russians have invested a great deal of money in surveillance which now spreads everywhere in the world. They take an interest certainly in the navies of the Western world and a lot of other things as well. Therefore it is not uncommon in our life to meet up with elements of the Russian surveillance organisation. There has been a certain amount of surveillance of the British task force since it left the United Kingdom."

Asked if the Russian surveillance affected the exercises being carried out by the force or created the danger of an incident, he said: "We have to balance our desire to counter surveillance with our desire to do other things. It is one of the balances we have to make and it is not fearfully inhibiting."

He said that the half-way mark of Ascension Island was not the point of no return of a task force prepared for war to liberate the Falkland Islands. "The instrument of sea power is more flexible than that," he said. "There is no Rubicon in this operation. It can be very finely graduated and it is a sensitive instrument which is why those of us who advocate sea power do so.

"You never know what might be demanded of us on the morrow. I am confident we can handle the Argentine Navy and Air Force. We have the benefit of good equipment and the opportunity of constantly exercising in difficult sea conditions and with our NATO partners so that we were in a high state of training and readiness when we started."

"Our morale and state of readiness now is extremely high. The combination of the send-off we had from the UK, the telegrams of good wishes we had from people and the political support for our mission which has continued in the subsequent debate, plus the atmosphere on board, has placed morale extremely high."

BRITISH CP ISSUES STATEMENT ON FALKLANDS CRISIS

PM161223 London THE MORNING STAR in English 16 Apr 82 p 1

[Text] "Britain stands on the edge of war. That is the meaning of the statements and actions of the Tory Government," the Political Committee of the Communist Party of Great Britain said yesterday in a statement.

"All those in the labour movement, the peace movement and other organisations who are opposed to war should speak out unitedly. A national demonstration is urgently needed to give expression to the concern of those who recognise the danger to peace.

"The leadership of the Parliamentary Labour Party should end its support for the warmongering of the Tories. The Communist Party demands the recall of the British fleet and the lifting of the 200-mile war zone.

"Let no one doubt the threat to peace brought about by Tory policies. The risks are great, including a real danger that once the first shot is fired, the conflict could rapidly spread, draw in others and lead to a general confrontation, including the use of nuclear weapons. Yet the Tory government is prepared to risk such a war with massive economic burdens on the British people and loss of life over the issue of British sovereignty over the Falklands.

"It has been the refusal by successive British Governments to give up the out-dated claim to sovereignty which has been the main factor blocking agreement, and which has led to the present tense and dangerous situation. The lives, rights and interests of the Falkland Islanders can only be fully protected by negotiation, which Tory actions are making more difficult.

"The Argentine junta is a brutal and oppressive regime. It has used the Falklands as a means of boosting support. But it has been helped by the Tory government, which only now hypocritically deplores the dictatorship, after years in which Tory and right-wing Labour governments supplied it with arms.

"Let the call ring out throughout Britain for a return of the Royal Navy to base, withdrawal of Argentine forces and a negotiated settlement through the United Nations."

DAILY TELEGRAPH VIEWS U.S. STAND ON FALKLANDS

[Editorial: "America's Role"]

[Text] Outside the British Government, Uncle Sam has probably not been so unpopular in this country for a long time. Conventional wisdom believes that the Americans have rather let us down. It is strange, so the argument goes, that in a choice between an old ally and a ruthless dictatorship President Reagan should still hold to his neutrality. America, the sages mumble reflectively, did after all bang the last nails into the coffin of the British Empire.

Perhaps the feeling emanates from a misunderstanding which has so harmfully clouded British foreign policy since the 1939-45 war. It is that American and British interests always coincide because blood, history and two world wars give us kinship. The Falklands crisis has shown us that, though our interests may be very similar in Europe, this cannot be so everywhere in the world. Those British politicians who have previously seen America as a kind of endlessly beneficient paterfamilias react a little bitterly to this hard fact of international relations.

It is difficult for them to grasp that America is a separate nation among whose many responsibilities the maintenance of a happy alliance with the Argentine must legitimately count.

But America's closest friends here do not doubt that if war breaks out between Britain and the Argentine the Pentagon will decide (no doubt taking note of the fiercely pro-British American public opinion) that its interests lie with its firmest NATO ally. There are reports of covert surveillance assistance already given. These may be at odds with the repeated statements on neutrality made by Mr Haig, but he seems to believe, very possibly incorrectly, that mediation demands public impartiality. Mrs Jeane Kirkpatrick, United States representative at the United Nations, does not. Her statement that "If the Argentines own the islands, then moving troops into them is not armed aggression" seems to qualify her for a post in the office of Gen Galtieri. But she, we must remember calmly, is not Uncle Sam.

STATEMENT ON KIPRIANOU-KHRISOSTOMOS RIFT ISSUED

["Official" statement released 16 April]

[Text] Referring to the decision by the president of the republic to attend [Easter] mass in Limassol, his birthplace, some newspapers this morning discuss the party wrangling introduced during the Easter holidays, a rift between the church and state, and various other pertinent topics. These papers wish to throw responsibility regarding the issue of relations between the president and Archbishop Khrisostomos on the president. These papers, however, forget the recent unprovoked slander of the president by the archbishop. They also forget that the president, respecting these holy days and the people's religious feelings, as well as the crucial moments our fatherland is going through, did not attempt to give any reply and, in general, refrained in every way from fanning the fire. The fact that he did not reply, however, does not mean that he was not bittered or indignant.

With regard to the allegations that the president interfered with the relay by the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation of the Easter mass and was involved in the use of the policy band for the Good Friday ceremony and in the censoring of the archbishop's encyclical, the president did not interfere in these questions at all.

The president is sincerely grieved at this situation for which he is not responsible at all. His goal has always been unity, not division, and he hopes for early restoration of tranquillity in relations between the state and the church.

ARCHBISHOP'S MESSAGE ON NORTH-SOUTH UNIFICATION

[Text] Archbishop Khrisostomos in his Easter message underlines the message of love from resurrection and expresses the hope and determination for unification of north and south. In his message which will be read from all churches on Easter Sunday, the archbishop says that resurrection has both a religious and national significance in that it symbolises the hope that crucifixion is not the end. The archbishop appeals for subduing of all differences which disunite the people and calls for carrying on the banner of resistance to foreigners and locals who try to undermine or alter or adulterate the aims of the struggle.

"We are not striving for the half of Cyprus which has been left. That would be mere deferment of total catastrophe and of total elimination of our people from the land of their fathers. We strive for the whole of Cyprus. For the liberation of our lands. For north and south to unite. To regain our ancestral homes and to create conditions of freedom, security and equal rights for all the inhabitants of our islands."

The archbishop refers to the support from Greece and the visit of Premier Papandreou and concludes: "Let us go hand-in-hand for the freeing of our country. Let resurrected Christ bless our struggle."

EDEK RELEASES STATEMENT ON PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

NC161241 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 16 Apr 82 p 1

"Thus this caretakar government must have the consent of the political parties, particularly regarding the ministries related to carrying out the elections. Already the prevailing situation fails to provide guarantees for democratic elections. In all democratic states there is a custom that persons in ministerial positions who have connections with the elections should be approved beforehand by the all sides that participate in the elections. The continuation of the present tactics would be a violation of the democratic procedures, and the possible insistence on appointing party cadres to key position connected with the elections would be an even greater violation. It is imperative that persons of mutual trust be appointed to these positions. The party believes that this is a natural demand of all of the country's political leaders."

Statement on Lissaridhis' Speeches

NC151115 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 15 Apr 82 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] A statement by the press office of the socialist EDEK party says on Vasos Lissaridhis' speeches to cadres to Larnaca, Limassol and Paphos:

1. In analyzing the present situation, the socialist party chairman stressed that if the prospects being opened with PASOK's ascendancy in Greece are not utilized in time and fully, there is a danger that efforts to take the proper course will be undermined. If it is accepted that the Cyprus issue is simply an intercommunal dispute, then it is clear that the tactics are to deinternationalize the issue and to insist on a dialogue, even if this takes the form of a parody, and is outside of what the United Nations prescribed. If, however, it is accepted that the Cyprus issue is one of occupation, then simultaneously the necessary procedure must be adopted to promote this aspect, and the support -- which would be given in the form of measures to pressure the occupation force -- should also be utilized.

2. Unfortunately the progressive leadership in the occupied territories does not appear to understand that an anti-imperialist struggle cannot be waged at the same time an occupation by proxy by imperialist troops is accepted. Moreover, if the "security" of any community is based on the presence of foreign troops, this will inevitably lead to double enosis.

3. Referring to the presidential elections, he stressed that the socialist party believes in a substantive change. When the leadership, which is responsible for the national tragedy, speaks about the change, it ridicules it. Also untenable is any reference to the change when the same forces are kept in power.

The country needs a leadership that correctly and fully utilizes the change in Greece, effectively presents the problem as an issue of occupation, adopts a practical policy to utilize this presentation, promotes the reconciliation of the masses -- the masses are not responsible for the treachery and conditions of occupation -- and that mobilizes all those who sincerely believe in the possibility of a march toward national salvation, adopts socioeconomic measures that will lead to the survival and development of the productive sectors and not to parasitical stances that increase the public debt, the deficit in the trade balance, and the indirect taxation that hits the masses.

GOVERNMENT SEEKING DETENTE IN TURKISH RELATIONS

NC181913 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 18 Apr 82 pp 1, 3

[By Nik. E. Simos]

[Excerpt] The Greek Government has proposed and the Turkish Government has accepted in principle the establishment of a moratorium as a prerequisite for the opening of a new Greek-Turkish dialogue. During this moratorium each side is obliged to refrain from any provocation or agitation against the other.

This initiative by the Greek Government aims at creating a climate of detente in the bilateral relations which, until recently, have been charged with tension by the Turkish side through their continuous violations and transgressions, a fact that did not establish the suitable prerequisites for the opening of a dialogue that would result in a positive settlement of the disputes between the two countries. This period of time varies between 1 and 1/2 and 2 months. The moratorium's duration will depend mainly on the Turkish side's stand, given the fact that soon after General Evren accepted the Greek proposal certain minor -- but indicative of the well-known Ankara retrogressions -- violations have been noticed. As a result of this, agreement on the "moratorium" was renewed following the explanations given which referred to Turkish fears in case the Turkish abstention from their well-known activities would be regarded... as acceptance of the Greek positions. Moreover, the Greek side has accepted with conciliation the Turkish explanations for renewing the "moratorium," particularly after Ankara's answer to our ambassador, Papoulias, for the demarche he made on the instructions from the Greek Government, over the Turkish provocations concerning the minority issue in Thrace. The Turkish side, among other things, specifically accepted that the issue was not one of a Turkish population and a minority, but an issue of a Muslim population and a minority. However, commenting on the minor Turkish violations, despite the agreement on the "moratorium," diplomatic circles expressed the view that General Evren probably does not have absolute control over the middle ranks of the Turkish Armed Forces, who take their own initiatives that result in these provocative actions against our country.

The relations between the two countries are already going through the agreed period of abstention from any action that could be regarded as a provocation against the other. However, given the fact that Greece has never proceeded with actions that would embarrass Turkey, the responsibility of maintaining the "moratorium" and all that has been agreed upon falls on the Turkish side.

In the event that the time that has been agreed upon is completed, even by 2/3, without any Turkish provocations, a first meeting between the Greek and Turkish foreign ministers in Luxembourg on 18 May should not be ruled out. At such a meeting they would probably set the first principles for the opening of a completely new dialogue between the two sides, a dialogue that would not take into account anything that has been discussed so far. It is possible that the attempt to settle the disputes between the two countries through this dialogue would have as its first objective the delineation of the continental shelf, since the settlement of another basic dispute -- Turkey's questioning of the limits of Greek responsibility in Aegean airspace -- is correctly being pursued within the NATO framework.

SPOKESMAN ON U.S.-GREEK CONSULTATIONS OVER BASES

[Text] In reply to questions by the press following reports in the newspapers, the government spokesman stated that there is no message from Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou to President Reagan nor will there be one conveyed by U.S. Ambassador Stearns during his next trip to Washington.

As has been stated before, the government spokesman said the issue of relations between Greece and the United States will be examined at a high level during which the framework will be formulated within which the relevant negotiations will be held. This level is either between President Reagan and Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou or between U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and the Greek prime minister. It is foreseen that the relevant meeting will be held next June in Bonn during the summit meeting of the NATO countries in the West German capital.

The issue of the bases is among the issues which concern Greek-U.S. relations as part of the entire complex of relations between the two countries. Before his departure for Washington, U.S. Ambassador Stearns will meet Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou, as is customary. However, this does not mean that any message will be handed to him for the U.S. President. Furthermore, U.S. under secretary for political affairs, Stoessel, is expected in Greece. Papandreou will have talks with him on these issues, as he had with U.S. Senators (?Kasten) and Leahy a few days ago.

As regards the 7-10 ratio in U.S. military aid to Greece and Turkey, this does not constitute the determining issue for our country. The issue for the Greek Government is the selection of arms; that is, what arms we shall receive, what kind of arms we demand and the conditions for their supply. Of course the change of the 7-10 ratio continues to be favorable to Turkey. But first of all we are concerned with what arms we shall receive that we can use for a local defensive war for our country's defense.

The Greek Government never made a statement on this issue.

EVREN URGES GUARDING DEMOCRACY AFTER RESTORAL

[Public address by Head of State Kenan Evren in Balikesir on 17 April -- recorded]

[Excerpts] I thank you for your sincere affection, hospitality and cheers. With this behavior you give us strength. We are walking with determined steps along an open and bright road with the strength we derive from the nation, taking great care not to move off the right path. We know and we see that there are evil internal and external forces that want to divert us from the right path or prevent us from following it. These evil forces are trying to place certain obstacles in our path. However, we walk on, sometimes going over these obstacles and sometimes cleaning them out. That has always been the case in Turkish history.

The position of our beautiful country, our strategic position, cannot be compared to that of any other country. We are at a point that joins two continents, and if you count Africa, three continents. We are in a key position. Many games have been played throughout history to grab this key. These games are being played today and they will be played tomorrow. For these games to be foiled, we must be in unity and solidarity; we must be strong always and we must work very hard.

In the future, after the country returns to a democratic parliamentary system, certain circles will try to play these games again. My dear citizens, in returning to the democratic parliamentary system and afterwards, you will have great duties because you are the sole owners of this land. You must assess well those who will ask for your votes. Do not be taken in by bright promises. You must assess well whether their promises can be fulfilled. You have listened to many promises. You know which can be fulfilled and which cannot. You have great experience in that. You must make good use of this experience. You must not forget that sovereignty belongs to you, with no reservations, unconditionally. Whatever you say, whatever you want, that will be. However, the persons you will elect to exercise your sovereignty will use these rights on your behalf. Therefore they must be honest, trustworthy, industrious persons who always hold the interests of the country above their own personal interests. There will be political parties again. If these parties have a good footing, the administration of the country will be as good and the future will be bright. Otherwise the situation prior to 12 September will recur.

Many of our citizens are afraid that once we go, the situation will go back to what it was. You should not be afraid at all. This land has its owners. Its greatest and real owners are you. [applause] You will grab those who will bring our country to the same point and clean them up. [applause] Do not forget that there are other forces that will protect this country with you. Naturally those forces will protect the country and the nation. Those forces which have never let anyone trample upon this land left to us by our ancestors will not let anyone do so in the future. [applause]

All existing political systems in the world have their advantages and disadvantages. You cannot show me any political system that does not have its shortcomings. However, it is a fact that the best political system is the parliamentary democratic system, with a parliament composed of the delegates you will elect. However, we must make that system work well. We must not let it degenerate into an institution where interest mechanisms work. If the system did not work well here, if the nation experienced horrible times and if, consequently, such interventions had to be made at times, the reason was both that you had not assessed well the persons you had elected and that the concept of freedom was misunderstood, its limits drawn erroneously. Listen to what our great leader Ataturk said about freedom. I am quoting: Freedom means the ability of a person to do what he thinks and what he wants without any [word indistinct] and intervention by another person.

This is the broadest meaning of the concept of freedom. Persons have never had and can never have such freedom because persons exist in nature and nature itself is not completely free. It must obey the laws of nature. Elsewhere Ataturk says: An endless freedom cannot be imagined. Even the right to live, which is the greatest right, is not absolute.

My dear citizens, we reached that point because we were not able to delineate the limits of freedom well, or because we were not able to push back beyond the limits, by using the authority of the state, the persons who exceeded those limits and because we were not able to give them the punishment they deserved. It is nice to be able to do whatever you want. However, it is impossible in the world we live in. Those who claim that it is possible are either daydreamers who think they are in paradise or anarchists who try to use conditions of extensive freedom to destroy the existing order. As I said in my speech in Bursa, in considering personal freedom we must first consider the peace and security of the community.

On this occasion, I would like to refer to the Turkish press. The aim of certain bans we have placed on the press is not to limit the freedom of the press but to prevent the recurrence of the partisan and political disputes which had, prior to 12 September, exceeded the bounds of morality, caused unease in our nation, invited all kinds of anarchy and placed our country in a very bad light in the world. The aim of these bans is to achieve a new future with feelings of brotherhood and national affection and respect, without looking back again. Undoubtedly we could not have let our internal and external enemies extend their poisonous tongues to our noble nation under the pretext of forming public opinion.

Besides these limitations, look how our administration is criticized in the newspapers every day. We tolerate that. Our administration has no doubt that freedom of the press affects the fate of all the freedom in that country. The press must certainly discuss mistakes and make the people aware of them. However, while doing so it must always protect the interests of the nation and of the state.

The remarks I have made about freedom will be misinterpreted, we know, and certain circles will try to spread the report that we intend to eliminate all freedoms. Do not believe that, my dear citizens. [applause] We will not eliminate personal rights and freedoms, but the gaps which enable people to misuse these freedoms. We will draw the normal limits. In this way the nation's peace and security will be guaranteed.

My dear citizens of Balikesir, it is obviously impossible to say that the present situation in the world is very bright. The new incidents every day exacerbate and complicate the situation. Especially the security of Europe has been shaken, and consequently the nations have stepped up their arms race. It is very difficult to say today where this arms race will lead. As one of the countries suffering most from this race, we are opposed to it, as always. We believe the money spent on arms should be spent for the development and welfare of nations. We believe that, but it is impossible for us to remain outside this arms race on our own so long as the arms race continues. We feel the need to take the necessary measures and we take them.

Under the present world conditions, our administration is trying to prepare a constitution that can meet the requisites of the country and that will prevent the recurrence of the situation prior to 12 September. It is preparing to have this constitution submitted to your votes, and after it is approved to have a new party law and election law enacted so that we can move forward to a normal democratic system. While involved in these preparations, our administration has announced repeatedly to the entire nation that no political activities will be allowed until all these are achieved. Legal action will certainly be taken against people who insist on contradicting these announcements and who thus make future political investments. They will receive the punishment they deserve. [applause]

There will always be opposition to this administration. It is only natural. Some of them lost their personal interests, others are in jail while some others have had their dreams of that damnable order -- something they had been dreaming about prior to 12 September -- shattered on 12 September. That order was shattered over their heads. [applause] Now the are trying to extricate themselves from the ruins of that order. However, a large number of the misguided youths who were armed and used as tools now feel regret. Yet part of the old administrators have adopted a completely different attitude. This is very regrettable. Some of these hide under an umbrella of Ataturkism. They use Ataturkism as armor in trying to misrepresent and undermine the achievements being made. I have a few things to say to those people.

If the institutions founded by Ataturk are allowed to degenerate, to be derailed, and if his principles are misinterpreted and taught to the youths in that way, we will not remain passive because Ataturk founded them. For example, we could not have allowed the People's Houses founded by Ataturk as a popular school to enhance Turkish culture to degenerate, as it did prior to 12 September, into a center for Marxist-Leninist ideologies. We did not allow that. We closed them down. [applause] If that institution is to be founded again, we will found it the way Ataturk wanted it.

Another exmaple is the principle of revolution, the legacy of Ataturk to this country. Certain circles say the only way is revolution, and thus spread Marxist-Leninist propaganda. Obviously, we were not going to allow that. The revolution of Ataturk is not that.

Another of Ataturk's legacies is the principle of "peace at home and peace in the world." You see and you know how we try to establish peace at home and how successful we have been in this issue with your help and efforts. We are exerting all the efforts we can in international organizations and in our bilateral relations for the achievement of peace in the world. On the other hand, we are making efforts to have good relations with bordering countries, with close neighbors and friendly countries, to further develop these relations in all fields. In doing that, we do not look at the political and economic models of the countries involved because every country is free to choose the model it feels best fits it. This is an internal issue of that country. In fact, if every country did that and refrained from intervening in other countries' domestic affairs, most of the present conflicts in the world would be eliminated.

Acting from this point, we continuously develop and strengthen our friendships and relations. Turkey has now become a country whose friendship is valued more than ever. I have observed this in all the visits I have paid abroad. All our friends are pleased to see that Turkey is stable and developing. My visits will continue, and we will thus further expand and strengthen our friendships. [applause] If certain countries reject our hands extended in friendship, we will not insist much and say it is their business. However, it would be useful to point out that Turkey's friendship has always been useful, its enmity harmful to the country concerned. [applause] Turkey does not want to be enemies with any country.

CENTRAL BANK GOVERNOR ON WORKERS' EARNINGS ABROAD

[Text] Central Bank Governor Osman Siklar has said that efforts were being exerted to transfer into Turkish banks all the saving of Turkish workers abroad, which amount to about $25 billion. In a news conference in Ankara today, Siklar recalled that most of these workers returned home in the summer months for their yearly holidays and added that an intensified campaign was already underway to convince the workers to transfer their saving home.

Siklar said invisible foreign exchange earnings during 1982 were expected to increase substantially, particularly from transportation and other incomes. He expressed hope that imports would be decreased as a result of local products that would meet this demand.

Siklar concluded by announcing that the Turkish Central Bank was awarded the international Golden Mercury prize and explained the significance of the prize.

BOMB ATTACKS MADE ON FRENCH EMBASSY, AIR FRANCE

AU190642 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0500 GMT 19 Apr 82

[Text] Last night, bomb attacks were made against the French Embassy building in Vienna and against the office of the Air France airline on Vienna's Kaertnerstrasse. Nothing is known to date about the dynamiters or their motives. Police are checking reports according to which two suspicious men were seen shortly before the attack near the Air France office on Kaertnerstrasse. The French Embassy reportedly has received threatening telephone calls for the past few days. The force of the explosion smashed the display window panes of the Air France office as well as numerous window planes in the vicinity. The material damages are running into the millions of schillings. No one was injured. At the French Embassy on Vienna's Schwarzenbergplatz, the bomb was apparently thrown into the garden, where it detonated in front of a cellar window and destroyed a water pipe. Some windowpanes were smashed in the vicinity of the embassy as well, but here the damages were smaller.

SCHMIDT INTERVIEWED ON DOMESTIC, WORLD AFFAIRS

DW160733 Hamburg DIE ZEIT in German 16 Apr 82 pp 3-5

[Marion Graefin Doenhoff, Theo Sommer and Rolf Zundel interview with FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt; date and place not given]

[Text] ZEIT: Mr Chancellor, SPD party congresses in the FRG are traditionally among the most exciting events -- especially before the fact. This also applies to the Munich party congress. The opposition expects the SPD's incapability of governing to become completely apparent there. The FDP is viewing things with suspicion and is wondering whether it will lose its coalition partner. Journalists are anticipating a dramatic spectacle. The comrades hope that a Social Democratic policy will become recognizable and that there will be a "new beginning." Thus there are very many contradictory and divergent expectations. What do you think the party congress should achieve?

Schmidt: The German media and German journalism have made a habit of considering any Social Democratic party congress to be an extraordinarily dramatic event in advance and of asserting that it will be shaken by struggles and controversies. Once the party congresses closed, the echo in most cases was relatively short, and some lacked the courage to subsequently correct the commentaries they had written earlier. This will be true again this time.

The task of a party congress is always to conduct open and public discussions on all conceivable controversial issues. At the same time the task is to provide reassurance as to the party's own position and to achieve internal accord on the road directly ahead.

In some cases -- as occurred in Godesberg in 1959 -- the party congress has the additional task of coming to terms on the long-term course, not just in the immediate future but in the intermediate or even long-term future. Probably this will play a secondary role this time. I assume that defining a position will command our attention in Munich, that is, drawing up an interim balance sheet and defining the course for the second half of the current legislative period of the Bundestag.

ZEIT: The Munich party congress will take place at a time when the SPD's standing with the public is worse than it has been in a long time. Broad segments of the public -- including your own followers -- feel that the coalition might break apart this year. Some ascribe inflexibility not only to the vehicle, the SPD, but lately also to you. For example, talk about a cabinet reshuffle continues for so long until a minister kicks loose the layer of snow threatening an avalanche with her resignation and thus it looks as though the chancellor is no longer in control of events. What can the party congress do to change in this rather gloomy picture?

Schmidt: It can certainly contribute to helping clarify the image of the party as a whole. Only to a lesser degree can it exert a favorable influence on the reputation of the Federal Government; rather, it will have the capability of exerting a negative influence on it. As far as the cabinet reshuffle is concerned, I am not responsible for all the idle talk. However, I will also not allow journalists and newspapers to tell me that I'd better reshuffle the cabinet and when. Under the basic law this is my own decision, and I will not let it be taken away from me.

ZEIT: Do you see the certainty of a new beginning with the introduction of some new personnel into the cabinet? In March 1974, when the SPD and the government were at a similar low, you yourself said: "It is necessary to go a bit farther than just exchanging a few people."

Schmidt: I am not normally inclined to exchange people I trust for new ones whose contribution is unproven. All the same, even though it is unusual in the history of German democracy for someone to be chancellor for 8 years, it would be even more unusual for each minister to stay in his position for 8 years as well.

Rather, it is normal in a democracy for cabinet reshuffles to take place from time to time. This would be normal under any circumstance and not just in the present domestic situation, and presumably it would be indicated in any event sometime around the middle or just after the middle of the legislative period.

ZEIT: It goes without saying that under present circumstances a kindling effect is anticipated from this cabinet reshuffle.

Schmidt: Such expectations should not be exaggerated. Personnel changes will not change the economic situation nor the social and foreign policy situations.

ZEIT: The other day you warned the Social Democrats against regarding themselves as an "umbrella organization for the propagation of minority groups with minority opinions." Where can a majority opinion still be seen, anyway?

Schmidt: It will become evident at the party congress -- just wait and see. At the moment the decisive problem for the SPD's character is not the existence of minority opinions on many issues; the decisive problem is that minorities also must be prepared to accept majority decisions.

ZEIT: Where are the most virulent minorities to be found?

Schmidt: There will be militant debates at the party congress in a number of fields. What will be of great significance is, first, security and foriegn policies -- which I would lump together under the label of peace policy; second, energy policy; and third, the economic, social and finance policies in general.

ZEIT: There is declared opposition to the government's line in security policy in the persons of Eppler, Lafontaine and also Klose. The representatives of this wing want a moratorium on medium-range weapons and an immediate renunciation of preparations for deployment. Yet the document on guiding principles [leitantrag] of the party executive board also contains a few things which do not necessarily agree with government policy.

Schmidt: Like what?

ZEIT: For instance, the statement that deployment is not automatic and that no deployment will take place before ths SPD has made up its mind.

Schmidt: I am not inclined to consider this a great problem. In the event the Geneva negotiations on medium-range weapons achieve no results, the FRG surely would not be the only state in the North Atlantic alliance whose government would then carefully analyze the situation that had emerged. This will happen in any event, especially if the SPD remains a participant in the government. Somebody who likes things simple might think it is superfluous to state this, however, there probably is no doubt that it will indeed be that way.

However, you should also not harbor any doubts that the Federal Government has undertaken out of inner conviction -- in the event of a failure in Geneva -- to act in keeping with the provisions of the NATO dual decision which we helped prepare.

ZEIT: Thus there will be no moratorium and unilateral renunciation?

Schmidt: I do sympathize with people who, because of utterances from the third and fourth ranks of the Republican Party in the United States and because of utterances from the third and fourth ranks of the current administration in Washington, have been plunged into doubt about the seriousness of some Americans with regard to their intention to achieve positive results at the negotiations on the limitation of the intercontinental-strategic weapons and at the negotiations on limiting Eurostrategic weapons, that is an agreement binding on both sides -- the Soviet Union and the United States.

I understand these doubts because we have heard quite a few rather confusing statements from the United States. Some of them spoke about nuclear warfare limited to Europe; others spoke of first attaining superiority before thinking of disarmament. What makes this even worse are remarks such as those about living in a prewar rather than in a postwar period. In addition, there is the justified feeling that several Americans talking publicly nowadays about Europe's defense understand much less about Europe than we understand about America. Moreover, there is a lack of understanding for FRG's special situation.

ZEIT: How would you characterize this special situation?

Schmidt: The situation of the FRG and the Germans living here is categorically different from that of the French and British, to use a comparison. First the Federal Republic borders on that part of Europe where the presence of Soviet military power reduces our feeling of security to a great extent and in a continuous way.

Second, unlike France and Great Britain, the FRG -- which does not nor wishes to nor should possess nuclear weapons -- is fully dependent in the nuclear sphere on the readiness of the United States to provide us with its nuclear umbrella and protection.

Third, in the conceivable event of a conventional war, these meager 240,000 square km making up the FRG will not only be the first but also the central battlefield -- not French territory, let alone British territory.

Fourth, deep in our soul exists the highly significant awareness of the partition of our nation -- the knowledge that the Germans on both sides of the present line of demarcation not only would inevitably have to make the greatest sacrifices but that even in peace time any tension might also make contacts between the Germans here and over there even worse than they are today. We are aware that they are much better now than they were, say, 20 years ago at the time of the Khrushchev ultimatum or the construction of the Berlin Wall. This improvement, slight as it may be, is of paramount importance to us Germans and we do not want to damage it.

Fifth, there is the awareness of the geostrategic island nature of Berlin.

Sixth, we must at least add the readiness of our citizens, who are aware of all these special circumstances, to entrust their freedom from foreign pressure or dictate to the protection of the United States and of other allies. Just how strongly this will prevails among the German people could be seen just recently in a public opinion poll carried out by the U.S. Gallup institute throughout Europe -- a poll that showed that much more strongly than the Italians, French or British, the Germans put their stakes on protection by the United States and are prepared to approve of the presence of U.S. nuclear weapons on their territory.

ZEIT: What does all this mean for our alliance policy?

Schmidt: I have never doubted that Moscow's desire for the expansion of communism is indeed pursued wherever it does not encounter adequate resistance. Consequently, I have never doubted the necessity of resisting the Soviet Union in the psychological and political spheres as well as in the military sphere, especially in Western Europe. The preservation of the freedom of the Germans needs this resistance, and this can be provided only through our affiliation and full cooperation within the Atlantic alliance.

ZEIT: Are nuclear weapons also required for this purpose?

Schmidt: A superiority of Soviet conventional forces has existed in Europe since the end of the war for purely demographical reasons alone in addition to the military geography of Europe which became reality after Yalta and Potsdam. At first this led to a strategic approach based on the strategic superiority of the United States existing at the time in the field of nuclear weapons in order to counter the conventional Soviet superiority.

After the Soviet Union also became a nuclear strategic power, the balance was maintained by a complicated variety of equations -- flexible response, mutually assured destruction, balance of vulnerabilities and so forth -- equations which are hardly fathomable and comprehensible to nonexperts. Also, the military nuclear options of mutual total destruction spread down to the so-called theater weapons. (Although this sounds harmless, it nevertheless represents definite lethality.)

Since 1975 the Soviet Union has attained an impressive one-sided superiority in this field with Eurostrategic weapons through an immense missile modernization program in the form of the SS-20's and, in addition, in the form of three other missile programs.

I have never been afraid that Mr Brezhnev might some day push the famous button. Yet I must always fear that some day somebody holding central power in the Kremlin might use this arsenal for political pressure on the FRG on other non-nuclear states, even if only through very cryptic hints and innuendos. France and England are not affected because they are in a position to threaten the Soviet Union with unbearable damage and thus to deter the Soviet Union from blackmailing them. It is obvious that in this situation it is necessary to establish a balance in Eurostrategic weapons as well.

ZEIT: What about arms control and disarmament?

Schmidt: It is my firm and irrevocable conviction that it is naturally most important to establish a balance through reductions on the Soviet side and not through an attempt at an arms race. Even if you are inferior, as obviously is the case with the Eurostrategic weapons, no one can be sure to accurately calculate where such a race will end. Therefore, I advocate the so-called dual decision. Here, too, the will to achieve a balance through negotiations -- if possible, a balance through the absence of Eurostrategic missiles on both sides -- has absolute priority over counterarmament.

If you like, you can view this dual decision as an exemplary application of the 1967 Harmel philosophy of the North Atlantic alliance. This gave the alliance a dual mandate -- namely, to create sufficient military capabilities, on the one hand, and, based on these capabilities, to show the will for negotiations, accords, agreements and even cooperation, on the other.

ZEIT: Do you think the disarmament negotiations have a chance?

Schmidt: Despite some irritating remarks coming from the other side of the Atlantic and despite some very irritating acts by the Soviet Union, I still think that arms limitation negotiations and the resulting agreements, which will be binding on both sides, are possible and have a big chance. In particular I continue to trust in U.S. President Ronald Reagan's will to make the negotiations succeed.

ZEIT: In this respect you differ from many of your fellow party members.

Schmidt: Although I have understanding for some Germans and also some of my own fellow party members who don't share this trust to the same degree, I can by no means accept their conclusion that the West should unilaterally renounce its armament efforts in the hope that the Soviet Union will follow the good example.

There is no reason to assume that the Soviet Union will follow the good example; there is no historical evidence of this having ever happened on any other occasion, in any other field or for any other reason. It is equally important that, unless absolutely vital for our existence, we must not do or let anything happen at present which would seriously jeopardize the Western alliance's military cohesion.

ZEIT: What percentage of the delegates to the party congress will agree with your rational analysis without doubts or mental reservations?

Schmidt: Many delegates will have inner doubts, to be sure. I, too, have doubts often enough in the course of a year about the adequacy of each of the steps taken in common by the alliance.

People who never have doubts must be very stupid; only stupid people don't have doubts. However, I think there will be a very clear decision.

ZEIT: There is a second subject about which many delegates to the party congress will also have doubts -- energy policy. The special commission has recommended a 2-year moratorium on the start of construction of nuclear powerplants. You don't agree. Why?

Schmidt: I don't quite see why I should find this acceptable. I also don't quite see what the use of introducing a moratorium.

ZEIT: The argument is that not enough progress has been made regarding the disposal of nuclear waste.

Schmidt: You could very well hold the view -- and I would share it -- that so far insufficient progress has been made worldwide regarding the disposal of waste from nuclear powerplants. This is an urgent problem for all states with nuclear powerplants. However, progress in this field is greater in the Federal Republic than anywhere else in the world. I don't see at all why something that is acceptable in Britain, France, the Soviet Union or the United States shouldn't be acceptable in Germany.

Since the atom is also involved here, I understand very well that many worries and fears about nuclear weapons also apply to nuclear powerplants. I am not worried very much about nuclear waste disposal. Just as France has reprocessed nuclear waste for us in the past, other countries will be equally prepared to do this as long as we are unable to do so. There will also be countries which are prepared to dispose of the last bit of nuclear waste somewhere hundreds of kilometers away from human settlements. However, in the long run we don't want to dispose of this waste hundreds of kilometers away, but deep in the earth in mines specially built for this purpose.

ZEIT: Do you consider the compromise formula unnecessary and useless?

Schmidt: I consider it to be useless, superfluous and apt to affect the international competitiveness of the German economy. In addition, I or the Hessian minister-president shared this view, a common policy with the coalition partner wouldn't be possible in the Hesse Land Government or the Federal Government. This is not the primary motive but a secondary additional motive that I don't want to hide.

ZEIT: Do you want to force the party congress to make a clear decision?

Schmidt: No, I can't force a party congress to do anything. We will urge the congress to make a decision.

ZEIT: Do you expect you will prevail?

Schmidt: Those who are democrats by conviction are also convinced that democratic bodies make reasonable decisions. I wouldn't accept a false decision on the fields we are talking about here and, as former Federal Chancellor Willy Brandt did twice, I would have to point out that the Federal Government is accountable to the German Bundestag in addition to its own conscience and that the guidelines of our policy cannot be determined by a party congress.

ZEIT: There are things you consider unacceptable. You told your Bundestag faction the other day: "You must know that you cannot pursue different policies with the same driver."

Schmidt: That's right.

ZEIT: You have linked your political destiny with the NATO dual decision. Are there any other issues in which you....

Schmidt: One shouldn't make such announcements too generously.

ZEIT: Regarding the third important party congress topic -- economic financial and employment policies -- the SPD proposes to demonstrate what Social Democratic policy is really like. It wants to "show the flag."

Schmidt: It is not in this field alone where it needs to show the flag.

ZEIT: As Holger Boerner puts it, the SPD has a historically developed competence for questions concerning workers and employees, that is, concerning labor. The facts suggest that the SPD also has such questions to deal with: Nearly 1 million new jobs are necessary to work for the children of age groups with high birth rates. The SPD must consider this problem.

Schmidt: I agree with you.

ZEIT: The document on guiding principles demands an employment policy offensive for the eighties. Is this in keeping with your own ideas of how the economy can be cranked up?

Schmidt: It is necessary to differentiate between the medium-term aspect of the eighties and the direct aspect of 1982-83. At the moment we are in the second worst world economic crisis of this century. If a number of states continue to compound the mistakes that led to this economic crisis, then no individual state can succeed in freeing itself from the consequences. The FRG especially cannot be successful in that regard because in the area of both imports and exports, and thus in employment, it is more strongly tied to the world economy than are France and England. It is three times as tightly interlocked with the world economy as is the United States and twice as tightly as Japan.

First of all regarding the direct aspect of 1982-83, nothing is more important than exerting a strong influence on the rest of the partners in the world economy, especially on the great and most important partners to prevent them from making -- influencing them so that each state will do what is expected of it as a contribution to the recuperation of the common world economy, even if this is not popular at home.

Second, it is important that we deflect to the greatest possible extent the effects of this world economic crisis from our own economy and our employment situation. In this respect we have so far been successful to a degree which -- barring Japan -- exceeds that of all other industrial states. Of all states of the North Atlantic alliance and of the European Community -- with the sole exception of the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg -- the FRG has the lowest unemployment rate, and this is no coincidence.

The decisive tasks for the next 18 months lie in these two fields. In connection with the second area, we can't do anything that might jeopardize the rapid equalization of our balance of payments. To be more specific we must equalize the balance of our services, as well as our transfer and trade balance -- of our gross trade and services balance -- so that we will be able to dissociate ourselves as soon as possible -- even farther than is the case thus far -- from prevailing world interest rates.

In our country the interest rate for 10-year loans is just below 9 percent. In some states not so far from us, rates of 15 percent apply, and in other countries the rate is 20 percent. We must still advance a great deal further so that mortgage interest rates will become more affordable and the construction sector can start going again.

ZEIT: What is supposed to happen in the medium and long term?

Schmidt: Quite definitely this includes the creation of jobs for the numerically large age group which is now leaving school. An additional job in itself however, does not yet represent adequate assistance. It must also be profitable in the long run so that it doesn't collapse tomorrow, that would mean making a bad investment.

This includes international competitiveness. This includes the realization that we cannot be cheaper than others. Our real standard of living is very much higher.

If we do not wish to take a loss here, our real wage costs must be higher as well and, since our real pensions are very much higher, our real wage-related costs are bound to be very much higher. We cannot be any cheaper in this field.

Consequently, we must try to make savings in other cost fields -- for instance, through oil and energy savings. The energy our automotive consumers, or house heating consumers and industrial installations have managed to save during the past 5-6 years is fabulous and is indicative of a development in the right direction. However, we must try to do better, to be on the spot more quickly, to offer better service and better packaging, and to impart a greater drive toward innovation to our economy.

ZEIT: Last June you said in a DIE ZEIT interview that by the end of 1982 the situation would be much better. Where, in your view, would a change for the better be most likely: In economic policy, in foreign policy or at the Geneva disarmament negotiations?

Schmidt: Not in economic policy. The world economy as a whole depends substantially on the American leadership role. The U.S. economy alone accounts for more than one-third of the gross national product of all industrial states in the world. The financial-political importance of the United States is even greater. Eighty percent of all official foreign exchange reserves in the world are held in U.S. dollars. In credit operations the role of the dollar is even more important. The foreign currency markets -- mostly called Euromarkets -- today have a volume of dollar 1.7 trillion out of which three-fourths are fixed in U.S. dollars. In other words, three-fourths of all participants in the Euromarkets pay interest in dollars, interest which has not only a very high nominal but also a much higher real rate than ever before in this century.

The most important key of the recovery of the world economy is held by the Americans. Important keys are also held by the Germans, the French, the Canadians, the British, the Japanese, the Italians and others. The Germans' key is too small to do anything without the other keys being used as well.

However, the Germans at present are about to disengage themselves more than before from the world market interest rates. They are beginning to substantially expand exports to other countries, although the world economic situation is not improving. This is a very positive sign. In addition, there is the fact that the German trade unions have been prepared in an exemplary manner to justify wage agreements to their members which have led to cuts in real net income. This is an act of solidarity toward their unemployed colleagues because in this way production cost increases of the German economy are kept low and consequently the export and employment opportunities are rising.

All things considered -- interest rate reductions in Germany with a continuing downward trend, the recovery of the payments balance, modest wage cost increases and the very good export business -- all this makes me assume that the German economy will improve noticeably during 1982.

ZEIT: What does this mean specifically regarding the rate of inflation, growth and unemployment?

Schmidt: The rate of inflation will naturally decrease; it will go down rapidly. The growth rate will increase in the course of the year. The consequences this will have on the labor market will make themselves felt gradually because at first every enterprise will be trying to fully employ its workers who at present are not employed to capacity and are being kept on the payroll for social reasons. All this can be thwarted if America continues its present policy in 1983.

ZEIT: Will you be trying at the economic summit this summer to work on America in this area?

Schmidt: I will indeed.

ZEIT: Many Social Democrats hold the view that you must do something against unemployment now.

In this respect many old proposals have been made again such as the supplementary tax and luxury goods taxation. Do you think this can be carried through against your coalition partner and do you believe it will be helpful at all?

Schmidt: Personally, I consider the supplementary tax to be necessary; I stated that at least twice before the Bundestag. I would confine it to the higher incomes. This would not fill the state coffers to an extent which would allow us to finance employment activities. Nevertheless, for reasons of fairness I consider it to be indispensable. However, the majority has not supported it. The SPD congress will adopt other resolutions for which there will be no majority in the Bundestag.

ZEIT: Isn't it the problem that many things are considered to be necessary in your party -- under the motto: Present a Social Democratic profile -- which are incompatible with the coalition?

Schmidt: Not incompatible. Rather, you need a majority for every law, and above all you need a majority for almost all fiscal laws, not only in the Bundestag, but also in the Bundesrat.

ZEIT: Willy Brandt said recently he would hesitate to bet that this coalition will last until 1984 under your leadership. Would you bet on it?

Schmidt: The highest amount I have ever bet in my life was DM10 at a derby on the Hamburg-Horn racetrack. I don't much like betting. If I bet DM10 now, everybody would laugh and say: Anybody could make such a bet. If I were to bet a million, well, I don't have that amount. How much do you think I should bet to show how I see the odds? Seriously, I believe some people will be surprised at my toughness and steadfastness.

ZEIT: There is a lot of talk or chatter, whatever you like to call it, about new elections.

Schmidt: The term "chatter" is correct because those who have been talking about it obviously don't know our basic law.

ZEIT: Those who know the basic law know that new elections are possible only through a constructive vote of no-confidence, that is a vote of confidence the chancellor puts with the intention of losing.

Schmidt: I don't have this intention. As for the constructive vote of no-confidence, I wonder. In that case some of those who gave me their vote of confidence in February would have to totally change their minds.

ZEIT: This has happened in politics before.

Schmidt: I will not rule out the possibility of this recurring in politics. But first I would like to see it happen.

ZEIT: But you cannot imagine Chancellor Helmut Schmidt overthrowing himself with the same intention and with the same procedure as did Willy Brandt in 1972, so as to make new elections possible?

Schmidt: No. Why should I do that? Willy Brandt at the time had a majority in the German Bundestag which had become very narrow indeed. From the very beginning it amounted to just a few votes, gradually some of the FDP and some of the SPD dropped off, and in the end a draw was imminent. Hence it was in our own interest -- especially in view of the vast approval of Ostpolitik by the people -- to venture new elections which also resulted in a fabulous showing of the Social Democracy. Today all this looks a bit different. There is neither a draw situation.

ZEIT: ...nor the prospect of winning.

Schmidt: There is no chance of winning at this time, that is correct. But why in the world should I contribute toward making somebody chancellor whom his own party does not consider particularly suited for the job? Would this be a service to the German people? This would not even be a service to the CDU/CSU.

ZEIT: The SPD is stuck in a rather stable, lasting low. In the last elections it lost 25 percent of its voters compared with 1980.

Schmidt: In the Land Diet elections. You cannot compare Land Diet elections with Bundestag elections.

ZEIT: And yet, the voters are running away from you in masses. Some march all the way through to the CDU, others switch over to the Greens, and still others just stay at home and don't even go to the polls. The performance of the government is being more negatively assessed than it has been in a long time, as has its competence for solving problems.

Schmidt: As far as the assessment of the present feelings of the constituency is concerned, you surely are right. But you will see in Hamburg 8 weeks from now already that the Hamburg Social Democracy manages within 12 months to turn a low in the sentiments of the constituency -- such as existed around this time last year -- upside down. And the next Bundestag elections are still 2 years away and not just 12 months.

ZEIT: How do you explain the bad mood in the country?

Schmidt: The fact that the mood is not favorable at this time is attributable to three major factors: First, it is the fact that the Federal Republic of Germany, too, has 1.8 million unemployed people at the moment, losses in the real income of the workers and employees, losses in the real proceeds of the enterprises and in the investment potential of of the enterprises, and that the entire German national economy has been hit hard by the world economic crisis. It has not been hit as hard as have other countries, but in all countries of the world the voters naturally are inclined to blame their own government for these effects.

Secondly, confidence in the coalition has gone down at present, largely as a result of the picture offered by the Social Democratic Party as a whole but also by some phenomena shown by the coalition partner.

The third factor is inherent in the agitation carried out by most German media. As far as I am concerned, this is a temporary factor, because not even FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE can in the long run derive any fun from depicting everything in colors gloomier than they really are. In the course of time, this probably will abate.

ZEIT: In what way could the chancellor convert his personal prestige and the authority of his office into popularity for his government, his coalition and his party?

Schmidt: What do you mean by "convert?" I have fellow party members who would like to initiate a "new beginning." I can understand that well. I wish it were possible, and to the extent that I can contribute to this end, I will. It is necessary to realize, however, that the profound extent of the world economic crisis and its effects on us cannot be eliminated either by party congress resolutions or by government decisions. Hence, I do not wish to leave any room for illusion.

There is no patent solution. If there were any it would be a miracle that neither the French, the Italians, the Dutch, the Belgians, the Britons, the Danes, the Canadians nor anyone else in the world had at least tried it.

There is just one single great country in the world which so far has made a clearly better showing than we have. It is a country with much less of a tie-up with the world economy, with much lower wages and social benefits: Japan. But Japan already is past a phase of losses in the real wages. At the same time, Japan has been pursuing a trade policy which the other partners in the world economy cannot consider appropriate and fair. If everybody pursued the same kind of trade policy as Japan has, the world economy would be plunged into an even worse state. We cannot follow Japan's example.

ZEIT: Do you see any options in foreign policy for improving the mood among the people as well as the prestige of the government and the coalition?

Schmidt: I would be happy if there were any such options. At the moment, the government must do what is appropriate and what is necessary and not what "sells" particularly well on a short-time basis.

ZEIT: Do you still have partners in foreign policy? Giscard has been replaced. A week ago Peter Carrington resigned. A televised report from the United States says that the secretary of state over there has said about you in private that you simply have been living too long in the shadow of the Soviet missiles. Considering the present state of affairs, can you still pursue a foreign policy serving our German interests and the European interests in the same way as it was possible for you to do in the period between 1974 and 1980?

Schmidt: The answer is yes. It is true: People are subject to personnel changes. Yet I must say that the incumbent French president musters as much understanding for the peculiarities of the German situation as did his predecessor, my friend Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

I learned long ago to deal with changing governments in the world. The Reagan administration is the fourth U.S. administration with which I have been dealing -- either as minister or as chancellor. It is my feeling at the moment that the understanding for the German peculiarities is rapidly growing in the United States. And I cannot but repeat: My confidence in the person of the President and also in that of Secretary of State Alexander Haig is very great. I will abstain from commenting on whatever he is supposed to have said.

ZEIT: You don't have the feeling that Washington is working toward overthrowing you?

Schmidt: I would phrase it differently. There are people in German domestic politics who will not shrink back from not only attacking their own government on U.S. soil but also, upon their return home, making a point of spreading the word here that there are opponents to the incumbent Bonn government over there. Surely there are such opponents also in the United States. Yet, it is hard to surpass the undignified deportment of Mr Strauss in this field. So far I have naturally defended Mr Strauss abroad when he has attacked, be it in Washington or in the Kremlin.

Now, to your question: If a government in the alliance would allow being suspected of undermining the government of an alliance partner it would thus simultaneously undermine the alliance. This is hard to imagine. It is also the fault of Messrs Strauss, Zimmermann and Kiep that such an impression arose occasionally.

ZEIT: Can you visualize headway in Ostpolitik or in European policy that might earn this government of yours more splendor again?

Schmidt: The Federal Government in its foreign and security policies must not go by what it could do to obtain splendor. It must go by what it deems necessary. Whatever it deems necessary it cannot pursue all on its own. It needs alliance partners for that purpose.

At the moment we observe how strongly the U.S. President reacts to my desire, which I have advanced several times, that he meet with the Soviet general secretary. I think this is one of the many positive signs that are also discernible in the present situation. A personal meeting of the chiefs of the two superpowers, for instance on the occasion of the UN special General Assembly on disarmament as suggested by Ronald Reagan the other day, quite definitely would facilitate if not trigger the early opening of negotiations on the intercontinental strategic weapons. Beyond any doubt this would be in our interest.

I assume that our urging of an early opening of the START negotiations coincides with American's own interest and that we will be hearing more about it, not later than in June when the summit meeting of the North Atlantic alliance will be taking place in Bonn.

ZEIT: What options are you seeing in European policy?

Schmidt: Considering the growing tensions in the world, it is important for us at the moment to preserve without any damage what so far has been attained in Europe.

We have successfully resisted being pushed into a sort of trade war with the Soviet Union, and if I say "We," I actually mean the great majority of all West European states including the Federal Republic of Germany.

ZEIT: Do you intend to, and will you, keep maintaining on a minimum level the sanctions which the United States demands because of the developments in Poland?

Schmidt: The answer is yes, for as long as whatever happens in Poland does not grow worse than it is now, because I am sure that the French Government, the British Government and the rest of the governments in Western Europe in that respect think along the same lines as the Federal Government. This does not mean that we intend to, or even could, drop our demands for the abolition of martial law and for the release of the prisoners, and the demand for the restoration of the national dialogue.

ZEIT: Is there any sense in the Germans sending 30,000 packages a day to Poland, mostly packages containing foodstuffs, to balance the deficits there which are caused by the discontinuation of the U.S. grain and corn deliveries?

Schmidt: In my opinion, the 30,000 packages a day are absolutely necessary: My wife and I also participate in that action. The packages are absolutely necessary for two reasons: To begin with it is necessary to help people in distress, and in the second place it is particularly necessary for Germans to help the Poles in distress because in this way the Poles are made to realize that the Germans on their part are serious about reconciliation.

ZEIT: There are people elsewhere, too, that need help. Just think of the 1,800 inhabitants of the Falklands whose home islands have been occupied by Argentina. The British fleet has embarked. What is our attitude toward this issue?

Schmidt: The forcible occupation of the Falklands by Argentina no doubt constitutes a violation of international law, a violation of the UN Charter. This is why it was also absolutely clear that the UN Security Council could not but condemn this act. We share the view of the Security Council. We have contributed toward the joint decision of the 10 states of the European Community. Quite unequivocally, we stand by our British allies in this matter, for highly rational reasons -- because of the alliance, because of the British guarantee for Berlin, but also because of emotional reasons toward our English friends. And we just cannot ignore the obvious readiness of a military dictatorship in Argentina to laugh international law off.

Irrespective of our friendship with the Argentinian people, just as irrespective of our friendship with the Polish people, such friendships and sympathies just cannot lead to a point where violations of law by the military governments ruling there are recognized or covered with the cloak of charity.

ZEIT: One more question about the situation of the SPD. No matter how hard you have made it for your party sometimes, and no matter how hard the party is making it for you at times: Could you imagine yourself making politics in some other party?

Schmidt: That I cannot imagine, nor have I ever been able to imagine it. By the same token, it is impossible for someone bearing responsibility for the whole country, for the sake of a short-term, farther-reaching approval and in keeping with the assumed or actually expressed wishes of his own party, to allow himself to be urged into taking decisions that might anyway fail to find the necessary majority in the Bundestag and Bundesrat on a short-term basis or that will, on a medium-term basis, perhaps meet with adequate support but cannot produce the effect, the result, that one had anticipated.

No doubt there are fields in which something new needs to be done and will be done. These include the field of property accumulation in the sphere of productive assets. They definitely include the protection of our natural environment even though in that respect I am, alas, only too aware of the potential cost factors in international competition. And surely this is also true in other fields of domestic policy.

Granted, I was not born a Social Democrat. Yet ever since political freedom has been prevailing in Germany, I have been a Social Democrat, and I propose to die being that. The Social Democratic Party and what it stands and fights for are part of my own life, part of my own soul, if you will. This will remain unchanged.

BRANDT ADDRESSES CONGRESS; ENDORSES COALITION

[Excerpts] Munich, 19 Apr (DPA) -- SPD Chairman Willy Brandt has called on his party to make a "fresh major effort" to overcome the SPD's popularity crisis by clarifying its political goals, through stronger internal cohesion and by strengthening the SPD/FDP coalition in Bonn. "Let us start to venture forward. Let us make Munich a party congress of Social Democratic revival," Brandt stated today in his report at the beginning of the 5-day SPD party congress. He pledged himself to the Bonn coalition which requires reorientation of its reform policy as a precondition for its continued coherence. Brandt called on the SPD to back Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and strongly canvassed the support of the 400 delegates for the party leadership's proposals, backed by Schmidt, on the central congress themes of employment and security policy.

The party chairman admitted his party's shortcomings, mistakes and weaknesses, but criticized the image and policy of the government coalition during the past few months. "The valley we are now going through is deeper and more unfriendly than others we have had to go through in the past decade and a half." Brandt also gave the assurance that "We shall not run away from the task of government responsibility, nor shall we dissociate ourselves for supposedly strategic interests." The SPD must not quit for reasons of European and peace policy and has to go on seeing to it that the people in the Federal Republic live better than in other comparable countries even at a time of economic difficulty. Turning to the CDU/CSU opposition, he stressed, "Anyone with little interest in detente and left cold by unemployment has nothing to seek in the federal chancellor's office."

Brandt said that the SPD stands by "the Social Democratic federal chancellor and the coalition with the Free Democrats." The party has no reason to hide itself. "If we display a definite image the citizens will again know themselves in us."

In the foreign policy part of his speech Brandt, clearly supporting the chancellor's policy, warned against a move away from the NATO dual decision hotly disputed in the SPD. He came out in favor of decisive steps in favor of disarmament and of continuing the policy of detente, and pledged himself to the Western alliance as well as to friendship with the United States. Brandt argued in favor of adhering in principle to the NATO dual decision and pointed out that the SPD has to do everything humanly possible for the success of the negotiations in Geneva between the United States and the Soviet Union on European medium-range weapons, and has to refrain from anything which might jeopardize this success. The NATO dual decision must not be raised anew at the party congress, it is a fact. "A move away from the NATO decision could supply the Soviet Union with an excuse for not negotiating seriously. And it would give the United States cause to depart from its commitment to serious negotiations. We cannot and must not desire either of the two." In Brandt's view, the history of disarmament efforts offers no grounds for optimism with regard to the negotiations, "but throwing in the tewel in peace policy doesn't help at all." The party chief, however, also affirmed that the NATO decision does not give rise to an automatic mechanism for stationing new nuclear missiles in every case.

Schmidt Speaks

[Excerpts] Munich, 20 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has strongly urged the SPD against relinquishing its government responsibility in Bonn, called on the party to strengthen its ability to act and pledged his support for continuing the coalition with the Free Democrats.

Addressing the SPD congress in Munich today, Schmidt spoke of the historic importance of this congress. The SPD should not, unnecessarily or through its own fault, gamble away its chance of shaping German policy from a position of government responsibility. "I am fighting with Willy Brandt and Herbert Wehner for us to remain the determining political force in our country."

His urgent warning against a government takeover by the CDU/CSU was said by Schmidt to be based on the fact that the opposition leadership in government would replace cooperation with confrontation as far as foreign policy is concerned, would apply unsuitable formulas in economic and social policy and would cut social aid and unemployment benefits.

Like party Chairman Brandt the day before, Schmidt called on the SPD to make a "great new effort." The SPD needs realism with regard to the two major worldwide challenges of the economic crisis and the threat to peace "and a renewal of our sense of community." It is the SPD's duty toward its voters and also the millions of Germans in the GDR who pin their hopes on Social Democracy's policy of peace to strengthen its ability to act. He called on his party to unite and to stand up for each other and promised that he would do his own share in this respect.

On the question of security policy, the second main topic of the congress, along with the employment policy, the chancellor, like Brandt the previous day, strongly opposed abandoning NATO's dual decision on European medium-range missiles as urged by the party's leftwing and also rejected a moratorium on these weapons because no Soviet superiority is acceptable. Schmidt spoke out just as strongly against a 2-year development halt on nuclear energy, a proposal put forward by the application commission but which is to be withdrawn with the support of a large section of the party leadership.

Schmidt expressed "relative optimism" with regard to the economic situation. There is much to indicate that the economy's lowest point will be overcome during the second half of this year "and an economic upswing will assert itself in 1983." Schmidt gave as reason for this the favorable export development, the improvement in the balance of current accounts, the fact that the level of German interest rates has detached itself considerably "from the dangerous U.S. interest rate development" and also the wage settlements.

An economic upswing could not, however, lead to a rapid reduction in unemployment. The financial framework will continue to be very constricted during the coming years. "That is why my advice is to be very cautious about all promises which carry financial consequences." Some of the reforms desired by the SPD would have to be postponed for the time being. According to Schmidt, the SPD gives political priority to eliminating mass unemployment and regaining sufficient economic growth. He renewed his appeal to the CDU/CSU-governed leaders to abandon their irresponsible "blockade policy" against the government's employment program. Obviously addressing the FDP coalition partners, Schmidt opposed the "unreasonable demand" for further spending cuts in the federal budget: "We must not economize the economy to death."

The chancellor urged the two coalition parties in Bonn to have consideration for each other while pursuing their interests. Constancy and perseverance with regard to the agreed basic policy lines is required on the part of both. Schmidt expressed the conviction that FDP leaders Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Wolfgang Mischnick will stand by the coalition. "They know that the fundamental aspects of their liberal policy concepts can only be realized in this combination of parties." Schmidt called on the SPD not to depart from the road of arduous comprise, including in relations with the FDP, because the state will otherwise be surrendered to the leadership "of Messrs Strauss and Kohl."

On the subject of foreign policy, the chancellor outlined the Federal Government's policy with a fresh expression of loyalty to the Western alliance, but at the same time support for the "security partnership" with the Eastern states on the principle of an approximate military balance. He once again accused the Soviet Union of jeopardizing this balance by its unilateral "stepped-up arming" in nuclear medium-range weapons.

Schmidt said the goal of the Geneva talks between the two super powers on these weapons is a "mutual zero solution," in other words these weapons should be relinquished in East and West. He reminded the congress that he had linked his political fate with the success of the talks. Schmidt countered the demand by the party left for a moratorium with the argument that the Geneva talks between the United States of America and the Soviet Union would only be successful given the threat of the West's counter arming from 1983 onwards.

On domestic policy, Schmidt said that a new initiative is urgently needed to increase employees participation in increasing productivity. He referred to wage settlements in this respect and said the possibility of state encouragement is small. Schmidt appealed to the trade unions to revise their hesitation over such plans.

The chancellor made no mention of the cabinet reshuffle at the congress. In his more than 2-hour speech, Schmidt devoted a lot of time to the relationship between chancellor, the government and the party, whereby he repeatedly stressed his claim to leadership. However, his person is "less important than some people believe." He conceded in this respect "that I have made mistakes and that I will not be able to avoid making further mistakes in future."

With regard to internal party development, Schmidt reaffirmed his policy of distancing himself from those Social Democrats who stated that they would, if necessary, fight for their ideas even "outside the SPD." Anyone who acts in this way could "forfeit his own claim to solidarity among comrades." There is a trend of increasingly far-reaching divisions and splits but the SPD is "neither a marginal nor a class party," but a people's party whose voters represent a broad alliance of workers, employees and all ohter sections of the population. The SPD must again adopt as its basic rule the old demand by the workers' movement: "Diversity in discussion, but unity in action."

GENSCHER RECEIVES VIETNAMESE FOREIGN MINISTER

[Text] Bonn, 20 Apr (DPA) -- Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach met with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn this afternoon for a discussion. According to the Foreign Ministry, the exchange of views centered on the international situation and developments in Southeast Asia and particularly Kampuchea.

The Vietnamese politician, who is on a European tour, is the first cabinet member from Hanoi to pay an official visit to Bonn. The Federal Government stopped development aid to Vietnam when the Vietnamese invaded Kampuchea in 1978. Relations between the Federal Republic and Vietnam, which is closely allied to Moscow, are described in Bonn as "businesslike."

CALVO-SOTELO CONDEMNS RECENT TERRORIST ATTACKS

[By Pedro Fernandez Cespedes]

[Excerpt] The Democratic Center Union political council met for over 2 hours today. Following the meeting the party president, Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo, held an unscheduled news conference. He referred to the party leaders' [as heard] condemnation of the resurgency of terrorism.

[Begin Calvo-Sotelo recording] I spoke about the fact that this fresh wave of terrorist attacks has coincided with the courtmartial which is about to enter its final stage and with the process concerning Spain's membership in the Atlantic alliance which is also entering the final stage of ratification. I also pointed out what is new about these latest attacks: Several different types of actions have been taking place within a short space of time and new types of weapons not normally used by ETA-Military are being used. Also, with the exception of the attack on the Rios Rosas telephone building -- which undoubtedly was a total success for the terrorists -- the terrorists have been less effective than they previously were.

I reaffirmed the government's resolve to continue to firmly combat terrorism and to appeal to all citizens, as the minister of interior has already done, not only for calm, but also for active participation in this struggle. [end recording]

DEMONSTRATORS LINK FALKLANDS ISSUE, GIBRALTAR

[Text] Repeated references to the Spanishness of Gibraltar were made at a demonstration in Madrid this evening in support of the Argentine stance in the conflict over the Falkland Islands. The demonstration was called by Falange Espanola. Organizers told the EFE agency that about 100,000 people had attended. Other official sources put the number at between 15,000 and 20,000. Neither the national police nor the municipal police gave a figure.

Argentine and Spanish flags were much in evidence at the rally and many slogans were chanted against the government and against king and in support of those involved in the 23 February [1981] coup attempt. At the obelisk to the memory of those who perished in the war of independence, the national chief of Falange Espanola, Raimundo Fernandez Cuesta, made a speech expressing his solidarity and support for the Argentine nation for its (?civil) gesture in occupying the Falkland Islands. Fernandez Cuesta emphasized the Hispanic sense of brotherhood affirmed daily by the millions of Spaniards living in Argentina and stressed that if the Falklands have returned to Argentina, then Gibraltar should return to Spain.

Others leading the rally included the Former Minister Jose Utrera Molina, Pilar Primo de Rivera and Joaquin Gutierrez, who is president of the Francisco Franco Foundation.

[Excerpts] Army Lt Cristobal Martinez Bordiu Franco, grandson of the former head of state, has been arrested and taken to the San Joaquin Military Castle in Santa Cruz de Tenerife. According to a report from military sources, the 1-month detention has been ordered because of statements he made to INTERVIU magazine in which he announced his intention of leaving the army and made comments that shed an unfavorable light on the military institution of which, they add, he is still a member because he has not yet left the army.

FOREIGN SECRETARY PYM ADDRESSES COMMONS

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Text] Norway has joined the EEC in banning Argentine imports in protest at the Falklands invasion, Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym announced today. And the government is "stepping up the military, economic and diplomatic pressure on Argentina," he said in a Commons statement as MP's returned from their interrupted Easter recess.

Mr Pym declined to disclose details of the continuing negotiations, but he described the peace mission of American Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig in Buenos Aires as providing "the best hope of achieving a peaceful settlement." Refusing to give details of the talks, he said: "The position is still delicate." "We remain grateful to Mr Haig and shall continue to cooperate fully with his efforts," Mr Pym said.

Shadow Foreign Secretary Mr Denis Healey expressed support for the government's insistence on the unconditional withdrawal of Argentine troops before negotiations could open, and was thanked by Mr Pym. "We are grateful for the shared objectives and support you have given the government and Mr Haig in what we are trying to achieve," Mr Pym told him.

"Our naval task force is steadily approaching the area of the Falklands, and we are continuing to strengthen its ability to carry out whatever tasks may be required of it." Mr Pym said the 22 marines captured on South Georgia, the seven from the Falklands and the 13 evacuated British scientists were expected back in Britain "very shortly," having arrived in Montevideo, Uruguay.

"Fifteen British scientists remain in South Georgia and we have their well-being and safety very much in mind," the foreign secretary added. The latest report yesterday confirmed that they were "safe and well."

The three British journalists accused of spying were appearing before a judge today, and the Swiss Embassy in Buenos Aires was watching developments. Mr Pym added: "Argentina must have no doubts about our resolve to exercise our rights to the full if this should prove necessary."

Mr Healey welcomed the news of the Norwegian import ban -- which had been greeted by cheers from all sides of the Commons. He again urged Mr Pym to consider the installation of a United Nations administration on the islands as an interim move, pointing to the "stumbling block" of the sovereignty issue.

The shadow foreign secretary also endorsed Mr Pym's view of the Haig mission as the "best hope" for a peaceful settlement. But he stressed that a breakdown of the negotiations would "free the United States administration to express the view of the American people that America should not behave as neutral between the aggressor and his victim." Mr Healey said the American people saw the issue as a choice between a democratic ally "and a dictatorship whose actions have often been hostile to the United States in recent years."

Mr Pym stressed that the withdrawal of troops remained the first objective, although the methods of withdrawal were "open to discussion." He declined to comment on Mr Healey's call for a United Nations administration, saying it would be "quite wrong" to consider at this stage what might happen if the Haig mission failed. "Our hope and effort must be to do everything possible to make that successful," Mr Pym said. In a later reply to a Tory backbencher, Mr Pym said a UN presence on the islands was "not necessarily the way ahead."

Pressed by Mr Healey on the need to maintain the level of security in Belize during the crisis, Mr Pym said security was being maintained. The situation in Central America was being kept "very much in mind."

Mr Pym backed the present stance of the American Government. "While Mr Haig and the United States administration are trying to achieve the implementation of a resolution by peaceful means it would be inappropriate for them to be in any position other than a reasonably even-handed one," he said.

Mr Enoch Powell said withdrawal of the Argentinian troops could not be conditional on an agreement or possible agreement on the status of the islands. Mr Pym said the status of the islands and the wishes of the islanders were of "paramount importance." Unfortunately, the Argentinians had a different view. The government's principles had been made very clear to the Commons. Sir Angus Maude said unprovoked aggression must not be seen to pay. To Tory Cheers, Sir Angus added that withdrawal must be "total and unconditional without any Argentinian flags of administration being left behind."

Mr Pym said the passing of the UN resolution showed it was a matter of utmost importance to Britain and all freedom loving countries. Mr James Wellbeloved referred to a Ministry of Defence announcement that crews' allowances, which averaged 4 pounds a day, were being replaced by a tax-free allowance of 1 pound a day, paid to all seamen in the Falklands fleet. "Is it not bad enought that the navy is operating under the shadow of cuts in the fleet without adding insult to injury?" Mr Wellbeloved asked. Mr Pym told him: "You must not believe all you read in the papers." The proposals outlined previously by Defence Secretary Mr John Nott were "fair and reasonable."

Sir Nigel Fisher said that if the United Nations were offered a presence on the islands that might be the very factor to induce Argentina to withdraw peaceably. With a UN presence, a referendum of the islanders could be called and "We all know what the result would probably be."

Mr Pym said the government had explored many options but there were difficulties with many of them. Then he added, referring to the UN suggestion: "That is not necessarily the way ahead."

Mr Tam Dalyell said that Mrs Thatcher in the first debate on the crisis referred to Britain's friends in South America. He demanded "Where are those friends? Right, left and centre -- right across the political spectrum and even among people who have suffered from right wing governments -- are we not antagonising the entire Hispanic world?" He said that with an American president whose power base was in California and with such a large Spanish-speaking population, it was an illusion to think the Americans would be even-handed.

But, to Tory cheers, Mr Pym retorted: "I think it is fair to say that most South American states...have expressed their deep concern over the action taken by Argentina." Mr Pym said that while South American states might sympathise with the Argentine's claims, they disapproved of the action taken and this was borne out by the Organisation of American States which did not support the Argentine invasion.

He added that the views of the islanders would have to be sought about their long term future. "At the moment it is quite impossible to ascertain those views until the Argentines have withdrawn completely." He said he "would expect that they would want to be more British even than they were before -- but that is speculation and I don't think we should anticipate that."

The object remained to secure Argentine withdrawal. Mr Maurice MacMillan said that whatever negotiations might be necessary in the future about sovereignty, Britain's sovereignty of the islands was based in law and in British hands "and cannot for mere convenience be put into abeyance under the United Nations or anyone else."

Mr Pym said that the government was in no doubt about its position over sovereignty. The Argentines challenge that. They have a separate claim. They are quite entitled to make that claim and there are various ways of settling it." But an unacceptable way for them to settle it was by the use of force.

Mr Chris Price said that Lloyd's syndicates had today given Argentine Airlines insurance cover and were making arrangements to renew the insurance contracts through Swiss banks to avoid the premiums coming into the UK. Mr Price said: "It is unreasonable to expect others overseas to stick to sanctions if members of the City of London and members of Lloyd's syndicates are ratting on sanctions.

"Are you aware that members of Lloyd's syndicates, who are well represented on the Tory benches, today gave further insurance cover to Argentine Airlines, and they are already making arrangements for May 1, when the Argentine Airlines' insurance contract runs out, to renew it if necessary through Swiss banks so premiums do not have to come into this country? Can you make sure that the City of London puts Britain before its own commercial interests?"

Mr Pym said he could not comment on the specific allegations -- but the City of London was not authorising any new loans to Argentina.

Mr Jonathan Aitken asked Mr Pym to communicate to Washington profound misgivings felt by MPS of all parties about the "ambivalent sounds and signals" coming out of the American administration. He urged the government to protest at the statement made by the US Ambassador to the UN, Mrs Jeane Kirkpatrick, that if the Falklands were the Argentinian's territory they clearly had not "invaded" them.

Mr Pym replied: "While this process is still in hand it does seem inappropriate for the United States government to align itself." But he was conscious that among the American public there was widespread support for Britain's case which they understood very well.

Mr George Cunningham asked if government assistance would be given to Falkland Islanders who wished to leave the area temporarily while it was a "combat zone." Mr Pym said, "There is no evidence at present that Falkland Islanders who wish to leave are being prevented from doing so by the Argentinians." On assistance to the islanders, he said: "This is something we are considering sympathetically."

Referring to the Royal Navy and its support facilities, Mr Pym said the impressive and speedy way they had assembled indicated they were "in fine fettle and in pretty good shape." The foreign secretary also paid tribute to the way the media had handled the crisis. He said he "could not be critical" and press coverage had been acceptable. But some pictures showing the Argentinian force were "as they were," rather than what was actually happening. That should be pointed out.

In the Lords, Foreign Office Minister of State Lord Belstead said the two young English women, Cindy Buxton, daughter of Tory peer Lord Buxton of Alsa, and Annie Price were, according to information, still in South Georgia -- where they had been making a wildlife film when the crisis broke out.

LIBERAL LEADER HAS NO DOUBTS OF U.S. LOYALTY

[By David Healey, PA political staff]

[Text] Liberal leader Mr David Steel said tonight there was "no doubt" about the United States' loyalty to Britain if the current peace moves failed. He was speaking in London after returning from America where he had talks with defence secretary, Mr Caspar Weinberger, and the under secretary of state, Mr Larry Eagleburger.

Mr Steel said: "I was left in no doubt either about the determination of the US Government to seek a peaceful end to this crisis, nor about the loyalty of our NATO ally in the event of this attempt failing." He said he also had a half-hour talk about the Falklands crisis with the new UN Secretary-General, Mr Javier Perez de Cuellar.

Mr Steel said the secretary-general agreed there did not seem to be a role for him at present "though some UN participation in reaching a longer term solution could become relevant." The liberal leader went on: "It is important to distinguish between a UN participation in an interim administration of the Falklands, and a UN attempt to avert the present crisis.

"I see no way in which the latter is any more likely to succeed than Mr Haig's present efforts, and indeed nothing should be done at the moment to detract from or complicate these. The Security Council has played its proper role in opposing hostilities and requiring both sides to settle their differences by diplomatic means following the withdrawal of Argentine troops. At that point we should consider involving the UN further."

UK STILL 'COOL' TOWARD UN PRESENCE PROPOSAL

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Excerpts] The British Government remains cool -- even frigid -- towards the idea of a temporary United Nations presence on the Falkland Islands to enable the sovereignty issue to be thrashed out between Britain and Argentina once the invading force has withdrawn. This became clear both during and after vigorous Commons exchanges this afternoon during which Mr Francis Pym, the foreign secretary, re-asserted that there can be no direct talks with Argentina while their troops remain on the islands.

Meanwhile there was no immediate response in Whitehall to reports from Buenos Aires that U.S. secretary of state, Alexander Haig, resumed his protracted talks with Argentine leaders today amid signs that the president, General Galtieri, and his junta colleagues were softening their line. The reports suggested that Mr Haig and Mr Costa Mendez, the Argentine foreign minister, were working on a draft document to be taken either to London or Washington.

But if this contains any proposal for a United Nations interim administration then Mrs Thatcher and her cabinet colleagues -- who are calling a special meeting tomorrow (Tuesday) to take stock of the situation -- will find it difficult to accept.

The only direct contact Mrs Thatcher has had with the White House in the past week is a ten-minute telephone call she received from President Reagan on Saturday night. Despite what are seen as more encouraging reports emerging from Buenos Aires, there was still no indication in London that Mr Haig was about to return to Britain with a new package of proposals in his pocket.

Time is now a critical factor. Although a news black-out has been imposed on the speed of the task force, there is mounting speculation that the fleet is slowing down in case a diplomatic solution is in prospect. This speculation is heightened by the words used by Mr Pym in his Commons statement today when he said that the task force was "steadily" approaching the area of the Falklands.

Many political observers see this as a deliberate and significant downgrading of Mrs Thatcher's words on Wednesday. She said then that the task force was proceeding "with all speed" towards the South Atlantic.

Meanwhile, Mr Pym tomorrow (Tuesday) meets for the first time his EEC counterparts in Brussels to thank them for the sanctions they have imposed on Argentina and to brief them on the latest position. He was cheered in the House of Commons when he announced that Norway had joined the EEC in the imports ban.

HAIG MESSAGE RECEIVED; CABINET MEETING EXPECTED

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher tonight received a message from U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig outlining a possible peace package.

The message, sent just as Mr Haig took off from Buenos Aires for Washington, was the first direct communication he had had with the British prime minister since he began his latest four-day session of talks in Buenos Aires.

Mrs Thatcher was studying the message during a rushed dinner at No 10, and was expected to summon senior ministers handling the crisis to No 10 soon after. There were no immediate details in Whitehall of what the package might consist. But the reaction of the prime minister and her senior colleagues will be crucial in deciding how the crisis develops in the next few hours -- and possibly also her political future.

Mrs Thatcher is now virtually certain to make a statement in the Commons tomorrow about this latest dramatic development, and the government's reaction. Tonight there was no immediate indication whether Mr Haig wished to travel to London after Washington. Nor was there any confirmation in Whitehall that the outcome of this latest development could be a peace conference in America, or some other neutral venue.

Ministers Confer

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher tonight began a Downing Street meeting of senior ministers within an hour of receiving a new peace package for the Falklands direct from US Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig. Summoned to Number 10 were senior cabinet ministers and the chief of the Defence Staff. But the reaction in Whitehall was cool.

One source said the Argentinian package was "quite different" from any earlier proposals, but that the government was "not over excited" about its contents. "There is no euphoria here," said one official. Mr Haig sent his message to Mrs Thatcher by US telegram just as he was leaving Buenos Aires for Washington after his marathon four-day talks with the Argentinian leaders.

Within an hour the British prime minister was discussing its contents with Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym, Defence Secretary Mr John Nott, deputy leader Mr William Whitelaw, and Admiral Sir Terence Lewin, chief of the Defence Staff. Mrs Thatcher had studied Mr Haig's message briefly over a rushed dinner at Number 10 before the ministers arrived. She and her colleagues then got down to studying the document in detail. But indications were that there would be no public reaction tonight.

Foreign Secretary Mr Pym was still due to fly to Brussels tomorrow morning for his first meeting with Common Market foreign ministers since becoming foreign secretary. After the noon engagement he will fly back to London for a full meeting of the cabinet, to be chaired by Mrs Thatcher at Number 10. It is not expected that tomorrow afternoon's cabinet will take place before Mrs Thatcher faces MPs for prime minister's question time in the Commons.

Meanwhile, there is no indication that the British Government is moving from its position that Argentinian troops must leave the Falklands before any negotiations can take place. Tonight's crisis meeting at Number 10, which began shortly after 10 pm, is one of many called since the Falklands were invaded. But the reaction of Mrs Thatcher and her senior colleagues to the Argentinian's "peace plan" could be crucial in deciding how the crisis develops -- and possibly her own political future.

Just before flying out of Buenos Aires for Washington tonight, Mr Haig had said: "We have now finished this stage of our work. I am making the result available to the British Government, and I am returning to Washington to report to the President."

He said that he was "more convinced than ever that war in the South Atlantic would be the greatest of tragedies, and that time is indeed running out."

Late tonight, Mr Cecil Parkinson, Conservative Party chairman, joined the inner cabinet at Downing Street. He was called in to represent backbench Tory opinion. Many Conservative MP's do not favour any kind of compromise, which, they suspect, these new proposals involve.

Mrs Thatcher will be hard pressed to gain the support of all her backbenchers if she accepts some kind of deal with Argentina over Falkland Islands sovereignty. The prime minister realises, as the massive British naval task force steams south, that the support of her backbenchers is crucial to her own position as party leader. If she accepts a compromise which does not have the backing of her backbenchers, then her downfall is almost inevitable.

Proposals Fall Short

[Excerpts] The new Falklands peace package worked out with Argentina by US Secretary of State Alexander Haig does not meet the British Government's requirements. This was the message in a statement from No 10 tonight which was issued, unusually, in the middle of a crisis meeting Mrs Thatcher had called with senior ministers. She called the meeting after receiving a message from Mr Haig.

The statement said: "We have just received the proposals which Mr Haig has brought out of Buenos Aires. They are complex and difficult and at first sight they do not meet the requirements strongly expressed by Parliament, particularly on the need to regard as paramount the wishes of the islanders. We shall be studying them carefully however and shall be getting in touch again with Mr Haig."

There was no indication from Whitehall when Mrs Thatcher and her colleagues would be able to get in touch with Mr Haig. But there may be an interim reply to the message and it is possible that this could be sent during the night. The word in Whitehall was that it was "unlikely" that the prime minister would make a statement on the latest developments to Parliament tomorrow (Tuesday).

Tonight's statement, which strongly damped down any hopes raised by Mr Haig's latest proposals, was issued from No 10 after tonight's crisis meeting had been going on for 90 minutes and before there was any indication of when it would end. The Foreign Office tonight denied reports that they had urged all British citizens in Argentina to catch "the first plane out."

A spokesman said that for the last two weeks they had been advising all Britons to leave the country unless they had pressing reasons to stay. But, the spokesman added, no fresh and more urgent requests for them to leave had since been issued. The Foreign Office have little knowledge of how many Britons have heeded their advice, but the feeling is that most of the 17,000 living in the country have ignored it.

REUTERS reported earlier tonight that authoritative newspapers in Buenos Aires are claiming the peace plan would mean joint British-Argentine control of the islands, pending negotiations on final sovereignty. They said the plan also calls for the removal of 9,000 Argentine troops now occupying the Falklands and the recall of the British fleet steaming toward the area.

The "inner cabinet" meeting ended just after midnight with Mr Pym describing the peace plan as "complex and difficult." He said it would need "careful study" and added: "This evening we have begun that process."

Shortly before Mr Pym's departure from No 10, Mr Nott and Mr Whitelaw left the meeting, but both declined to comment.

PARACHUTE REGIMENT TO JOIN FALKLANDS TASK FORCE

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] More than 900 men of the 2d Battalion Parachute Regiment, together with supporting artillery and engineers, are to be sent to join the Falklands task force. The Royal Navy has requisitioned two civilian ferries for the operation -- the 4,190-ton North Sea roll-on roll-off vessel, Europic Ferry, owned by Townsend Thoresen, and the North Sea ferry Norland. It has also charatered the 15,974-ton tanker Anco Charger, jointly owned by Ocean Transport and P&O.

The paras, part of Five Brigade -- the army formation designated for operations outside the NATO area -- will join the Norland at Hull early on Wednesday. It is understood the Norland and the Europic Ferry -- which will carry the paras' heavy equipment -- sail on Wednesday. The Europic Ferry departs from Southampton.

Meanwhile, three of the navy's hydrographic or charting ships, HMS Hydra, Hecla and Herald, will join the task force as "casualty ferries," to ply "between any area of operations and the larger hospital ships," the Ministry of Defence said. Hydra and Herald are at Portsmouth preparing for their new role, but Hecla has already sailed from Gibraltar for the South Atlantic.

The requisitioned 17,000-ton P&O cruise vessel Uganda, now converted into a hospital ship, left Gibraltar early today to join the task force.

LLOYD'S SPOKESMAN DENIES 'RATTING ON SANCTIONS'

LD192204 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2129 GMT 19 Apr 82

[Text] Lloyd's of London tonight firmly denied an MP's suggestion that Lloyd's syndicates were "ratting on sanctions" against Argentina. Mr Chris Price told the Commons today that Lloyd's syndicates had today given Argentina Airlines insurance cover. He added they were also making arrangements to renew the insurance contracts through Swiss banks to avoid premiums coming into the UK.

Mr Price said it was unreasonable to expect others overseas to stick to the sanctions "if members of the City of London and members of Lloyd's syndicates are ratting on sanctions." But a Lloyd's spokesman said tonight: "There is no question of our ratting on sanctions or of Swiss banks being involved." He went on: "Under directions from the Treasury, we are not able to pay claims to Argentina.

"No money is passing hands and will not do so until this embargo is lifted. I think this particular MP has been ill-advised." The spokesman said Lloyd's had issued a statement to its syndicates last week drawing their attention to the Treasury's directive.

He added: "It is the intention of Lloyd's underwriters and brokers to observe the spirit as well as the letter of the regulations." The spokesman said Lloyd's remained liable for policies with Argentina which were already underwritten.

But he added: "My understanding is that there is no cover being renewed while the crisis is on. If someone is not carrying out the Treasury directives, they are acting without Lloyd's knowledge -- but I don't think anyone is doing this."

FRG SUPPORT OF ARGENTINE A-BOMB DEVELOPMENT SEEN

LD192320 [Editorial Report] London BBC Television Network in English at 2035 GMT on 19 April broadcasts a 65-minute recorded report entitled "Germany and the Argentine Bomb" in its "Newsnight" program. It is narrated by Robin Denselow. The report opens with shots of an Argentine uranium reprocessing plant outside Buenos Aires which is capable of producing plutonium suitable for atomic weapons. Denselow described the plant's potential, the origins of Argentine nuclear development and its links to Nazi Germany. The narrator discusses the German development of a heavy matter nuclear reactor and the role of the German industrial concern I. G. Farben in the research and construction of the reactor. He then goes on to relate how in 1944, realizing that the war was lost, German industrialists decided to move assets and personnel to Latin America to continue industrial research. He relates how the Argentine leader Juan Peron welcomed these scientists to his country to continue industrial and nuclear research.

Denselow then interviews Walter Schnurr, a leading Nazi explosives expert and I.G. Farben employee who fled to Argentina in 1945 to continue his research. Schnurr described the first German deal with Argentina to build a heavy water reactor which included a separate agreement to provide equipment and technical expertise for reprocessing uranium into plutonium.

The narrator describes how the German scientists supplied equipment and expertise to Argentine scientists as the Atucha nuclear power plant was built. The narrator says that today, Argentina has the capacity to extract up to 200 kg of weapons-grade plutonium a year.

Denselow then described the various international and EEC controls on the movement of enriched uranium between countries and points out that the EEC never knew about the German deals with Argentina. He then interviews Alan McKnight, a former official of the International Atomic Energy Agency, who denies any knowledge of the German-Argentine relationship. He described Germany s deception of its EEC partners as a typical German doublecross.

The narrator also interviews Dr Robert Jungk who says that this nuclear cooperation between Germany and Argentine is part of the German establishment's attempts to build the country into a great military and industrial power, a point Franz Josef Strauss, former minister of energy, categorically denies. The film next shows the Canadian reactor, Argentina's second, and interviews Adm Castro Modero, head of Argentine nuclear development, who explains why Argentina chose not to buy a second Canadian reactor, opting instead for a second German heavy water reactor. He cites the stringent Canadian constrols as a major drawback and confirms that Argentina is willing to sell plutonium to those nations having fast-breeder reactors.

Denselow then discusses the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and the second German-built reactor, due for completion in 1983, which could produce anough plutonium for up to 10 nuclear weapons. He also cites reports of Argentina possessing missile delivery systems for such weapons. Denselow concludes his report by describing the operations of the nuclear reprocessing plant, built next to the main airport in Buenos Aires, and Germany's continuing ties with nuclear development in Pakistan, S. Africa and Brazil. He says Argentina's potential to build nuclear weapons could lead to a nuclear arms race in Latin America.

FRG Spokesman Refutes

[From the "Newsnight" program interview granted by Lothar Ruehl, FRG Government deputy spokesman, to John Tusa -- live or recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] Dr Ruehl, government spokesman in Cologne, would you like first of all to deal with the question of the help that Germany has given to Argentina in the business of [uranium], reprocessing, because you've said this afternoon that there has been no cooperation between the Federal Republic and Argentina in reprocessing.

As we have just heard in the film, ["Germany and the Argentine Bomb"] there has been.

[Answer] Well, I should like first to refute all these broad, sweeping, unfounded and unwarranted statements that have been made aplenty in this so-called commentary. I should like to make four short points of fact in this case. First, there has never been and there is not now any secret deal between Argentina and the Federal Republic of Germany in the nuclear field. There is no German-Argentine cooperation in enrichment plant or in technology for an enrichment plant. There is no Argentine-German cooperation in the construction of the running or fuelling of reprocessing plants in the construction or the running or fuelling of reprocessing plants for fuel recycling. And there is a lot of talk about comprehensive or full safeguard. Now, what the Canadian concept of comprehensive safeguards it has been spelled out from an Argentine viewpoint by one of the interviewers. But, the Germans insist on full safeguards. It is nothing less materially, technically and juridically as what the NPT [nonproliferation treaty] requires and what the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna -- which is the agency of the United Nations -- requires for all detailed plants and procedures. The German Government has been bending over backward because of the fact that Argentina has not acceeded to the NPT in order to make the safeguards as strict and stringent and as comprehensive materially and technically as possible. These safeguards stand and now I'm going to read you...

[Question] Well, I don't think that, because I would much rather you did not read a text because it would really hold up the discussion.

[Answer] If you don't want to have the point of view of the Vienna agency, then we skip it.

[Question] Well, perhaps we can come to it later in the discussion because what I'd like to hear is, you see, that Mr Castro Madero from the Argentine Government said specifically that we chose Germany because of the very stubborn position of Canada on safeguards.

[Answer] Not on safeguards, on what he terms comprehensive safeguards and he even explains what that meant. Meaning "droit de regard" for the Canadian Government on all future plants and programs and installations in Argentina even before they were going to be built. This is the real difference. The German Government insists on full safeguards under the rule of the nonproliferation treaty and there is no doubt about that. You can go to Vienna and you can look into the files and you can talk to the officials there and they will all tell you the same thing. It's precisely the contents of the German-Argentine agreements and all contracts. There's no doubt about that. It's precisely the contents and Argentina has had to undertake a double juridical obligation first concerning the use of nuclear fuel from German reactors and second concerning the use of German-built installations and technical procedures for the processing of all fuel of any origin. And both obligations have to be verified and controlled under the international safeguard system. It's precisely the NPT safeguard system that we are applying and that we are insisting on.

[Question] I do want to bring you back to the statement by Dr Hennies, who is the director of your Nuclear Research Center at the present time. And on the question of fuel he said that help was given to the Argentines in building experimental equipment for research in the reprocessing field. It was experimental equipment, he said, for studying the basic questions in the reprocessing field. Now surely to an outside observer, it's hard t see that the Argentines could have got to the stage of reprocessing if they did not have this West German assistance freely admitted in the first instance?

[Answer] What Professor Hennie said was...He referred to the German-Argentine scientific-technological cooperation in the 1950's and 1960's, I believe. In the laboratory project...

[Question] Late 60's, I believe.

[Answer] It is correct. Well, this ran until the late 1960's, maybe. This is correct. As soon as the NPT was signed, not only in 1975 when it was ratified and went into effect, but when it was signed, the German authorities undertook everything they could to make sure that all cooperation came immediately under the technical standards of safeguards and the controls under the NPT.

[Question] But by that time the technology had been transferred and the Argentines could claim, as they are doing now, that it is their own and therefore...

[Answer] No, they cannot.

[Question] But that's what they're doing, that's what they told us, that it's not subject to international control.

[Answer] I'm sorry to contradict, but...

[Question] But they've told us that, Dr Ruehl.

[Answer] But this is a very fine point in international contract law. The Federal Government has made it particularly safe in contractual obligations that all German technology transferred to Argentina under this technical cooperation project remains within the scope of the NPT safeguard systems. They cannot use this technology for their own. Let me take an example.

[Question] Sorry, can I ask you a very key question? Does this mean, what you've just said, that the Argentines will not be able to use the reprocessing plants without safeguards? Is that the West German Government's official position?

[Answer] As far as German technology and procedures and technical knowhow are concerned -- yes. Although we've got nothing to do with their reprocessing plant because we are not in the reprocessing business with them.

[Question] Dr Ruehl, having heard what other speakers said about the dangers of proliferation, given West Germany's involvement in the Argentine nuclear program, even the way you had described it, does the Federal Government accept no share of even moral responsibility for a situation where a country like Argentina might be on the verge of becoming a nuclear power?

[Answer] Well, I mean your question makes it quite clear why this is no real challenge. We're dealing here with "ifs" and potentials and "maybes" and so on and so forth.

[Question] But Argentina's nuclear weapon will happen?

[Answer] But we have insisted on very stringent, strict and efficient safeguards and we are not involved in either enrichment of uranium or reprocessing and fuel recycling. But I would like to add two more things if I may.

[Question] Briefly, please.

[Answer] First, since the 1974 Indian so-called peaceful nuclear test, all governments have become aware of the risks and the mortgages on this kind of policy and therefore the Federal Government has since then increased the stringency of nuclear export policies. Since 1977 no such kinds of installations that might be misused have been exported to any of such countries.

[Question] Can I have your last point, very briefly because we're running out of time.

[Answer] We have no nuclear cooperation with either South Africa or Pakistan. That's what I wanted to add.

Announces Candidacy

[Text] The president of the republic and chairman of the Democratic Party Spiros Kiprianou, today announced his decision to seek reelection as president in the next elections. In a statement addressed to the entire population of Cyprus, Kiprianou said he made the decision with full comprehension of his responsibilities toward the country and people. The epicenter of my interest and efforts, he added, is to serve our national cause and to strive for an honorable solution of the Cyprus problem that will guarantee the full independence of our country and safeguard the inalienable rights of our people, as well as serve the people's interests for continual economic and social progress, which are a basic foundation of our struggle.

Kiprianou said the country is going through critical moments and that he is determined personally to continue to serve our fatherland with responsibility and full devotion and dedication to the true interests of Cyprus and our suffering people. Kiprianou stated that the various organs of the Democratic Party recommended to the political office that it accept his candidacy. The political office unanimously accepted this recommendation. I consider it my duty, he emphasized, to express my warmest thanks to all the party organs and to give the assurance that I will do everything possible to prove myself worthy of their expectations. He said: It would be an omission not to express my deep appreciation for the conformity of views that prevailed during our consultations with the Restorative Party of the Working People, AKEL, a fact expressed in the joint statement that will be made public today.

He added: Addressing the people, I want to stress once again that if I am reelected I will continue to serve, as I have done, my country and the people in a just manner without discrimination. I will make every possible effort to expand to the widest possible degree the democratic cooperation and people's unity, a fact that will greatly contribute to the struggle for the (?justification) of our country.

I will continue a policy that will guarantee normality and the democratic processes in parallel with the policy for social justice, which is my constant goal. I repeat, however, that, as always, I place the national interest above all else. My desire to continue to offer my services from the position of president of the republic is not based on any personal ambition or on any interests. My only wish is to contribute, with all my strength and with my experience, to the struggle for liberty and justification and to the progress and prosperity of our country. I hope the people will continue to have confidence in me, and I promise I will fully honor this confidence.

PAPER WARNS AGAINST KIPRIANOU-AKEL COOPERATION

[Editorial: "What Is Being Hatched in Cyprus?"]

[Text] If there is any truth in reports from Nicosia published in yesterday's press that immediately after Easter President Kiprianou will appoint three ministers from AKEL, it is certain that the national issue will be led into a new, serious complication and that the international diplomatic pawn, Turkey, will be strengthened. Unless, of course, we are entering the phase of the partition of Cyprus between "Attila" and the Soviets through their people in Cyprus, as forecast and reported a short time before his death by Savvas Konstandopoulos [of ELEVTHEROS KOSMOS].

It is naturally certain that presidential elections will be held in Cyprus this year or early next year. However, it is unacceptable that party and candidate aspirations should go beyond the boundaries of the acceptable national framework by rewarding the blackmailers, and cancellation of Kiprianou's visit to Moscow for the third consecutive time is nothing but blackmail by AKEL.

In view of the implementation of the decisions of Kiprianou (with the consent of AKEL because otherwise he cannot be reelected president) the national center [Athens] ought to express its views, because in one way or the other any participation by representatives of the stained AKEL in the island's government will appear as having the approval of Athens. In such an eventuality, the various Sofianos characters [former pro-AKEL minister] will have a field day. It is at the same time the duty of the Greek Government to make it clear to Nicosia that the national cause can in no way be subjugated in priority to any petty party aspirations or personal ambitions.

On the other hand, the Cypriot people, who followed Makarios and Grivas during difficult and heroic moments, will discern the coming danger and naturally will condemn the "front" through their unification around and support of -- during the presidential election -- a personality in a position to defeat and overthrow the Soviet-Turkish plans of AKEL, which, as Makarios charged, has always excelled in national betrayal -- sometimes to the benefit of the Turks and at other times to the benefit of the British, but always for the Soviets and always against Greece. The Cypriot brothers ought to beware. The attacks by AKEL and its fellow travelers against Archbishop Khrisostomor are no coincidence. Woe be it if the church of St Barnabas is deprived of the right to protect the national character of Cyprus. It has successfully protected it for centuries and it is imperative that it should continue to do so with the support -- as the prime minister likes to say -- of all of us. If something should go wrong, the price will be paid by all Hellenism and not just by one portion of it, no matter how select this portion might be....

GOVERNMENT PLANNING TO PURCHASE MIRAGE AIRCRAFT

NC171607 Athens NEWS in English 17 Apr 82 p 4

[Text] The government is not considering the purchase of British-made Tornado fighter-bombers for the Greek Air Force, Defense Ministry sources said yesterday. The sources denied rumors circulating in recent days that the government was reexamining its decision to purchase the French-made Mirage 2000, and is now looking into other possibilities, as well.

The choice of the Mirage over its competitors, the sources said, was made with strictly operational considerations, combined with the excellent terms of delivery and cost offered by the French Government, and Greece stands by its decision. Speeding up the delivery of Mirage 2000 planes will be one of the main topics of discussion between Premier and Defense Minister Andreas Papandreou and French Defense Minister Charles Hernu.

OZAL MEETS OECD, EC OFFICIALS IN PARIS ON AID

[Text] State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal has said that the first contract in connection with OECD aid to be extended to Turkey in 1982 might be made in June. Ozal, who went to Paris for talks with OECD and EEC officials, met OECD Secretary General Emile van Lennep today. Speaking to reporters after the meeting, Ozal said they had discussed various alternatives to signing the first contract in connection with economic aid being extended to Turkey within the framework of the OECD.

Ozal said: The financial aid being extended to Turkey within the framework of the OECD special aid program is being increasingly replaced by project aid and financing. Therefore, this year's undertaking will probably be the last of the special urgent aid program. Next year these activities will continue within the framework of the OECD consortium.

Ozal pointed out that the OECD countries that want to extend aid to Turkey would do so through the OECD Secretariat General this year. Ozal will meet the EEC Commission deputy president, (Etienne d'Avignon), this evening to discuss latest developments in Turkey-EEC relations. Ozal will return to Turkey tomorrow.

ESTIMATED INFLATION RATE UNDER 25 PERCENT IN 1982

[Excerpt] Trade Minister Kemal Canturk has said that the rate of inflation will not exceed 25 percent this year. Speaking at the inauguration ceremony of a municipal bread factory in Ankara, he pointed out that there were rumors to the effect that the rate of inflation was rising, and said: There is no reason for the rate of inflation to raise its ugly head once again. We believe that with the measures we have taken, the rate of inflation will not exceed 25 percent. All the economic measures that have been taken will prevent Turkey from becoming a slave of inflation in the future.

Canturk said the government stressed the importance of development of agriculture. He said farmers were being supported with loans and technical services and that efforts were being made to transform agriculture into a factor for important changes in the Turkish economy.

Canturk stated that local wheat production could meet the country's consumption, but a decision had been made to import wheat in order to prevent speculative price fluctuations. He noted that 900,000 tons of wheat would be imported by the end of May.

The trade minister said the country was continuing to fulfill its wheat export promises, adding: In this way we did not lose our export markets and we managed to ensure the price stability of bread, a basic food.

FRG'S GENSCHER ARRIVES IN COPENHAGEN 19 APR

[Text] Copenhagen, 19 Apr (DPA) -- At the invitation of the Danish Government, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today arrived in Copenhagen on a 2-day visit. According to observers, his talks with Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen will center on East-West relations, the Falklands crisis and European Community problems. Before his departure on Tuesday, Genscher will also be received in audience by Queen Margrethe.

Talks With Olesen

[Text] Copenhagen, 19 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has called on the international community of states to support constructively the mediation efforts by U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig in the Falklands conflict between Great Britain and Argentina. Following a talk in Copenhagen today with his Danish counterpart Kjeld Olesen, Genscher referred in this respect to the special meeting of EEC foreign ministers in Brussels tomorrow. Speaking to the press, Genscher stressed the broad agreement between Denmark and the Federal Republic on the most important international issues. Both states deem it desirable for consultations between the European alliance partners and the United States to be improved. The large number of common interests is likewise demonstrated in East-West policy and in issues relating to the European Community. The Federal Republic is undoubtedly prepared to go somewhat further than Denmark with regard to transferring rights to the European Parliament. Olesen also understood Bonn's standpoint to the effect that the Federal Republic cannot be the sole and "unlimited net payer" in the EEC.

Genscher welcomed the fact that Soviet state and party leader Brezhnev has responded positively to the proposal for a meeting with the U.S. President. Genscher added that he and Olesen share the view that the NATO summit on 10 June in Bonn should clearly stress the basic elements of the alliance, defense and detente.

MITTERRAND RETURNS FROM JAPAN VIA CANADA

LD192206 Paris Domestic Service in French 2000 GMT 19 Apr 82

[Text] President Francois Mitterrand returned to Paris this afternoon from his visit to Japan, with a stopover in Vancouver where he had talks with Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau.

Both men share the view that in the sphere of financial policy the United States must make some efforts, and this is a matter that will be debated during the June summit to be held in Versailles.

As soon as he returned to work, the president had to look into the matter of police powers and security, a subject of contention between Interior Minister Gaston Defferre and Justice Minister Robert Badinter. It has been decided that police should be allowed to use their guns only when it is a question of their legitimate self-defense. The Council of Ministers will be looking into the question of identity checks during one of its meetings, possibly next Wednesday's, and it is certain that the president will make his view known on that occasion. It now seems that the dispute between Gaston Defferre and Robert Badinter has been settled, somewhat in the latter's favor.

KHMER DELEGATION MEETS WITH NEO-GAULLIST PARTY

[Text] Paris, 19 Apr (AFP) -- A delegation from the Khmer Peoples National Liberation Front (KPNLF) met here today at the headquarters of the opposition neo-Gaullist party Rassemblement Pour la Republique (RPR) with the RPR national secretary for external relations, Jean-Pierre Delalande.

An RPR statement afterward said that the delegation, led by Hing Kunthon, a member of the KPNLF Executive Committee, outlined "the dramatic situation of the Cambodian nationalist resistance fighters, who have been fighting against the occupation by the North Vietnamese communist troops since 1979." The statement called on France to "to suspend its economic aid to the Hanoi government for as long as Vietnamese troops occupy Cambodia" and expressed hope that the people of France would understand and support "the fight of the Cambodian people for liberty and independence."

EANES RETURNS FROM FRUITFUL VISIT TO ANGOLA

[Text] The president of the republic's trip to Angola has surpassed all expectations and has given rise to a new era in relations between the two countries, General Ramalho Eanes said today on arrival in Lisbon. In a message to the Portuguese people soon after disembarking at the airport, the president of the republic highlighted the exceptional welcome accorded to the Portuguese delegation by the Angolan authorities, saying that the two sides made a lengthy appraisal of relations between Portugal and Angola.

Ramalho Eanes noted the determination of Portugal to contribute to a climate of peace and progress in Angola, and the prospects of cooperation between the two countries, ranging from technical-scientific to enterpeneurial spheres.

He disclosed that the three Portuguese nationals being held in Angolan jails for non-common law offenses -- these are the only Portuguese prisoners held by the People's Republic of Angola -- are expected to be released within 1 month from now.

PYM WILL TAKE FIRM STAND ON EEC BUDGET ISSUE

[Alan Osborn report: "Pym To Fight for Better EEC Deal Despite Crisis Aid"]

[Text] Britain has no intention of softening its demands for a cut in its Common Market budget bills in spite of the impressive solidarity shown by other EEC countries over sanctions on Argentina, Mr Pym, foreign secretary, said yesterday. He told Mr Gaston Thorn, president of the EEC commission, that Britain regards the two matters as entirely separate.

Mr Pym intends to resume the fight for a better budget deal at the point where his predecessor, Lord Carrington, left off. Mr Thorn, who was paying a brief call on Mr Pym in advance of a crucial meeting of EEC foreign ministers next week said the commission accepted that Britain could not be expected to moderate its claims because of EEC co-operation in the Falklands crisis. But EEC officials said yesterday this would not prevent other countries from trying to persuade Britain to show a more co-operative attitude.

At next week's meeting the ministers are to consider a complicated scheme aimed at providing large cash rebates to Britain from the EEC over the next three years coupled with a pledge of further reliefs in 1985 and 1986. Although President Mitterrand said at the EEC summit in March that France did not accept the scheme as a basis for discussion, it is widely believed that a conciliatory attitude by Britain at the farm price negotiations beginning in Luxembourg today could soften this stand.

The official British position remains that there can be no agreement on farm prices until the budget dispute is settled. There is, however, a growing impression that the link between the two issues is weaker than it was and that the government might be prepared to approve a farm price increase in exchange for less than a full resolution of the budget problem next week.

An additional complication is that Mr Pym could be detained in London by the Falklands crisis next week in which event Britain would be represented by Mr Douglas Hurd, minister of state, Foreign Office. It is not clear whether, in these circumstances, other EEC foreign ministers would be prepared to negotiate the substance of a budget deal for Britain.

Britain's net contribution to the Common Market budget this year is expected to exceed 1,000 million pounds. The distortions arise because Britain, with a relatively small farming sector, received only 8 per cent of payments from the EEC's huge farm fund while providing about 20 percent of total Community income. The government accepts that a reduction in the large proportion of EEC spending going on farmers could eventually solve the problem but insists on automatic and lasting safeguards for its position until that happens.

Other EEC member countries, however, want any rebates to Britain to be gradually phased out over a fixed period regardless of the size of Britain's net contribution.

FOREIGN MINISTERS SUPPORT UK ON FALKLANDS

LD201426 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 20 Apr 82

[Text] The Ten have confirmed their support for Great Britain over the Falklands' affair. This was stated to the press this afternoon by Leo Tindemans, minister of foreign affairs and chairman of the EEC Council of Ministers. The ministers of foreign affairs of the Ten met in Brussels at the express request of London. They reaffirmed their wish to implement the resolution adopted by the United Nations Security Council which calls for the withdrawal of Argentine troops, a cessation of hostilities and the opening of negotiations. Tomorrow the Falklands affair will be the subject of debate in the European Parliament.

KREISKY APPARENTLY DETERMINED NOT TO RETIRE

[Erich Eichinger telephone dispatch from the Vienna Chancellery -- with recorded portions]

Asked whether, should he decide to run in the next elections, he would be a candidate for the full legislative period or whether he would turn over the helm to someone else after some time, such as half his term of office, Kreisky said: [Begin recording] "First of all, let me tell you that if I am physically able to do so I will be available for the greatest part of the legislative period, in other words, not just half of it. But, in its last third -- that I must say, for the sake of fairness, of honesty -- I will certainly provide for my replacement, because by that time, if everything goes will, I will be a very old man and it will be time to retire." [end recording]

[Vienna Domestic Service in German at 1050 GMT on 20 April carries a second report on the same press conference, by Hannes Fischer, who sums up Kreisky's statements as indicating that the chancellor obviously has made up his mind to run again in the next elections and merely wants his doctors to confirm it, and that he will presumably make a formal announcement to this effect on 1 May.]

VICE CHANCELLOR SINOWATZ LEAVES FOR USSR VISIT

[Text] Fred Sinowatz, vice chancellor and education minister, departed yesterday on a regular flight of Austrian Airlines for an official visit to the Soviet Union. During this visit, which will last until Sunday, cultural, bilateral and economic questions will be discussed.

A particularly important item on his program will be a talk with USSR Council of Ministers Chairman Nikolay Tikhonov. In addition, the vice chancellor will meet with Minister of Culture Petr Demichev, USSR Academy of Sciences President Anatoliy Aleksandrov, Foreign Trade Minister Nikolay Patolichev and RSFSR Council of Ministers Chairman Mikhail Solomentsev.

Kirchschlaeger To Visit Moscow

[Summary] As has been learned from an unofficial source on Monday, President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger will pay an official visit to the USSR, presumably in May. After his recent visit to Yugoslavia, this will be his second visit to a communist country this year -- as a matter of principle, the president pays only three official visits per year. It has not yet been possible to obtain more detailed information as to the exact date, the names of Soviet officials Kirchschlaeger is to meet, or the topics to be discussed during the visit.

However, it is assumed that Vice Chancellor Fred Sinowatz, who will leave today for a 6-day visit to the USSR, will have the task -- in addition to his political, economic and cultural talks -- to prepare for Kirchschlaeger's visit.

SPOE LEADERS RAP 'ONE-SIDED' PEACE MOVEMENT

[Hans Rauscher report: "SPOe Warns Against One-Sided Peace Movement...."]

[Text] The Austrian Socialist Party [SPOe] deems it necessary to remind its own party youth, barely 1 month before the large peace demonstration on 15 May, that peace is threatened not only by the United States....

On 15 May the largest peace demonstration since 1945 is to be held in which some 20,000 people are expected to participate. These participants will come mostly from youth groups of all political affiliations, including the communists.

SPOe Central Secretary Fritz Marsch has now appealed to the Federal Youth Association (the umbrella organization that organizes the peace march), but primarily to the Socialist Youth to "think over once more" the "platform" -- the joint basic program for 15 May.

Marsch: "The platform, headlined "To prevent nuclear war -- disarm" is so vaguely formulated that I cannot conceive how organizations with a sense of responsibility -- such as the Socialist Youth, the Catholic Youth, the Trade Union Youth and the Young People's Party [Junge OeVP] -- can endorse such demands."

He added that, for example, the platform speaks of a protest against the deployment of new intermediate-range missiles in Europe (the so-called NATO complementary armament) while it simply takes note of the 300 Soviet SS-20 missiles. These nuclear missiles already exist, while the American Pershing missiles are only a threat. Marsch: "Such a demand helps only one side!"

The warning shot by the SPOe central secretary was probably connected with the Socialist Youth congress that is to begin in Linz today. Some of the draft resolutions for this congress are full of anti-American formulations. Thus the draft resolution of the Vienna Socialist Youth organization pins the blame for the increased possibility of a nuclear war in Europe on "the conservative economic policy concepts of the West emanating from the United States."

And Josef Cap, leader of the Socialist Youth, recently declared in a television interview that a greater danger of nuclear war emanates from the Reagan administration than from the Soviet Union.

Heinz Fischer, SPOe floor leader in the Austrian Nationalrat, also reacted sharply to any kind of "anti-Americanism" attributed to leftist groups within the Socialist Youth: "It would be utterly out of place -- we Austrians owe the Americans far too much for that!" Fisher declared.

BRIEFS

SOVIET OIL, GAS -- Commenting on the pending talks with the USSR on the price of Soviet natural gas to be supplied to Austria under the new long-term gas agreement to be signed in June, Director General Ludwig Bauer of the Austrian Oil Administration [OeMV] declared that the Soviets are still trying to get Austria to accept the gas price which they agreed on with the FRG. Austria wants a lower price because of its closer geographical location to the East bloc. According to an OeMV spokesman, the Soviets have reduced their oil price for Austria from $35.15 at the end of 1981 to $28.70 per barrel. The OeMV plans to cut its oil imports from the USSR this year by 0.2 million tons to 1 million tons, and its overall oil imports from 5.4 to 4.3 million tons. The OeMV has cut all oil import quotas for this year except those of Libyan and Saudi Arabian oil. [Vienna KURIER in German 20 Apr 82 p 16 AU]

VIETNAM'S THACH SPEAKS ON TALKS WITH GENSCHER

[Text] Bonn, 20 Apr (DPA) -- Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach spoke in Bonn today in favor of an active role in the FRG in the efforts to achieve peace in Southeast Asia. After a 1-hour talk with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, Thach told journalists that the FRG has an important share in detente in Europe and should therefore support all opportunities for talks between hostile countries, including in Southeast Asia.

The Vietnamese politician, who is on a European tour, is the first cabinet member from Hanoi to visit the FRG officially. At the "working talk," which came about at the wish of Thach, Genscher expressed the concern of the Federal Government over the as yet unsolved Kampuchea problem. The FRG was holding to the resolution of the Council of Europe of November 1979, whereby Kampuchea should decide on its own fate without foreign intervention or foreign troops. Thach commented on this for the press. He said that Vietnam would only withdraw its troops from Kampuchea if Thailand ended support for opponents of the Phnom Penh government. The Vietnamese politician made sharp attacks on China, whose policy throughout Southeast Asia is aimed against detente and peace.

Relations between the FRG and Vietnam -- a close ally of Moscow -- are classed in Bonn as "businesslike." Since the Vietnamese march into Kampuchea in 1978, the Federal Government has stopped development aid for Hanoi. The foreign minister said that in his talk with Genscher he had not touched upon the subject of development aid. Vietnam is grateful for any aid, "but we are not beggars."

MINISTER DISCUSSES SECURITY IN SAUDI ARABIA

[Text] Riyadh/Bonn, 20 Apr (DPA) -- Saudi Arabia's King Khalid has spoken out in favor of continuing the existing good cooperation between the Federal Republic and Saudi Arabia and intensifying it further. King Khalid said this in Riyadh today during a meeting with the federal interior minister, Gerhart Baum (FDP), who is on a 3-day visit to Saudi Arabia. According to the Interior Ministry in Bonn, Baum reaffirmed the Federal Government's readiness for trusting cooperation in the field of internal security which has been inserted into the framework of friendly relations between the two countries.

During his visit, Baum also met his Saudi counterpart, Prince Nayif al-Sa'ud for talks. He also visited Saudi Arabian security installations.

BAHR CALLS ON SPD TO POSTPONE ARMS DECISION

[Text] Munich, 20 Apr (DPA) -- At the beginning of the discussion by the working group on security policy at the SPD party conference in Munich today, security expert Egon Bahr spoke in favor of the acceptance of the executive's draft resolution. This is primarily aimed at postponing a final decision by the SPD on the deployment by the West of new medium-range nuclear weapons in West Europe until the party conference in the fall of 1983. Mr Bahr based his argument on the fact that the only independent decision to be made by the FRG in connection with the East-West disarmament negotiations concerns the stationing of medium-range weapons on German soil. The right to decide on the stationing of such weapons is "the only authority that the FRG has." It is only by delaying this decision that one can put pressure on the two major powers, the United States and the Soviet Union, to conclude their negotiations successfully. In view of the negotiations presently underway, the SPD is under no obligation to make a decision immediately.

Bahr made a plea that, along with the "security partnership" between East and West, new strategies for the prevention of war should be developed. Thus one must seriously consider whether the NATO doctrine of a nuclear first strike, formulated in view of the massive Soviet superiority in conventional weapons, would have to be maintained if disarmament negotiations are successful in achieving an approximate parity.

Although the discussion has just started, already some 50 speeches are scheduled, among them one by Defense Minister Hans Apel. Decisions on this subject will be made by the conference on Thursday.

Debate Continues

[Text] Munich, 20 Apr (DPA) -- In a lively, controversial debate, the delegates of the SPD working group discussed the leftwing demand for a moratorium with a time limit for medium-range missile systems which differs from the party executive's draft resolution for a moratorium only for short-range systems. Over and above this the left demands in the draft initiative that a policy goal should be that nuclear weapons are neither produced, stored nor used in Europe. During the Geneva negotiations the USSR should reduce its nuclear warheads aimed at Europe to their 1978 level. In the course of this reduction the preparations for the new U.S. medium-range missiles in Europe should be stopped. However, the left also wants to make a final decision only at the 1983 party conference.

Defense Minister Hans Apel spoke against a moratorium and gave an emphatic warning against unilateral advance concessions. The pressure on the Americans and the Russians had to be maintained in order to achieve the desired zero solution. The threat potential of the Soviet Union had to be removed by negotiations and one could not signal to the other side that one would allow their position to go through.

The draft resolution of the party executive was also supported by the deputy chairman of the Parliamentary Group, Horst Ehmke, who once again defined the aim of SPD policy as a desire to get rid of Soviet missiles and not even have American ones in the first place. In Geneva there would be no success if the Western position were shaken now. All the same the NATO dual decision had made the Soviet Union change positions which had been hardened for years.

The spokesmen for the left, Oskar Lafontaine and Erhard Eppler, spoke against the arming part of the NATO dual decision and spoke strongly in favor of a moratorium. The Saarland SPD chief Lafontaine stressed that the discussion in the SPD was an argument about methods, where all party members had the same goal. Counterarming was a threat gesture, which would entail threat gestures from the other side, and was not a way to achieve disarmament. Lafontaine thought the moratorium would also be favorably received by the electorate.

Eppler called upon the opponents of the moratorium to explain why to date the West had demanded no clarification of the Brezhnev proposal to unilaterally reduce missile systems during a moratorium. He was doubtful about the chances of a zero solution between the East and West as put forward by U.S. President Ronald Reagan, since this proposal applied only to land-based weapons and the Soviet Union would not be ready to disarm because of the sea-based nuclear arms of the West.

'NO SECRET AGREEMENT BETWEEN FRG AND ARGENTINA'

[Text] Bonn, 20 Apr (DPA) -- There is no secret agreement between the Federal Republic and Argentina in the field of nuclear energy. With this statement, Deputy Government Spokesman Lothar Ruehl on Hesse Radio today again rejected claims to this effect made in the film "Germany and the Argentine Bomb" which was broadcast yesterday evening on BBC television.

The film accused various Federal German governments of having assisted Argentina in development work for an atomic bomb and, due to inadequate safeguard regulations, of having contributed to the fact that Argentina will soon be able to sell plutonium to other countries for the production of atomic weapons.

In the ensuing live discussion, Ruehl rejected this claim as "unfounded." As far as security requirements are concerned, the Federal Government adhered strictly to the agreements of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in Vienna. Speaking on Hesse Radio, he particulary objected to the fact that the film suggested that after World War II, Bonn sought secret cooperation with Argentina in order to carry out research there which would have been impossible in the Federal Republic because of the allies' ban. "The whole thing is basically a sensational political thriller and not a documentary," he stressed.

In contrast to the BBC film, the London Foreign Office also stressed the Federal Republic's responsible attitude in nuclear cooperation with third countries. Bonn fully "applies the safeguards and other agreements reached by the group of nuclear suppliers of which Great Britain is also a member," a statement said. For the rest, the Bonn government spokesman's statement speaks for itself.

Paper Raps Program

[Commentary signed CS: "A Kick Into the Past"]

[Text] While the Argentine atom bomb still lies far away, the British television company BBC threw a stink bomb on Monday night. Based on obscure sources, the creator of a 1-hour documentary stated that old Nazis have been working since the end of World War II to build an Argentine bomb, and that several subsequent Federal Governments had contributed knowhow to the development of the bomb. Argentina will therefore have enough plutonium next year to produce 10 bombs, it was said.

The witness is a former German expert on chemical explosives who disappeared to Argentina at the war's end. He called himself the "king of high explosives," as DIE WELT's correspondent has learned. In the mid-fifties he was appointed by nuclear minister Strauss as manager of the Karlsruhe Nuclear Research Center where an "anti-Semitic mood" allegedly prevailed at the time. The BBC discovered the German-Argentine nuclear conspiracy when an Argentine scientist, who had moved to Mexico, asked a British colleague for details of the "secret nuclear agreement."

It is known that firms in the Federal Republic have supplied Argentina with heavy water reactors for natural uranium. The fact that they got the order because the competing Canadians wanted to include sharper controls than the Germans, who followed the standards of the Vienna atomic energy commission, does not justify the allegation that the Germans wanted to help build the bomb or even build their own bomb in Argentina. The Vienna controls are recognized internationally, and no complaints were made. In the discussion after the program, Federal Press Spokesman Ruehl rejected the accusations. During the Falklands excitement the program was pursuing an anti-German mood, thus becoming a "hit," yet it remains a poor piece of the BBC's otherwise accurate journalism.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE VIEWS SCHIMDT AT CONGRESS

[Editorial signed RM.: "The Better Speech"]

[Text] Several factors have contributed to securing effect and response to the speech delivered by Schmidt at the SPD congress. The chancellor had already pointed out last week that party congresses could not determine his policy.

These words had upset many Social Democrats; but when Schmidt addressed the party congress the anger had passed away. The chancellor proved himself equally skillful when he conceded to the party congress that he had made mistakes. This is what one likes to hear from a man who is known as a know-all, besides it does not cost anything. Moreover, it is useful for Schmidt that it is not personnal politics that attracts attention and detracts it from the speeches.

Thus it was a good opportunity for Schmidt to get a hearing; and the chancellor has used it for a speech which, because of its superior contents of realism, stood out against the speech delivered by Brandt the preceding day. The party chairman, who finds it difficult to stop longing for a state of utopia, had asked for all sorts of social charity. The chancellor warned against social-political promises because there is not enough money. The contrast became even more obvious in the field of foreign policy. Brandt had talked about the two world powers as though they must appear equally sinister for us. Schmidt's negative reply to any policy of equal distance toward Moscow and Washington sounded like a response to that. It was only Schmidt who told the party congress about the unilateral rearming of the Soviet Union. But then the unfortunate term "security partnership" with the Soviet camp was said -- as if he who constantly threatens us could be our security partner.

Schmidt has not become the favorite of the SPD with this speech. But Brandt, too, for long has ceased to be the favorite, and under such changed conditions the chancellor may win new backing within the party. But with this the chancellor has not broken the back of his difficulties, for there is, on the one hand, the friction with the FDP, which cannot be lessened by Schmidt's professing that Genscher and Mischnick were guarantors of the coalition to the same degree. There is quite a difference: Genscher adheres to the alliance with the SPD so long as it can be kept up; Mischnick believes the alliance can always be kept up. And then there are still the voters who, in contrast to many politicans, are free from any temptation to worship party congresses. A poor showing of the SPD at one of the forthcoming diet elections could make the Munich party congress come to naught in the retrospective despite all its speeches, the better ones as well as the worse.

COALITION'S ECONOMIC INTRANSIGENCE CRITICIZED

[Peter Gillies commentary: "Inner Blockade"]

[Text] There have rarely been clearer signals than those coming these days from Munich and Hannover: The economic philosophy of the SPD and the FDP has drifted apart irreconciliably. What is wanted by the one side is sharply rejected by the other -- though they are sitting together at the cabinet table. At the Hannover Fair FDP politician Count Lambsdorff demanded more elbowroom for entrepreneurs; SPD demands more state at the expense of the entrepreneurs' freedom of action. Lambsdorff seeks to cut state expenditures; the SPD wants to increase them. The FDP wants to lower taxes; the SPD chancellor wants to augment them. One side wants to overcome shortcomings, the other seeks to administer (and thereby increase) them. In short: Both are pulling together but at different ends.

It almost appears the coalition partners greedily aim at demonstrating the dwindling of common interests. The SPD, which is desperately in search of its identity, is testing the return to a socialism believing in planning: For the state not only can do everything, it also knows how to do it better, and the profit-greedy entrepreneur must be done away with. The fact that the chancellor has not yet fully embarked on the line of the investment planners, though he is bowing into this direction, is ample proof of his isolation. Helmut Schmidt is certainly aware that blind belief in the state's alleged omnipotence promises neither accomplishment nor growth, let alone social security. But the marching performance of his party was mapped out without his help.

A government coalition with such an unraveled economic policy is not in a position to fix reliable data toward an upswing. Indeed, it has become an impediment for investments. Its inner blockade demotivates the national economy, which has to stand its test in global, structural change which requires all its efforts. In the field of economic policy, which, after all, determines the fate of a government, the SPD and FDP have piled up a mountain of conflicts. They who throw that many gauntlets will soon throw in the towel.

SPACE OFFICIAL DISCUSSES LAUNCH WITH USSR

[By Serj Berg]

[Text] Paris, 19 Apr (AFP) -- France's first "spacenaut" will spend one week with Soviet cosmonauts in the Salyut-7 space laboratory launched today.

The French prefer to use the neutral word "spacenaut", because the Soviets use "cosmonaut" and the Americans "astronaut".

The joint Franco-Soviet manned spaceflight has been scheduled for the end of June in the three-man Soyuz-5 -- the most probable date is June 22.

But everything really depends on the success of various tests to be made on the Salyut-7.

Last week Hubert Curien, head of the French space centre CNES, told AFP that the Salyut-7 launching was imminent.

Once Soviet scientists have verified that the space-lab is on its correct orbit and that instruments are functioning efficiently, they will launch its main two-man crew to service it.

An unmanned freight spaceship will then be launched to supply the space-lab with food, drinking water and various items.

Once all is ready, the space-lab crew will be geared up to welcome three space "visitors" -- one Frenchman and two Soviets -- bringing the total crew in Salyut-7 to five.

The French "spacenaut," Lieutenant-Colonel Jean-Loup Chretien, has been chosen to make the joint Franco-Soviet space flight, but he can always be replaced by his second, Colonel Patrick Baudry, if necessary. Both men have been given intensive training in Soviet space centres.

Salyut-7 is part [words indistinct] Soviet generation of orbiting spaceships fully equipped with computers and automatic devices, giving the maximum aid to their crews; it is so designed that it can form part of a much larger space-lab.

Salyut-7 will replace Salyut-6, which is still in orbit after four-and-a-half years, much longer than experts expected, though several repair crews have boarded it to bring in fresh spare parts.

The Salyut-6 has been used by five crews staying for long periods -- 96, 140, 175, 185, and 75 days -- and with 11 crews staying for about a week or so, of which eight were mixed crews with Soviet and East European cosmonauts.

Sixteen Soyuz spaceships have made over 30 docking missions (?on) Salyut-6 on which 27 cosmonauts have lived -- six of them undertaking two missions.

ETA-MILITARY ISSUES COMMUNIQUE WITH DEMANDS

LD171448 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1307 GMT 17 Apr 82

[Text] Madrid, 17 Apr (TANJUG) -- The separatist movement "Basque Homeland and Freedom" (ETA) -- command has issued a communique ultimately demanding from the Spanish Government to withdraw its law-enforcing forces from the turbulent province. The government is allowed one month to start withdrawing its forces.

ETA threatens that on the contrary it will launch a new armed offensive against military facilities. It is added that heavier armament will be used in this offensive which will represent a "qualitiative jump in ETA's armed struggle." ETA also threatens that the offensive "will spread all over Spain." The goal of the separatist movement is the founding of an "independent Basque state." Probably to let it be known that its threats are not just simple words, the ETA command, just a few hours after the communique was released, ordered its commandoes to attack members of Civil Guard in Pamplona. The attack was carried out early this morning against a smaller patrol armored car. One member of the Civil Guard was killed and six wounded. A bus with 20 army officers was attacked by minethrowers in Barcelona yesterday in a similar attack to the one in Pamplona this morning. Democratic forces resolutely condemned the "terrorist bestiality" of the ETA movement which is aimed at causing political destabilization in the country.

Claims Responsibility

[San Sebastian dispatch]

[Text] ETA-Military has claimed responsibility for all the attacks carried out in Spain since Wednesday of last week, that is, at Inchaurrondo, Barcelona, Pamplona, Bilbao, Algorta, Eibar and Madrid. This is reported today in the San Sebastian newspaper EGIN. ETA had already claimed two of these attacks -- those at Inchaurrondo and Barcelona. EGIN says ETA-Military has so far merely claimed responsibility for all these attacks but has promised, as usual, a longer communique in the next few days.

FRG-NORDIC SUMMIT PLANNED FOR 26 JUNE IN KIEL

[FINSKA NOTISBYRAN dispatch: "Kiel Summit"]

[Text] Bonn -- West German Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Finnish, Swedish, Norwegian and Danish Government heads will meet in Kiel on 26 June this year, a government spokesman in Bonn announced Thursday [15 April]. An official program for the meeting has not been drawn up yet, but according to information received by FINSKA NOTISBYRAN's correspondent, the main questions for discussion will be security policy, East-West relations, the West's future internal cooperation and joint West German-Nordic action against pollution.

As far as environmental affairs are concerned, Sweden in particular has wanted the West Germans to take drastic action on the air pollution originating in the Ruhr district. Clouds of pollution from this area of West German heavy industry have been raining down on Sweden and have already harmed plant and animal life. The meeting will be part of the West German Government's officially stated policy of expanding its economic and political cooperation with the four Nordic countries.

The cost to the four countries is expected to amount to around 44 million markkaa in the 2-year period.

SWEDEN

SOVIET VICE CONSUL ACCUSED OF 'ILLEGAL ACTIVITY'

LD211044 Stockholm International Service in Swedish 1000 GMT 21 Apr 82

[Text] The Soviet authorities are expected to protest the fact that the Swedish Government has urged Soviet Vice Consul Albert Liepa to leave the country. The Foreign Ministry says the reason for its request to Liepa is that he engaged in illegal activities, among them closely observing Latvians in exile in Sweden. This is a breach of Swedish law and is incompatible with Liepa's diplomatic status, says the Foreign Ministry.

The Soviet authorities have in previous similar cases rejected accusations and will probably do so this time as well. According to TT [Swedish news agency], Albert Liepa is expected to leave the country since he was due to conclude his service in Sweden shortly anyway.

THATCHER COMMENTS ON ARGENTINE PLAN, PYM TRIP

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Text] The Argentine peace plan "falls short" of British aims in some important respects and the foreign secretary, Mr Francis Pym, is to fly to Washington on Thursday to put British peace proposals, Mrs Thatcher told the Commons today. In the meantime the task force continues "steadily on its way," the prime minister told MP's.

With the full cabinet meeting later today and the UN Security Council also summoned in New York to examine the crisis, Mrs Thatcher said: "We have to be true to our objective and I cannot disguise from the House that the Argentine proposals at present before us fall short in some important respects of those objectives and of the requirements expressed by MP's."

Mrs Thatcher said of the Argentine proposals: "I regard this as a stage in the negotiating process which must now be continued. We are examining the proposals very closely. "We shall seek to put forward our own proposals, I hope to Mr Haig, and the foreign secretary -- with that in mind -- plans to go to Washington on Thursday."

The prime minister said: "Among the many problems the Argentine proposals present is that they fail to provide that the Falkland Islanders should be able to determine their own destiny. And the House has always said the wishes of the islanders are paramount." Mrs Thatcher rejected a call by opposition leader Mr Foot for the government to adopt suggestions made by Shadow Foreign Secretary Mr Denis Healey for the United Nations to be involved in a settlement.

She said: "We are in the process of one negotiation through Mr Haig. I think at the moment it would be better not to get the wires crossed and to go steadily forward with that proposal." But the government was still seeking a diplomatic solution and trying to secure the implementation of the United Nations resolution calling for the withdrawal of Argentine troops, she told MP's.

That resolution was clear, "but not very easy to get implemented," she added.

Mr George Gardiner (C Reigate) demanded to Tory cheers: "Will you undertake to consider any proposals from the Argentine with great caution bearing in mind if an aggressor is even half compensated for his aggression that will be encouragement to others to behave like that."

Mrs Thatcher said: "I take your point. It has been made very, very strongly, and I believe it has been felt on all sides of this house. We shall of course try to seek a diplomatic solution." But, then she added, she could not disguise her feelings about the Argentine proposals which, she said, fell short "in some important respects..."

Mr Foot asked what the Argentinian proposals "officially are, what are the government's views about all of them and whether they are supported by the United States administration or whether General Haig was merely acting as an intermediary" in the matter.

The prime minister said: "We are very, very grateful to Mr Haig for his patience and stamina..." But she stressed: "These proposals are Argentine proposals." Mrs Thatcher said: "We now have the full details. "We regard this as a stage in the negotiation process which must now be continued..."

But Mr Foot pressed Mrs Thatcher, to cheers, for the government to take "full account" of the proposals made by Mr Healy on the involvement of the United Nations.

"Do you not agree that apart from the inherent justice of our case in this matter, our major source of strength has been the fact that this country has been acting in conformity with the United Nations Charter," he said.

Mr Foot added: "If indeed you and the government were to follow up the proposals made by Mr Healey, they could provide some alternative to the specific proposals that have now come from the Argentine, and could also make sure that we continue to act in full conformity with the UN Charter." Rejecting the call, Mrs Thatcher referred to "wire crossing" and said it would be better not to involve two sets of negotiations.

Mrs Thatcher was told by former Tory cabinet minister, Mr Norman St John Stevas of her handling of the Falkland crisis: "Its combination of firmness and diplomacy has commanded the full support of the vast majority of members of this House." He said her determination to "pursue resolutely" a diplomatic solution, would win her further support. Mrs Thatcher emphasized: "I do remain committed to seeking a diplomatic solution if one can possibly be found that is acceptable."

Liberal leader, Mr David Steel, provoked jeers when he called on Mrs Thatcher "to refrain from describing to the House as a whole your phrase about the paramountcy of the wishes of the islanders. Don't you agree that while of course their wishes and interests are uppermost in our minds, the long term issue is a paramount one for this House to resolve."

Mrs Thatcher retorted: "The House has always said -- not only in these negotiations but throughout many previous negotiations -- that the wishes of the islanders are paramount."

Mr Stan Newens (Lab Harlow) said if the UN became more deeply involved in the negotiations it would "Relieve the U.S. of the necessity of acting in what is called an even-handed fasion in the present circumstances." If the United States was then able to adopt the economic sanctions taken by our EEC partners and some Commonwealth countries, it would have a "moral and economic impact which would make a peaceful and diplomatic solution much more likely," he added.

Mrs Thatcher said that Mr Haig -- "a very good and appropriate negotiator" -- must retain his credibility with both countries. "It is in our interests he continues to have that credibility."

Tory MP Sir John Eden (Bournemouth West) challenged to Conservative cheers: "Is the government still absolutely determined to use whatever means are at their disposal to secure the withdrawal from the islands of the Argentine forces and to re-establish British administration before any question of a longer term solution is entered?"

The prime minister said: "That is still our aim. Our strategy is to try to use diplomatic means backed up by the task force which continues steadily on its way."

Mr John Townend (C Bridlington) said the Argentine proposal of joint provision for the island's police force "is not acceptable because it could lead to intimidation of the islanders" in view of Argentina's record on human rights. Mrs Thatcher told the Commons there were only two policemen on the island because the Falklanders were a very law abiding people.

Mr Roy Jenkins, the Social Democrat MP for Hillhead, called on Mrs Thatcher to involve leaders from all political parties in the Commons in future talks in the crisis. Mrs Thatcher retorted: "I had rather expected a more fundamental point from you." She added that Mr Foot had said such a move would not be appropriate and she thought the opposition leader was right.

In the Lords, Tory peers urged the government to reconsider the decision to close Gilbraltar's naval dockyard because of its service during the Falklands crisis. Lord Merivale asked Foreign Minister of State Lord Belstead at question time whether the crisis "has brought a new dimension to the question of timing as to the closure of the dockyard?"

And Lord Boyd-Carpenter said the dockyard had "rendered considerable services in the present crisis." Whatever else resulted, there would have to be a review of defence arrangements, he added, urging Lord Belstead to consider whether the dockyard should be retained indefinitely.

Lord Belstead said the Gibraltar dockyard had "rendered very valuable services in the present crisis facing this country." It had already been agreed, he added: that if the commercial viability of the dockyard was accepted, and subject to parliamentary approval, certain assets would be made available free of charge. And, subject to full negotiations with the port, some continued naval work would be made available in 1983-4.

Fears were expressed by Labour's Davies of Leek that the Falklands crisis could upset government forecasts of the inflation rate. But Trade Secretary Lord Cockfield said: "We anticipate that by the end of this year the rate of inflation will be down to 9 percent, and next year it will be down to 7-1/2 percent."

Lord Davies asked: "Can you inform me whether you are taking into account the dipping into contingency funds, which will be necessary whatever happens?" Lord Cockfield's forecast of reduced inflation was a "dangerous statement" declared Lord Davies.

Lord Cockfield replied: "There are always uncertainties in the future. Nevertheless, we would anticipate that the falls that have been forecast will be achieved."

Pym May Face U.S. 'Pressure'

[By PA political staff]

[Text] Mr Francis Pym's invitation to Washington is being seen by some Tory MPs tonight as an American attempt to pressure Britain into accepting the Argentinian peace proposals. Foreign Office officials were saying that it was the foreign secretary's turn to go to America and that Mr Haig had been under considerable strain from his peace shuttle.

But it was pointed out that if Mr Pym was exposed directly to American thinking on the crisis -- possibly even a meeting with President Reagan -- it might lead to acceptance of terms which fall short of Britain's demands. Some MPs feel Mr Pym has already shown firm signs of his readiness to negotiate.

There is also a strong possibility of a visit to Washington by Argentina's Foreign Minister Mr Costa Mendez -- although there was no suggestion tonight of any indirect, let alone direct, meetings between him and the foreign secretary.

But one analyst claimed that the Argentinians may be prepared to examine further gestures towards a settlement, after consideration of how their forces would fare in a confrontation. President Galtieri must also be aware that there is a risk, if there was a war, that America may decide to side openly with Britain.

Even though Mrs Thatcher made clear in the Commons today that the peace proposals were Argentinian, it was felt that after four days of talks Secretary of State Mr Haig must have made a significant contribution.

A war after so much negotiation would seriously damage his prestige and probably America's standing in Latin and Central America. President Reagan's administration has attached considerable importance to the Americas in his foreign policy, particularly because of the risk of communist infiltration.

However, it was emphasised at Westminster tonight that the possibility of war between Britain and Argentina still lay in the balance. For Mrs Thatcher a two-nation administration even with America as guarantor would be difficult to accept, and critics would present such an outcome as a defeat for her and a reward for Argentine aggression.

And she has made clear that the key element in any settlement would be the wishes of the islanders. If the islanders are ready to accept some form of two-nation administration then Mrs Thatcher's critics at home would be disarmed.

Mr Pym told MPs last week that after the crisis is over the islanders will need time to reflect on their position. He argued that they should not be unduly hurried and he was not in favour of a quick poll among them. Some MPs saw this remark as suggesting that the islanders, now aware of the risks to their security may be ready to consider alternatives.

MPs noted that Mr Pym took a slightly different approach to the Argentine proposals compared to the Downing Street statement on Monday night. The statement pointed out that the "complex and difficult" proposals did not at first sight meet the requirements expressed by Parliament, particularly on the need to regard as paramount the islanders' wishes.

Mr Pym, questioned at midnight as he left Downing Street, merely described the proposals as "complex and difficult" and did not add the additional point about how far they met Britain's requirements.

THATCHER MEETS WITH BUSINESSMEN, DISCUSSES CRISIS

LD210522 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0430 GMT 21 Apr 82

At the meeting the prime minister spoke frankly about the strain of steering Britain through the troubles. Mr Richard Whitting, managing director of a tube manufacturing firm in Saltash, Cornwall, posed the question that was on everybody's mind -- Are we going to war with Argentina? She said: "What options do we have? We will persist with negotiations. I hope sincerely that we do not go to war, but who knows?"

She was heard to tell Newcastle businessman Mr Guy Readman: "We can't let this go. Otherwise, what would happen to Gibraltar, Belize and to other similar places? Everybody has been marvellous in their support."

Asked how she was coping, she said: "There is something happening 24 hours of the day, even at 2 am in the morning there is a message to be answered from another country where the time is different to ours. But we go on. We survive."

Rotherham businessman Mr Edward Duke said: "I asked Mrs Thatcher if she was confident our troops could do the job if required. She told me she was absolutely confident in their ability and had no worries at all."

SHIPS REPORTEDLY BREAKING AWAY FROM MAIN FLEET

LD210922 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0839 GMT 21 Apr

[Text] Senior ministers will today draw up Britain's counter proposals to the Argentinian package for peaceful settlement to the Falklands Islands crisis. Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym will take the plans with him to Washington tomorrow, when he will meet the US Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig, who has been acting as mediator in the dispute.

Mr Pym will stay in America for as long as is necessary, although he is expected to return to London on Friday. Meanwhile the naval task force is steaming towards the South Atlantic amid speculation that a destroyer group may attempt to recapture the remote islands of South Georgia.

The Ministry of Defence today refused to comment on reports that several ships had broken away from the main fleet. A spokesman said: "For operational reasons we do not comment on the positions of our ships."

Whitehall sources are not ruling out military action within the next few days, despite Mr Pym's trip. The broad shape of Britain's counterplans was discussed by the full cabinet yesterday. They will be drafted in detail at a meeting today of the inner cabinet, made up of Mrs Thatcher, Mr Pym, Defence Secretary Mr John Nott, Home Secretary Mr William Whitelaw and Tory Party Chairman Mr Cecil Parkinson.

Government sources have refused to disclose details of either country's latest proposals, but two clear sticking points are Britain's insistence of self-determination for the islanders, and the Argentinian plan for a joint police force on the Falklands.

Fears emerged yesterday among some Tory backbenchers that Mr Pym will come under pressure in Washington to make further concessions to the Argentinians. Senior Tory MP Mr Julian Amery pointed out today that the Americans had an interest in the Argentinian dictator as an anti-communist figure.

He said the Americans might try to persuade Britain to make further concessions in advance of an Argentinian withdrawal from the Falklands. "I don't think this is acceptable. It would be making aggression pay," he said on BBC radio. "Unless a diplomatic answer can be found at short notice, I see no alternative to a recovery of the Falkland Islands by force."

MARINE OFFICER RECOUNTS S. GEORGIA FIGHTING

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] Every one of the 22 Royal Marines defending remote South Georgia during the April 3 invasion by overwhelming Argentine forces were prepared to die for the reason they were there, Lt Keith Mills, who commanded the detachment, said today after arriving in London. The marines, dug-in in trenches protected by boobytraps and explosives just 100 metres from the beach at the Antarctic base at Grytviken, killed between 10 and 15 Argentine marines and wounded 20 others in a fierce two-hour battle. They shot down two Argentinian helicopters and seriously damaged a corvette -- scoring 1,270 hits on the ship with a variety of weapons.

Lt Mills, 22, of Amlwch, Anglesey, said: "Afterwards I was informed by an Argentine officer that if we had hit the ship with another 66 millimetre rocket it would have been sunk."

The British marines suffered one casualty, one man with two rounds in his upper arm. After extensive de-briefing by intelligence officials, Lt Mills gave this dramatic account of the battle of Grytviken:

"On April 3, the Bahia Paraiso (the Argentine ice patrol ship) came on our radio to inform us that following their successful invasion of the Falkland Islands the ex-governor had surrendered the islands and dependencies. He suggested we should adopt similar action to prevent further loss of life in South Georgia. Our reply was that we had no intention of surrendering. He tried to negotiate, to come to terms with the captain."

"The Argentines refused to listen," he said. An Argentine Navy corvette appeared and started to steam in towards Grytviken. Then French-built Alouette helicopters flew in "on some kind of reconnaisance." The Antarctic survey scientists were evacuated to the church "where they were in complete safety."

Lt Mills added: "I walked down to the jetty to meet a boat which I assumed the corvette would land to negotiate some kind of settlement to prevent some kind of battle. Then an Alouette helicopter landed about 50 metres from me behind a building and six to eight Argentine marines disembarked. I tried to attract the attention of their leader, but he didn't notice me. One of their marines pointed his rifle in my direction and I decided I was not going to negotiate."

Lt Mills went back to his prepared position 100 metres away, trenches protected by booby-traps and explosives. "As I ran back to the position we came under fire. At the same time a Puma helicopter carrying about 20 men landed about 100 metres to our front. I gave the order to engage.

"The Puma came under heavy fire -- 600 to 800 rounds were fired. The helicopter backed away trailing black smoke." The aircraft then flew 500 metres across the bay "landing very heavily on the other side. No marines were seen to disembark."

The marines then opened fire with machine guns on an Alouette helicopter carrying perhaps eight to 10 Argentines. Meanwhile the corvette headed back towards the beach with its 100-millimetre gun firing.

"We were coming under heavy fire. We engaged one of the helicopters which dropped from the sky. Its rotor blades stopped turning. That helicopter never took off again. We engaged the corvette with 84 millimeter and 66 millimetre anti-tank rockets and machine gun fire. The first 84 millimetre rocket dropped short by about 10 metres and did not detonate, but it struck the corvette below the waterline damaging it very badly. Two 66 millimetre hits were scored on the superstructure, one behind the 100 millimetre gun," said Lt Mills.

The ship then turned round quickly. "Afterwards I was informed by an Argentine officer that if we had fired another 84 millimetre rocket it would have sunk. We scored 1,270 hits on the corvette. Fire continued for about another 15 minutes and our retreat was already cut off. I decided it would not be possible for us to withdraw except with extremely heavy casualties. I moved out of the trench without getting shot, surprisingly. Two hundred metres down the beach I met an Argentinian officer. I told him we had now achieved our aim and now were to surrender. We had forced Argentina to take South Georgia by military action. They could not say they walked into South Georgia and captured it without any resistance. We made sure it was a separate political issue."

Lt Mills who was speaking at a press conference at the Ministry of Defense in London said the "Argentine marines were afraid of us even though we were unarmed. We were not treated badly in any way. I was extremely surprised." The captured marines were then taken off South Georgia and spent 11 days at sea and a further four at the main Argentine naval base, Puerto Belgrano, before flying home.

Lt Mills said the Argentine fire -- including gunfire from the 100 millimetre gun on board the corvette -- was extremely accurate. Originally the rounds were falling 20 metres behind us. But later the rounds were landing in our position."

By the end of the two-hour battle, they were being faced by 100 Argentine marines. They had intended to fall back to a cave in a nearby bay to re-group, but their retreat was cut off. Lt Mills added: "We all now very much would like to go back to the South Atlantic."

PAPER NOT OPTIMISTIC ON FALKLANDS PROPOSALS

[Editorial: "The End-Game Begins"]

[Text] It looks as if the Falklands crisis is moving into what chess players call the end-game. This is when after the opening and middle game play moves into the final phase, from which a result has to emerge. There has been a "refinement" of the Argentine position. Mr Haig has done all he can in this latest round of talks. The very length of his discussions in Buenos Aires presumably strongly implies that what has emerged represents what he considers to be (apart from details) the last drop to be squeezed out of the junta. The stage seems set for a final round-up.

It would certainly be wrong to be optimistic. Some details of the latest Argentine proposals, mentioned yesterday by Gen Lani Dozo and in an Argentine newspaper, CLARIN, do not seem to go far enough to meet Britain's requirements. As Mr Pym told the Commons, the methods of Argentine withdrawal are "open to discussion," but withdrawal remains the government's first objective. The latest proposals, as so far reported, appear to link withdrawal with a prior commitment by Britain to share control of the islands with Argentina. The question of sovereignty, they suggest, should be decided by the United Nations. Neither of these proposals would be acceptable. If they are hard and fast -- and that has yet to be seen -- there has been no real advance, and the initial reaction of Mrs Thatcher and her ministers at their midnight meeting was inevitably sombre.

The essence of the British position is that withdrawal must take place as a pre-condition for negotiations. In effect, Britain is offering to return to the situation as it existed last February, before the Argentine invasion took place. At that time, negotiations about the future of the Islands were taking place between British and Argentine representatives in New York. Cancel your invasion and withdraw your forces, Britain is saying and we can resume talks. Put thus baldly, it is not a proposition which the present Argentine junta could accept and remain in power. But the pressures on Buenos Aires will be mounting steadily from now on, as much as they will on London.

NEW CABINET SWORN IN; KIPRIANOU MAKES STATEMENT

Cyprus, he said, is faced with difficult conditions, and the government is called on to play a serious role, particularly toward promoting an honorable solution of the Cyprus issue and at the same time serving the people to the greatest possible extent. President Kiprianou reiterated that his government's policy is aimed at social justice and added that the minimum program agreed on between the Democratic Party and AKEL takes into consideration the interests of the people and the reality of Cyprus. He underlined, however, that the term "reality of Cyprus" does not refer to the situation created by the Turkish invasion and occupation.

On our national issue, Kiprianou stressed, our policy is unaltered. We strive for a solution that will guarantee the unity of the state and the people and that will guarantee the citizens' basic freedoms, including the inalienable right of the refugees to return to their ancestral homes. President Kiprianou said that the government is aiming at termination of the occupation and the demilitarization of Cyprus. He referred to the government's economic and social policy, stressing that its goal is to advance all the people's problems toward a solution, giving priority to such problems as those of the refugees, those who suffered under the invasion and those of the missing persons.

The new education minister, Panos Ioannou, spoke on behalf of the new members of the government. He assured the president that they all know the difficulties the fatherland is facing and that they will stand by his side for the advance of all problems of the fatherland and the people toward a solution. Ioannou added that President Kiprianou has proven to be an able successor to President Makarios and promised that all the ministers will fight with him toward fulfillment of all the people's expectations to the degree possible.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY, AKEL ISSUE JOINT DECLARATION

[Text] The Democratic Party, DIKO, and the Restorative Party of the Working People, AKEL, in a joint declaration to the people of Cyprus, have announced their agreement to cooperate on the basis of a joint minimum program they pledge to honor. The declaration states that establishment of unity and cooperation and implementation of the minimum program they have approved require the election, during the next presidential voting, of a tested democratic president and proclaim their support for the candidacy of Kiprianou.

The two cooperating parties agreed that implementation of the minimum program will be promoted through appointment by the president of the republic of a government made up of able, qualified and incorruptible figures who will be loyal to the president and selected and appointed by him, exercizing his constitutional prerogative and bearing in mind the views of the cooperating parties on the issue. The selected figures, the declaration adds, will exercise their duties as members of the government under the instructions of the president for implementation of the minimum program, which will be the framework and directive line of the government's policy.

The two parties add that their cooperation is the sequel to the cooperation and unity achieved under Ethnarch Makarios and that it is open to all who sincerely and conscientiously united their forces under the Makarios policy. DIKO and AKEL underline in their declaration that the process of the intercommunal talks is the most appropriate course and that both the domestic and the foreign aspects of the Cyprus issue must be solved through peaceful means.

The declaration states that the two parties give special significance to the close relations and cooperation between Cyprus and democratic Greece and believe that the democratic change in Greece will have positive repercussions on the Cyprus problem. DIKO and AKEL also reaffirm their dedication to the position that reconciliation and rapprochement between the Greek and Turkish Cypriots is the most imperative prerequisite for the viability of a mutually acceptable solution of the Cyprus issue, and they underline that in the future the state and the Greek community must show greater interest, understanding and care for the economic and social problems of the Turkish Cypriots. The two parties also announce that they will never abandon the question of the missing persons until their fate is established and that they will make every possible effort in this direction, both inside Cyprus and internationally.

The declaration stresses that a basic sector in which their cooperation will be extended is the economic sector. The goal of their cooperation, they state, is to continue to improve the living and cultural standards and life of the people and not to change the economic system of the country or its social regime. They will also encourage private initiative, but at the same time they will expand the role of the state wherever the interests of the national economy so dictate or wherever private initiative is either unable or unwilling to proceed. The declaration concludes that special attention will be given to the problems of those who have suffered and the problems of the refugees until such time as the day arrives for their return to their ancestral homes.

Kliridhis Criticizes Agreement

[Excerpt] In a statement, the chairman of the Democratic Rally [DISI], Kliridhis, criticizes the Democratic Party [DIKO]-AKEL cooperation agreement and states that in view of the joint government, as he maintains, between the communist AKEL and Mr Kiprianou, the existence of the National Council, which for a long time has stopped operating, has become a mockery, and that DISI thus withdraws permanently from it. Mr Kliridhis describes the DIKO-AKEL agreement as unholy and adds that the policy fixed by Archbishop Makarios of diligently holding the communists outside the government has been abandoned.

EDEK on Cabinet Reshuffle

[Text] In a statement, the socialist EDEK party accuses President Kiprianou of ignoring and violating the democratic institutions that govern elections in democratic regimes. The statement says Kiprianou is proceeding with a reshuffle not to promote persons of common trust who will guarantee the irreproachability of the elections and democratic procedures, but to promote a ministerial council of electoral expediency, whose goal will be the preservation of Mr Kiprianou's candidacy by any means. The statement says that those responsible for violation of the democratic procedures must be aware of their responsibility in adopting such tactics.

TURKMEN INTERVIEWED ON GREEK-TURKISH DIALOGUE

NC210909 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 19 Apr 82 pp 1, 8

[Interview with Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen by correspondent Nur Batur in Ankara -- date not specified]

[Text] Question: How do you assess the present state of Turkish-Greek relations?

Answer: It is not feasible to assess positively the stage we have now reached in Turkish-Greek relations. None of our problems with Greece has shown any sign of being settled. Statements and speeches likely to create tension continue. In addition to all this, attempts have recently been made to seize registered immovable property belonging to our kinsmen in Western Thrace. This has led to an exchange of notes between Turkey and Greece. At this moment there is no dialogue by which Greece and Turkey can discuss pending issues.

Question: After Papandreou's assumption of power, Turkish-Greek relations continued to deteriorate rapidly until 13 March. However, since that date, an artificial lull has been noticed in these relations. What is the cause of this lull?

Answer: This is not the first time our relations with Greece at times have manifested a temperate and at times a tense atmosphere. However, this time the issues at stake are more serious than in the past. It is useful to separate two factors: Problems between the two countries may remain unsolved and the atmosphere between the two countries may be unpleasant. This is naturally disturbing, but it is not too harmful. However, if one side takes any action involving the essence of these issues and then tension is added to it, a perilous situation arises. As we have always stressed, what we expect of Greece is to refrain from embarking unilaterally on faits accomplis and actions likely to worsen our existing problems.

Question: There appears to be a divergence in speeches made in Athens and Greece's approach to Ankara. How do you explain this contradiction?

Answer: It is not so hard to explain this. Papandreou is basically a politician. He delivered several speeches during his election campaign and assumed extremely exaggerated positions. He attaches great importance to domestic opinion. In adjusting his foreign policy he deems these factors very important.

Question: Although Papandreou's policy has been clearly understood and although this policy has caused certain cracks in NATO, why is it that neither Europe nor the United States has so far sought a remedy to this situation?

Answer: In the view of some quarters, Papandreou's militancy is less serious than the noise he has created. He had pledged to leave the NATO military wing, to hold a referendum on the EEC and remove the U.S. bases from Greece. However, he has done none of these things so far. There is, therefore, a definite difference between the words and acts of the Greek prime minister. I believe that some Western countries depend on this and cherish the hope that eventually Papandreou will gradually adopt a more rational policy.

Question: Do we, as Turkey, cherish the same hope?

Answer: From our point of view we do hold this view to some extent, but it should not be forgotten that the issues between Turkey and Greece are far more serious than Greece's issues with the other NATO countries. That is why the Greek Government must exercise far greater care in these issues than in others.

Question: Do you see any chance at all for the resumption of the Turkish-Greek dialogue in the near future?

Answer: We are not the side that has suspended the dialogue. Our attitude is clear. We are always ready for talks with Greece, and we believe that only through talks can our differences be solved. Therefore it is Greece which should believe in the need for a dialogue and which should take action.

Question: The press carried reports that the Greek ambassador has conveyed proposals for resumption of the dialogue. Is that true?

Answer: He was not explicit about this.

Question: Wasn't it a direct proposal?

Answer: It was rather an indication of the possibility. No direct proposal has been received from Greece for resumption of a dialogue.

Question: Can a chance present itself during the NATO Ministerial Council meeting for resumption of a Turkish-Greek dialogue?

Answer: The Turkish and Greek foreign ministers will be in Luxembourg for the NATO meetings. But their presence there is not enough. One of the sides must take the initiative that will bring them together. In view of the fact that we are not the side that discontinued dialogue, it is not difficult to know which side should take the initiative.

Question: What about the reports that President Reagan will try to bring Papandreou and Ulusu together at the NATO summit on 10 June?

Answer: It is not yet known who will represent Turkey at the NATO summit. Our head of state may be attending the summit. We still don't know. However, we have received no information so far whether President Reagan will try to bring the Turkish and Greek leaders together.

Question: What kind of approach do we expect from Greece for improvement of Turkish-Greek relations and for the establishment of a complete atmosphere of friendship between the two countries?

Answer: I would prefer to explain to the Greeks at a special meeting what kind of approach we expect from them. However, I believe Greece has no great doubts about this. First of all, Greece must make a new appraisal of Turkey. It must abandon the unfounded argument that it is threatened by Turkey. It must search for a common ground for cooperation and not for conflict within NATO. It must inspire us with the confidence that it will not resort to faits accomplis or one-sided acts. And finally, both sides must be willing to sit at the conference table. This can be possible only if Greece adopts a wise and realistic policy.

OZAL RETURNS AFTER OECD, EC CONTACTS IN PARIS

[Text] Deputy Prime Minister and State Minister Turgut Ozal returned home today after completing talks he held in Paris with OECD and EEC officials. In a statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport, Ozal said his talks with OECD Secretary General Emil van Lennep were very beneficial. He added that views were exchanged with the OECD secretary general over the OECD meeting to be held in Paris in June to discuss aid to Turkey.

Referring to his talks with EEC officials, Ozal said the subject of custom tax imposed on imports of Turkish cotton yarn and textile products was discussed. Ozal expressed hope that as soon as the ground is laid for an agreement on this matter, there will be no need for retaliatory measures. Ozal concluded by saying he was convinced his contacts would contribute to a solution of this problem.

DANISH PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT SEEN 'INAPPROPRIATE'

NC210738 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 18 Apr 82 pp 1, 9

[Text] Ankara (HURRIYET) -- It has been reported that Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen has expressed the desire unofficially to also visit Turkey after his visit to Greece, but that he has been informed that such a visit "will not be appropriate" at present. Some time ago the Danish prime minister informed the Danish ambassador in Ankara that he wished to visit Turkey with the intention of calling on former Republican People's Party leader Bulent Ecevit. Jorgensen's unofficial request has been answered through the same channel.

Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman has disclosed that the Danish prime minister has been informed that his visit "would be inappropriate."

ECEVIT MAY APPEAL MARTIAL LAW ARREST ORDER

NC210737 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 18 Apr 82 p 9

[Text] Ankara (Special) -- Bulent Ecevit, former leader of the defunct Republican People's Party, may in 7 days appeal the arrest decision by Military Court No 3 of the Martial Law Command. If he fails to do so, his arrest will become definite. Inquiries were carried out regarding the statement Ecevit is alleged to have made to a Norwegian [as published] that led to his detention. Last Monday he was referred to Military Court No 2 with the demand that he be arrested. But this court had decided to release Ecevit as the charges on which he had been arrested could not be upheld.

The Martial Law Command objected to the decision of Military Court No 2 on Friday, and Military Court No 3, having examined this objection, decided to arrest Ecevit again. According to military court procedure, Ecevit has the right to object to this decision within 1 week.

[Text] Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah Agriculture Minister Abu Zayd 'Umar Durdah arrived in Turkey as the official guest of Deputy Prime Minister and State Minister Turgut Ozal. The visiting minister was received at Yesilkoy Airport by Ozal. In a statement at the airport, Ozal recalled that trade between Turkey and Libya developed greatly, particularly during the last 2 years, pointing out that all efforts were being made to develop relations further between the two countries.

Ozal continued: We are experiencing a difficult period, as is the case in all the world. We are paying special importance to developing and strengthening our relations in such days. I am convinced such visits will contribute to the promotion of our links. Libya is a country with which our relations have been intensified speedily during the last 2 years. Our goal is to further these good relations. Ozal noted that economic subjects would dominate talks between Turkey and Libya.

The visiting minister said relations between the two friendly Muslim countries had in fact reached an important stage. He recalled that trade volume between the two countries, which was only $26 million in the past, presently has reached the $300-million mark. Durdah added that efforts would be exerted so that talks between the Turkish and Libyan delegations would lead to the growth and diversification of relations between the two countries.

VIETNAMESE FOREIGN MINISTER MEETS WITH TINDEMANS

[Text] Brussels, 20 Apr (AFP) -- Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach left here today for Bonn after meeting with Belgian Foreign Minister Leo Tindemans, the Foreign Ministry said. Mr Nguyen Co Thach told Mr Tindemans, president of the European Community Council of Ministers until July, of Vietnam's interest in increasing cooperation with Belgium and other European countries, an informed source said.

But Mr Tindemans said Belgium would not resume aid to Vietnam, suspended in 1979 after Vietnamese troops intervened in Cambodia, until the troops were withdrawn under United Nations resolutions, the ministry said. "We want to improve our relations with Vietnam," Mr Tindemans said, "but at the present time there are two obstacles, the problem of Cambodia and the refugee problem."

Mr Tindemans stressed to Mr Nguyen Co Thach how much the Vietnamese refugee situation, especially the "boat people," "profoundly moves Belgian public opinion." The Belgian foreign minister submitted to Mr Nguyen Co Thach a list of Vietnamese families Belgium would like to see reunited soon. Belgium supports UN resolutions for both the withdrawal of Vietnamese troops and Cambodia's right to self-determination.

Mr Nguyen Co Thach was in Paris earlier this month on an official visit to France which marked a resumption of political dialogue between the two countries after a decade-long lapse.

Thai Prime Minister Prem Tinsulanon will be arrived here this week on a state visit to Belgium.

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON MUHRI'S VISIT TO CUBA

AU211618 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 20 Apr 82 p 3

["Joint communique" of the Cuban Communist Party (PCC) and the Austrian Communist Party (KPOe) on KPOe Chairman Franz Muhri's visit to Cuba 13-17 April]

[Text] At the invitation of the Cuban Communist Party [PCC] Central Committee, Austrian Communist Party [KPOe] Chairman Franz Muhri and Central Committee memeber Johann Slamanig visited Cuba 13-17 April 1982. Commander in Chief Fidel Castro Ruz, first secretary of the PCC, had a fraternal talk with the delegation on questions of mutual interest that will lead to closer relations between the two parties.

The other official talks held in a fraternal climate were chaired, on the Cuban side, by Comrade Jesus Montane Oropesa, candidate member of the PCC Politburo and of the PCC Central Committee Secretariat and head of the Central Committee Main Department for Foreign Relations. Also present at the talks were, on behalf of the aforementioned main department, Comrades Eloy Valdes, Javier Ardizones and Silvia Nereida Perez.

During its stay in Cuba, the KPOe delegation visited Cienfuegos, where it inspected economically and socially important centers. Moreover, a talk was held there with Rene Rodriguez, chairman of ICAP, and member of the PCC Central Committee, and there was meeting at the study center for West Europe. During the talks both parties briefed one another about their activities to strengthen the communist world movement.

At the same time it was stressed at the talks that this visit by Comrade Muhri will contribute to further strengthening the close ties linking the two parties, and that it will further the development of joint efforts for detente, world peace and disarmament.

Comrade Muhri repeatedly stressed the Austrian Communists' feelings of solidarity with revolutionary Cuba, which is exposed to the policy of threats and acts of aggression by the leading figures of the North American administration, and called for an end to the illegal occupation of the territory on which the North American military base of Guantanamo is situated, a territory that must be reincorporated into Cuban sovereign territory.

The representatives of the Cuban Communists expressed their appreciation of the contribution that was and is being made by the KPOe and by Austria's democratic and progressive organizations and forces to defend peace and detente. Both sides expressed their solidarity with the revolutionary and democratic forces, which are struggling throughout the world for development and social progress, a better future and for elimination of the consequences of colonialism and neocolonialism, which for millions of men, women and children of our planet are the cause of immeasurable misery, starvation, illness, unhealthy living conditions, illiteracy, underdevelopment and death, all of which could be avoided by a more just distribution of wealth.

Both sides examined the delicate international situation created by the aggressive policy of imperialism and stressed the need for both parties to make further efforts to foil the intentions of those who are leading mankind onto the dangerous road of a world war which threatens to destroy every trace of life on earth.

Both sides expressed the opinion that the aggressive plans of North American imperialism directed against Nicaragua, Grenada and Cuba and the criminal actions aimed at oppressing the will of the Salvadoran people can degenerate into a brutal intervention which will not only harm the Central American and Caribbean regions but constitutes a threat to world peace. Both delegations support the broad actions of the peace forces against the intensified arms race emanating from U.S. imperialism, against the production of the neutron bomb, against the NATO decision to the deploy the new intermediate-range missiles in West Europe and against the insane imperialist intentions to wage a limited war on the European continent.

Both parties consider the Soviet Union's peace policy to be an essential contribution in this struggle to prevent a new world war. They stressed that in view of the magnitude of the danger and the diversity of the problems, the foremost requirement is an increasing solidarity among the working people of countries with different levels of development, reflected in a firm and determined unity of action guided by their common interests and aims.

Both sides expressed their determination to work for further developing and strengthening the political, economic and cultural relations between the Republic of Austria and Cuba. The visit of the KPOE delegation is proof of this fraternal party's solidarity which is sincerely appreciated by the PCC.

PEACE MARCH ORGANIZERS NOW ALSO CRITICIZE EAST

[Special DIE PRESSE report by "RUP"]

[Summary] The Federal Youth Association [Bundesjugendring, organizer of the peace march in Vienna scheduled for 15 May] has issued a more specific "definition" [praezisierung] of the joint platform adopted by numerous Austrian youth organizations and groups for the 15 May peace march, making allowance for objections recently voiced both by Austrian Socialist Party [SPOE] and People's Party quarters that this platform was too vague and too one-sided. The text of this "definition," which has been issued by the association in the form of a leaflet, calls for: Comprehensive peace education at all levels; reduction of existing land-, sea- and air-based intermediate-range missiles and no deployment of new ones; worldwide reduction and eventual elimination of all nuclear, biological, chemical, conventional and neutron weapons; no arms exports to countries violating human rights; and a stronger engagement of Austrian foreign policy in the worldwide endeavors to ensure respect for human rights.

The "definition" continues: "In the consistent waging of the struggle for human rights there must be no difference whether Eastern or Western countries are involved. Democrats must neither be blind in the right eye nor in the left eye when it is necessary to expose and combat violations of human rights. Totalitarianism and terrorism are wrong. "Hence we demand: Discontinuation of the U.S. support for the regime in El Salvador; the immediate abolition of martial law in Poland and the release of all interned democrats and the restoration of the democratic and trade union rights as laid down in the Gdansk agreement. The Soviet Union is asked to end the occupation of Afghanistan. The Federal Youth Association condemns this continuing violation of international law and of the UN Charter." We appeal to the conscience of all those in responsible positions to help ease the threatening situation in Europe and throughout the world. "What is at stake is life -- the life of us all."

The national executive board of the Austrian Socialist Youth [the youth organization of the SPOE] on Monday rejected the suggestion of SPOE central secretary Marsch to reconsider the text of the peace march "platform." Without any reference to the "definition," the youth organization, which is headed by Josef Cap, says in a release: "Anyone who calls in question the platform now, a few weeks before the biggest peace demonstration of the second republic, actually wants to call in question the demonstration itself."

VAN DER STOEL PROTESTS TO SALVADORAN CHARGE

[Text] The Hague, 17 April -- Yesterday Netherlands Foreign Minister van der Stoel summoned the Salvadoran charge d'affaires to the Foreign Ministry and expressed his indignation at the lack of cooperation from the Salvadoran authorities in the investigation into the deaths of the four IKON [Netherlands television company] journalists. Despite repeated pressure from the Netherlands diplomats carrying out the enquiry they have not been given the opportunity to question the sergeant and the men of the Salvadoran Army patrol involved in the fatal shooting party.

The foreign minister urged that an interview might still be arranged. Only through such a meeting would there be a chance to throw some light on the background of the drama.

SPD CONGRESS APPROVES ECONOMIC RESOLUTION

LD211630 Hamburg DPA in German 1449 GMT 21 Apr 82

[Excerpt] Munich, 21 Apr (DPA) -- The SPD congress today in Munich approved by a large majority and four abstentions the draft resolution put forward by the motions commission on economic and financial policy. With this resolution, the Social Democrats want to establish their "prospects for regaining full employment" in the coming years.

Regardless of the objections of their Bonn coalition partners, the FDP, the Social Democrats are adhering to their demand for a fixed-term supplementary tax on higher incomes and an employment levy [arbeitsmarktabgabe] for everyone to finance further employment initiatives. They also favor raising the top tax rate for top earners.

The Munich SPD decision clearly underlines the state's responsibility for an adequate number of jobs and supports increased state intervention and controls for investment.

Brandt Reelected Chairman

[Text] Munich, 22 Apr (DPA) -- SPD Chairman Willy Brandt has been confirmed in office with an overwhelming majority. LD221018 Hamburg DPA in German 0957 GMT 22 Apr 82

[Text] Munich, 22 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has been reelected deputy SPD chairman at the Munich party congress with a large majority. Schmidt, who has held the office since 1968, received 365 of the 436 votes. There were 67 votes against and 4 abstentions. All voting papers were valid. The chancellor thus achieved 83.7 percent of the votes, which was well below the 91.1 percent received by party leader Willy Brandt when being confirmed in his post. At the 1979 Berlin party congress Schmidt received 86.9 percent of the votes.

FDP LEADERS REJECT SPD'S TAX RESOLUTIONS

[Excerpts] Saarbruecken, 21 Apr (DPA) -- Leading FDP politicians -- General Secretary Guenter Verheugen and Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff -- have given a clear rebuff to the new employment policy initiatives at the SPD congress in Munich today. The resolutions, drafted by one of the working groups at the SPD congress in Munich, which at the initiative of the employees' wing call for stronger state investment control, fixed-term supplementary tax for the better paid and a labor market tax, cannot, according to General Secretary Verheugen, be implemented with the Free Democrats in the government coalition. Speaking on Saarland radio, Verheguen said this should not be seen as a warning to the coalition partners but as a "necessary clarification" of what would and would not happen politically in the country.

Federal Economics Minister Lambsdorff has also spoken out against tax increases and more borrowing as cures for unemployment. The FDP wants to increase value added tax in the second half of 1983 and to correspondignly reduce wage and income taxes from 1984, said Lambsdorff in an interview for BILD-ZEITUNG. He said: "There will be no new tax increases as far as we are concerned."

Asked why the FDP is still supporting coalition with the SPD in spite of these differences, Lambsdorff said: "Because we received a mandate from the voters for this in 1980. This coalition will not break down because of our political goals." Asked what made him so certain that the coalition would last until 1984, he remarked, "Did I say I was sure?"

GOVERNMENT ISSUES APPEAL ON FALKLANDS MEDIATION

Ruehl stressed that there could only be a peaceful solution by way of negotiations. A peaceful settlement is also urgent because of the possible consequences and ramifications for international security. Ruehl again underlined the Federal Government's decision not to allow the export of any military weapons to Argentina until the end of the conflict created by Argentina's aggression.

In this respect the Federal Government again rejected "most decisively" the claims made in a British television film that the Federal Republic had helped Argentina in development work for an atomic bomb. Ruehl described claims or conjectures of this nature as "irresponsible." The Federal Republic's nuclear cooperation with Argentina -- as with every other country -- had not incurred any special risk with regard to circumventing the international treaty banning the proliferation of nuclear weapons. For the very reason that Argentina had not joined the nuclear nonproliferation treaty, the Federal Government had "handled the rules and control standards" of nonproliferation policy "strictly" and "expediently," stressed Ruehl. This same attitude had also been adopted by the United States, Canada and the Soviet Union who also cooperated with Argentina in the peaceful use of nuclear energy.

AIR DEFENSE MISSILE PLANNED FOR ARMED FORCES

PM211053 Paris LE FIGARO in French 29 Mar 82 p 5

[Pierre Darcourt report]

[Excerpts] France's new short-range air defense missile will enter service at the beginning of 1986 in the army and air force for the protection of bases, other fixed installations or land-based units. The system, developed by Matra after barely 2 years of research, which is something of a record, consists of two parts: A firing platform with a seat integral with the tripod supporting the missile-launcher and associated equipment. The weapon is operated by two men, one carrying the missile housed in its sealed firing tube, the other the firing platform.

The missile contains a very sophisticated passive infra-red seeker, which frees the crew from any action or constraint once the rocket has been fired. The 3 kg explosive charge developed by Manurhin guarantees the missile an almost infallible hit on target, thanks to its impact and proximity detonators. The firing platform which, unlike the firing tube, is reusable, carries an IFF [identification friend or foe] interrogator and a telescopic sight, making it possible to "sort" and acquire targets while preventing the crew from firing at friendly aircraft. Initial trials show that the new missile will be very effective both in intercepting low-flying aircraft and against helicopters. Once it is "locked on" to the target, its range will be over 5 km. The minimum range is under 500 meters. A thermal detector could enable the weapon to be used in the dark.

The development of the portable version began in 1980, but the system will only become operational in 4 years' time. What priorities will be established and at what rate will it be issued? These decisions should be taken soon by Defense Ministry chiefs because similar weapons are already being deployed by the Soviet and Warsaw Pact armed forces.

Modified Versions

A turreted version of the short-range surface-to-air missile will form the principal air defense weapon for small navy units and complement other surface-to-air missiles on more important buildings. The army will apparently be adopting another version, to be deployed on light armored vehicles equipped with four firing tubes for the protection of units on the move and tank regiments. A radar system, at present being developed by Thompson-CSF, mounted on the turret of the armored vehicle, will ensure detection of low- and very low-flying enemy aircraft, especially stationary airborne and partially concealed helicopters, up to a distance of 12 km. The army's light aviation unit is examining a version of the system to provide its antitank helicopters with an efficient and accurate weapon against helicopter gunships.

Last, a more basic and lighter hand-held version could, by means of standard ammunition and simplified firing equipment, very easily provide mobile and highly maneuverable strike units with the weapon which they most dangerously lack. The missile, thanks to its infra-red seeker, is entirely independent after firing. If carried on a vehicle, however, it is easier to detect.

[Summary] There was a very violent explosion in the Rue Marbeuf in the Eighth District of Paris at 0700 this morning. A car bomb went off outside the offices of the Lebanese paper AL-WATAN AL-ARABI, killing a 30-year old woman and injuring about 30 other people. 10 of them seriously. Journalists at the paper have confirmed that they had received threats. It may be recalled that the paper was the first to publish an investigation into the killing of the French ambassador in Beirut.

Syrian Diplomats Expelled

[Statement by Interior Minister Gaston Defferre in connection with 22 April bomb blast in Paris -- recorded]

[Text] I am making this statement to you in my capacity as interim prime minister -- as you know, Mr Mauroy is in Canada -- and as minister of the interior. The government bows to the victims of the attack which has just covered the Champs Elysee with blood, causing one dead and several injured. The method used is indicative of the mentality of the perpetrators of this type of attack, who have no hesitation in sheeding blood on French territory for the settling of scores which have nothing to do with France. The government will do everything to unmask those who are guilty, place them in the hands of the law and strengthen arrangements for the protection of the population.

The government has forthwith decided to declare the military attache and the cultural attache at the Syrian Embassy in Paris non grata because of their machinations in France. They are thus asked to leave the national territory without delay. In addition, the government is recalling the French ambassador from Damascus for consultations.

PERTINI INTERVENTION AVERTS GOVERNMENT CRISIS

[Excerpt] Rome, 22 Apr (ANSA) -- There was general satisfaction in political circles today over head of state Sandro Pertini's apparently successful bid to avert a government crisis. Pertini put his own considerable personal prestige on the line when he held intensive talks last night to defuse potentially disastrous polemics between the Christian Democrats (DC) and the Socialists (PSI), the two chief partners in a coalition government led by Republican premier Giovanni Spadolini.

The PSI leadership issued a document last night stating that the Socialists would wait until after the DC congress (beginning May 2) to call for a clarification of political agreements and orientations among the coalition partners.

After several days of high tension in which the collapse of the Spadolini administration seemed imminent, the premier told newsmen last night that the situation had calmed down. He was asked about Treasury Minister Nino Andreatta whose allegedly anti-Socialist remarks last Friday triggered PSI calls for his resignation. Spadolini said that the minister was at a union meeting planned some time ago. This was implicit confirmation that Andreatta had not stepped down from his post.

FOREIGN MINISTRY CONDEMNS ISRAEL LEBANON RAID

[Text] Rome, 22 Apr (ANSA) -- The Italian Foreign Ministry has deplored the Israeli air raid against Palestinian objectives in Beirut and other localities in southern Lebanon. The Foreign Ministry condemned the attack both because of the civilian victims it caused and because it was a clear violation of the ceasefire reached in June of last year for southern Lebanon.

Whatever the motivation for the Israeli raid, it had far reaching negative consequences for the entire region and the Italian Government called on all sides involved to exercise strong self control so as to restore and maintain the truce and achieve the necessary easing of tensions in southern Lebanon.

PCI WELCOMES HUNGARIAN PUBLICATION OF DOCUMENT

PM210449 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 13 Apr 82 p 22

[Italo Furgeri dispatch]

[Excerpts] Budapest -- The Hungarian Socialist Workers Party [MSZMP] Central Committee regards as "unacceptable" the assessment made by the PCI of events in Poland. This is the first official stance adopted by the Hungarian party's top leadership body in the polemic between our party and the CPSU. It is contained in a lengthy official communique published last Friday on the proceedings of the previous day's Central Committee session devoted not only to domestic policy but also to the international situation. But at the same time, for the first time in any Eastern bloc country, a Hungarian journal has published the text of the PCI's 30 December document. The Central Committee's stance is expressed in a few lines and is preceded by an introduction that states that the MSZMP "attaches major importance to the unity of the international communist movement and of all democratic progressive forces."

With regard to this stance, one should note the following new factor: After so many silences, nondisclosures and distortions in connection with the PCI's documents, Hungary is the first Eastern bloc country to publish the PCI directorate's 30 December resolution, albeit in a specialized journal such as NEMZETKOZI SZEMLE and albeit accompanied by TASS' 28 January article and PRAVDA's 13 February article. Despite the delay, it is a step forward that should not be underestimated.

STORTING DEBATES STRAY FOREIGN POLICY STATEMENT

PM211159 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 20 Apr 82 p 5

[Morten Malmo report]

[Text] "The East European countries must show a desire for real disarmament. The so-called NATO duel decision must be maintained," Foreign Minister Svenn Stray said in his statement to the Storting yesterday. "NATO's strategy has preserved peace in Europe," Stray stated, pointing out, "If NATO's nuclear strategy were changed we could easily be lowering the threshold for a conventional war." Stray announced that Norway intends to play an active role during the special UN session on disarmament. The foreign minister's statement did not touch on the situation in Turkey or the Middle East, but he said that he would raise these topics during the Storting foreign affairs debate 6 May.

In his statement to the Storting yesterday Foreign Minister Stray said that Norway will continue the working arrangements it has begun with the EPS -- the EEC nations' political cooperation system. Stray pointed out that it is scarcely possible or suitable at present to achieve more formalized arrangements or any form of observer status. He informed the Storting that the Foreign Ministry's expert capacity is now being expanded so that Norway can make better use of the possibilities for a more active Norwegian European policy through the EPS.

Stray said that it is a misunderstanding to think that the EPS is an alternative to cooperation with the United States. Even though it is important that the EEC nations act in concert, the foreign minister stressed that the foreign policy consultations within EPS must not replace the consultations within the NATO framework.

Labor Party Parliamentary leader Gro Harlem Brundtland said that the foreign minister's statement did not contain any new analyses or new perspectives on Norway's relationship to Europe or to the United States and that Stray was playing down or ignoring certain important questions in this context. She said of Stray's view of Europe and the EPS that the foreign minister was cautious here and he confirmed that the previous government's policy was being followed here and that there are no more "open doors" for Norway in Europe. Of the preparations for the special UN session on disarmament, Brundtland said that the government should attach importance to the conclusions of the Palme Commission which will soon be available.

Center Party Parliamentary leader Johan J. Jakobsen told AFTENPOSTEN that it was useful that Stray stated so clearly that more formalized cooperation with the EPS than Norway has today is not an immediate concern.

Liberal Party Parliamentary leader Hans Hammond Rossbach said that the foreign minister is unwilling to discuss new moves against the nuclear arms buildup, and the Socialist Left Party's Hanna Kvanmo criticized Stray for dismissing the Soviet Union's various moves to halt the deployment of nuclear arms.

However, Jakobsen said that the disagreement surrounding NATO's nuclear strategy is hardly a trump card in the important negotiations in Geneva and supported the foreign minister on this point. Storting Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Kare Kristiansen (Christian People's Party) expressed disappointment that Stray did not discuss the situation in the Middle East.

PYM ADDRESSES COMMONS PRIOR TO DEPARTURE

[Excerpt] Britain's task force could go into action while Falklands peace talks are still in progress, the foreign secretary indicated in the Commons today in a surprise statement. Most MP's had left the chamber after hearing Mr Pym's expected statement explaining the government's position on the eve of his talks in Washington with the U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig.

Towards the end of questions from members, Mr Pym had firmly excluded "military means... so long as negotiations are in play." Other Commons business had started when Mr Pym made a shock reappearance to issue another brief statement.

He said that if he had given a wrong impression, he wanted to make it clear that the thrust of his argument during exchanges with MP's was that "however hard I was trying to achieve a peaceful settlement, the use of force could not at any stage be ruled out. If there was any misunderstanding, I want to clear it up."

Earlier, Mr Pym has cautioned the Commons that his Washington talks would "not be easy." He stressed that Argentine withdrawal from the islands was a prerequisite for any further progress.

The foreign secretary also insisted that it was still the government's intention to restore British administration to the Falkland Islands. He added that if freedom and democracy could not be preserved by peaceful means, "other methods have to be used and MP's have to face that."

My Pym outlined "critical" sticking points which had to be thrashed out in a Falklands settlement. He said any negotiation which was settled satisfactorily had to deal with the nature of any interim administration of the islands, and the arrangements for Argentine withdrawal. It also had to deal with the framework for the negotiations on the long-term solution to the dispute, for which the United Nations had called.

"The latest Argentine proposals, despite Mr Haig's efforts, still fail to satisfy our essential requirements in certain important respects relating to these points," Mr Pym said. They reflected continuing efforts by Argentina to establish by her aggression and her defiance of the UN what could not be established by peaceful means. Her defiance was continued and aggravated by her reinforcement of her invasion force on the Falklands. Those were some of the main issues he would be discussing with Mr Haig, "And I shall of course have some ideas of our own to put forward."

The foreign secretary said latest messages from the Falklands suggested the islanders were still able to leave if they wanted. Another 30 were on their way to Montevideo, he confirmed, although most of those departing did not appear to be permanent residents. The most recent contact with the 15 remaining scientists and wild life photographers on South Georgia through the British Antarctic survey was at 4 pm on Tuesday. "I am happy to report that all were safe and well and in good heart," he said.

When the shadow foreign secretary, Mr Denis Healey, offered Mr Pym his support on his Washington visit Mr Pym told him: "I do not want anybody to be under the misguided impression that this is going to be in any way easy. My journey tomorrow and all the efforts I am making are designed to secure a peaceful settlement. That is what everyone would like to achieve and I will spare no effort in seeking to do that.

"But one cannot be sure about it. I have made quite clear to the British people and this house how difficult it is and just how many awkward problems remain to be resolved. This must mean the contemplation that it may not be successful. We hope desperately it will be."

Mr Healey had paid warm tribute to the United States secretary of state, Mr Alexander Haig. "I cannot recall any representative of any government who has shown the degree of stamina, intellectual, physical and moral, that he has shown," he told MP's.

He called for an assurance that Falklanders would be free to come to Britain without constraints resulting from the recent nationality act. Mr Healey also urged that an eventual settlement should be acceptable not just to the House but to the islanders. "The exceptional support the government has made from the British people, all parties in the House, from the European Community, the Commonwealth and United States, depends critically on your demonstrating continuously your determination to seek a diplomatic solution to this crisis by peaceful means," he said.

He again called for government backing for the proposals for a United Nations administrator in the interim, saying all parties would see this as "preferable" to some form of Argentine involvement in the administration. Referring to the proposals for an interim period, Mr Pym said: "I would not exclude any possibility at this stage." But he added: "There are other issues that are equally important, such as the withdrawal of the Argentine forces and of course sovereignty and the wishes of the islanders."

The home secretary, Mr William Whitelaw, had already guaranteed the free access of any Falklander wishing to settle in Britain. "The issue we are dealing with here is international order -- the basic Charter of the United Nations. Self-determination does form a part of it. It is a very wide issue, not just a matter in this case of the wishes of the islanders." There were associations and issues involving other countries and people all around the world, Mr Pym said.

MINISTRY SAYS ARGENTINE SHIP IN PORT STANLEY

[By Bob Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] An Argentine naval auxiliary vessel is inside Port Stanley harbour in the occupied Falkland Islands, the Defence Ministry confirmed today. "We are treating this auxiliary as hostile, as within the maritime exclusion zone -- on the other hand, we are aware it has not been moved outside the harbour area," said a ministry spokesman.

He stressed that they did not regard the presence of the auxiliary as being in breach of the 200-mile "no-go" zone being enforced around the islands by the Royal Navy. The auxiliary, which sources say is the Bahai Sucesco, entered the harbour before the exclusion zone was announced on April 12 by Defence Secretary Mr John Nott.

"Our previous statement still stands, that we have no authoritative reports that the maritime exclusion zone has been breached," said the spokesman. He confirmed the majority of the Argentine fleet has left port, and added: "In general, they are still believed to be in their own 200-mile operating zone along the Argentine coast."

Other small Argentine vessels reported in the harbour are believed to be two Israeli-built Dabur-class patrol vessels armed with two 20-millimetre Oerlikon rapid fire canon and machine guns.

The spokesman refused to comment on reports that sections of the British task force have broken away and are heading for South Georgia, 800 miles from the Falklands. The Defence Ministry also announced that RAF Harriers being sent to the Falklands are being fitted with Sidewinder air-to-air missiles to boost the task force's air protection.

About 12 Harrier jets are to be shipped out on the requisitioned civilian ship, Atlantic Conveyor, now being fitted out at Devenport. More Sea Harriers of the fleet air arm are also being sent.

The RAF aircraft are to be fitted too with rocket pods for two-inch naval missiles for ground attack. The Sidewinder homes in on aircraft heat emissions. The Sea Harriers are already fitted with it.

SUBMARINE THOUGHT TO BE IN FALKLANDS IN SCOTLAND

LD211744 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1739 GMT 21 Apr 82

[Text] HMS Superb, the nuclear-powered submarine widely thought to have been patrolling the 200 mile no-go area around the Falklands, has been back at her base in Scotland for the past five days, it was disclosed tonight. She arrived at Faslane on the Clyde last Friday and was due to leave in the next few days.

The Defence Ministry refused to say where Superb had been or what naval forces were enforcing the no-go zone. "It is not our policy to discuss the movements of submarines," said a spokesman.

Other nuclear submarines of the Swiftsure class were believed to be enforcing the exclusion zone. Superb was believed to have been the first Royal Navy presence in the South Atlantic since the April 2 invasion.

HERMES SEA HARRIER INTERCEPTS ARGENTINE PLANE

LD220436 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0330 GMT 22 Apr 82

[Text] A long-range Argentine military aircraft was intercepted on a spying mission over Britain's task force in the South Atlantic yesterday. The unarmed Boeing 707 surveillance plane was identified by a Sea Harrier jet fighter which had orders not to shoot.

It was the first contact the British fleet has had with the Argentine forces. The alert came at 11.30 a.m. local time. The klaxon on board the aircraft carrier Hermes sounded action stations, and within minutes the Sea Harrier was airborne with the orders: "Intercept and identify."

The Harrier was armed with heat-seeking Side-winder missiles, but the pilot, Lt Simon Hargreaves, of 800 Squadron, was told not to use them. "The ship gave me the initial heading and then I picked him up on my radar," said Lt Hargreaves, 25, from Bower Hinton, Somerset.

"We were almost touching wingtips. But then he climbed. "I had live Side-winders locked on him. If I had fired, he would have been dead."

The Argentine 707, with white and blue military markings, came within 12 miles of Hermes. The plane is the sole Argentine military 707 and is usually used as a troop-carrier or VIP jet.

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT CONDEMNS ARGENTINE INVASION

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Strasbourg]

[Text] The European Parliament today voted overwhelmingly to condemn the Argentine invasion and back Britain over the Falklands crisis. A resolution calling for the withdrawal of the invasion force, the continuation of trade and arms sanctions against Argentina and a diplomatic solution to the dispute, was accepted by 203 votes to 28, with 10 abstentions.

Attempts by socialists in the Parliament to push through a motion urging the simultaneous withdrawal of Argentine troops and the halting of UK naval operations to enable a peaceful solution to be reached was heavily defeated. Instead Euro-MPs voted in favour of a paragraph in the final text stating that Argentine compliance with the UN Security Council declaration calling for withdrawal of its armed forces "would lead to the halting of the United Kingdom naval operation and so to the negotiation of a peaceful agreement." The difference was considered crucial by British Conservatives, who refused to back any suggestion that Britain should be called upon to stop the task force as a condition of troop withdrawal from the Falklands.

British Labour members were badly split on the issue. Many voted against the final resolution, although they agreed with the unreserved condemnation of the invasion and the expressions of the importance of community solidarity with Britain which it contained. Views of the Parliament on the Falklands crisis will now be passed to governments of the member states and the secretary general of the United Nations.

GOVERNMENT SUBMITS NOTE TO UN SECURITY COUNCIL

PY220518 Buenos Aires TELAM in Spanish 0445 GMT 22 Apr 82

[Text] United Nations, 21 Apr (TELAM) -- It was learned here that Great Britain today submitted another note on its conflict with Argentina over the Falkland Islands to the UN Security Council. A UN Security Council spokesman told TELAM, however, that the subject note has not yet been circulated among the council members and thus its content will not be disclosed until tomorrow.

Argentina, Great Britain and other nations interested in the South Atlantic crisis have sent a number of letters to Kamanda Wa Kamanda, ambassador of Zaire and chairman of the council, since the outset of the crisis to inform him of their governments' position on the crisis.

FORMER NAVY MINISTER ATTACKS FUTURE CUTS

[Desmond Wettern report: "Navy Due To Lose Six of Ships in Task Force"]

[Text] Over a five-year period ending in 1985 thirty-one of the navy's 105 major warships, including the carriers Invincible and Hermes and four other warships among the 15 in the Falklands task force, will have been scrapped or sold. During the same period, 16 new ships will have joined the fleet although one, the Invincible, completed in 1980, is to be handed over to Australia next year.

"The number of ships being scrapped, sold, or laid up from 1980-85 far exceeds the new ships coming into service, by a ratio of nearly two to one," Mr Keith Speed, the former navy minister, said yesterday. By 1990 the position will be even worse, with a further cut of 26 major ships and only 13 due to be completed.

The reason for this is that "existing surface ships like destroyers and frigates, as a deliberate act of policy will no longer be modernised to keep up to date with the developing threat." Mr Speed added: "Thus our present fleet will become increasingly obsolete."

By 1990 the number of destroyers and frigates will have dropped to 32, ten fewer than in 1985, because industry has now been told that orders for the new Type 23 frigates are to be cut from three to two a year. "But we need between three and four to be ordered every year if the 1985 strength of the fleet is to be maintained," Mr Speed said.

He described as "dangerous rubbish" recent suggestions in Parliament and Whitehall that there would be no appreciable cuts in the navy's strength and that the present controversy "is the figment of some retired seadog's imagination."

With the sale of the Invincible to Australia it would be possible to guarantee having only one carrier in service, a cut of 50 per cent. "Much play is being made of ship orders, but the harsh facts are that no destroyers have been ordered for three years, and no more will be ordered this century on present plans, while only two frigates have been ordered in the last three years.

"The next class of frigate (the Type 23) is not yet designed, and there is no prospect of the first one entering service before the end of the 1980's." The number of nuclear-powered Hunter-killer submarines had been cut from 19 to 17, and there was "little confidence that only one dockyard can do the necessary refits of these boats; almost certainly Chatham dockyard is required as well."

Turning to the navy's manpower, Mr Speed said that by 1985 there would be fewer men in the service than for 100 years. The navy in the 1990's would be "ageing, smaller still, without significant new ships, and without the essential shorebased support to maintain and modernise them." Yet virtually every other nation was now building up its navy.

Owen Urges Reassessment

[Text] The need for urgent re-assessment of the government's naval policy and of its defence priorities was put forward by Dr David Owen, Social Democratic spokesman, as a major lesson of the Falklands crisis. He found it "mind-boggling" that the Conservatives, of all parties, should have been reminded so forcibly of the value of sea power. The crisis exposed the "folly" of their reductions in naval strength.

Dr Owen's views are likely to be echoed widely in Conservative ranks as well as among opposition MPs, and the issue seems bound to bring the government under heavy fire from all sides, whatever the outcome in the Falklands.

Dr Owen said that within NATO it was perfectly proper for countries to specialise. "Our history, our tradition, our proven expertise all lie in Britain making a special contribution to sea power," he added.

STUDY PUBLISHED ON U.S. GRAIN AS 'WEAPON'

PM191437 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 19 Apr 82 p 5

[Text] Grain as a weapon has a definite place in the United States' armoury, and the Reagan administration's scepticism about its utility appears unfounded, says a study just published. [The Grain Weapon by Dermot Healey, Centre for Defence Studies, Aberdeen. Centrepieces No 1. Spring 1982]

Aberdeen University's Centre for Defence Studies, run by Mr David Greenwood, has published a comprehensive study on the issue, discussing the conditions under which America can influence Soviet behaviour by controlling grain exports to Russia. Mr Dermot Healey, the author, argues that a certain success has been achieved by implementing a grain linkage-leverage diplomacy. The report concludes that "Grain is a weapon that the Reagan administration would be foolish to ignore."

DETAILS OF DIKO-AKEL MINIMUM COOPERATION PROGRAM

[Text] The content of the minimum program for cooperation between the Democratic Party [DIKO] and AKEL was published today. It is on the basis of this minimum program that the two cooperating parties will conduct their struggle for the election of a president of the republic. Analytically, the program defines the positions and line to be pursued by the cooperating parties for solution of the Cyprus problem, the basic goals of domestic and foreign policy, ways for rapprochement between the two countries and economic and social policy.

In order to supervise implementation of this minimum program, a senior-level committee will be established with participation of representatives from the two cooperating parties. The committee will periodically submit findings, conclusions, observations and recommendations to the president of the republic. The minimum program will constitute the framework and line of the government's policy within which, under instructions from the president of the republic, ministers will carry out their duties for its implementation.

As to solution of the Cyprus issue, the minimum program mentions that the cooperating parties will struggle for a just, peaceful, mutually acceptable and viable solution on the basis of the relevant UN resolutions and decisions and summit agreements. On the solution of the domestic aspect of the Cyprus issue, the cooperating parties proclaim that the process of the intercommunal talks -- within the framework and under the auspices of the United Nations -- are, under current conditions, the most appropriate method, and in case of a deadlock and without renouncing the talks process, the cooperating parties will promote other processes, and -- primarily -- debate the Cyprus issue at the UN General Assembly and Security Council, according to developments.

Within the international aspect, which among other things also provides for withdrawal of all foreign troops and authoritative international guarantees, the cooperating parties will work systematically toward convocation of a special international conference under UN auspices and within UN limits. The basic goals of domestic policy to be pursued by the cooperating parties will be: Establishment of cooperation between the patriotic forces, establishment of democratic order, a purge of state and quasi-state organizations and combating any irregularities within them, and the opening of the Cyprus dossier.

On foreign policy, the minimum program supports continuation and expansion of the nonaligned policy and preservation of the existing close relations and cooperation with the democratic government of Greece. The minimum program, in conclusion, provides for measures which must be adopted for development of the economy, improvement of social benefits and rapprochement with the Turkish Cypriots.

Paper Condemns Alliance

[Editorial: "A Time for Decisions"]

[Text] The most heinous crimes of disruption and division have always been committed in this country in the name of unity. The slogan of the past 20 years has been unity. All the forces of Cyprus were dispersed under its banner. Cyprus itself was partitioned. Once again now, in the name of unity, the communists decisively hold the president and his government prisoners. Now at ease, they plan their final advance toward the full capture of the republic itself. In the name of unity, now all those who do not help the communist plan will be "traitors" or "fascists." This is the start of the final phase of this country's tragedy.

Everyone knows that taking over authority is AKEL's goal. During the past 2 years they have told us to themselves clearly and directly. They use the term "social reformation" in order to present their aim, which is to turn Cyprus into a people's republic. Now they have achieved their short-term goal. This goal is now a fact since AKEL has become part of the government and the virtual regulator of political and civil life in the country. During the past few years the communist party managed to enforce political terror over those who govern. It has managed to keep the opposition divided and weak. Its success is, objectively, of vast significance.

Within the framework of their short-term goals they are now organizing the full undermining of the church as well, and want to destroy it as an element of resistance to their plans. They want to lead the people away from the officials of the church so these officials will one day be left high and dry. Then, utilizing their wellknown communist tactics of slander and abuse, they will be able to render this last bastion useless, the bastion that traditionally has maintained the peoples resistance throughout the ages. The latest attack on the archbishop and the organized whisper campaign against the unity of the church are obviously the results of this communist tactic.

It is clear that one of the conditions to promote President Kiprianou from "impotent" to propagandize him as "potent" was the "alignment" of the state and AKEL against the church. It appears the condition was not only accepted but it is already being observed in action. AKEL and DIKO do not simply undermine the officials of the church; they dispute with them in an illogical and dishonest manner. It is illogical because the church is being attacked for achieving unity within its ranks. It is dishonest because the communists are now utilizing the state in order to undermine the religious force of the lands. The government appeared truly lamentable in its childish and premeditated decision to boycott the archbishop's Easter service, and the appeal to the followers of AKEL to attend the president's Easter appearance in Limassol was inane. Such behaviour can only be described as a demonstration of pettiness and stupidity in an effort to diminish the archbishop's prestige. This is additional proof of the full submission of the Kiprianou government to AKEL's bidding.

AKEL and DIKO, however, are living under delusions. Now the people understand much more than the two parties suspect. The people now that day by day they are being unwillingly placed under AKEL's plans. They are handing over their liberty, democracy and economic life. The people now know that AKEL is exploiting the desire of Kiprianou for power, which leads the country to certain suffering. The new popular front must not succeed in its aims. The people must block the road to final calamity. There is no more time for deliberations. Only a little time is left for making decisions. The time for decisions to prevent new calamities is right now. Tomorrow it may be too late.

AKEL Governing

[From "Our Positions" column: "The Great Leap"]

[Text] The announcement of the AKEL-Democratic Party [DIKO] consortium for cooperation for the purpose of electing Kiprianou president for the next 5 years constitutes a great leap in the country's life. As can be seen from the joint statement by the two parties and from President Kiprianou's statement, it does not concern merely AKEL support for DIKO so it can elect its candidate, but it is an agreement for a two-party government in Cyprus. Through the agreement, DIKO and President Kiprianou have ceded authority to AKEL which; fom now on shoulders responsibility for governing the country.

Following the two parties' decision, AKEL officially enters the government because not only have ministers been appointed who are pro-AKEL, or happened to have its approval, but all ministers have received instructions from the president to proceed with implementation of the new minimum program prepared by AKEL. This is what in fact is happening.

From a simple examination of the minimum program, it appears to include, besides positions commonly and generally accepted, positions that are clearly AKEL's. Consequently, the new elements in the government policy program are the AKEL positions. Thus AKEL essentially is governing the country and is implementing its program without officially having had this right contested or asking the people's approval.

AKEL Reply to Statements

[Text] An AKEL statement issued today on its cooperation with the Democratic Party [DIKO] says the door of cooperation is now open to all democratic parties, except for the extreme right and the Democratic Rally [DISI]. The statement is in reply to yesterday's statements by DISI and EDEK. It says it is not true that the fixed policy of the late President Makarios was diligently to keep the communists out of the government. After his return from London in 1975, the statement says, President Makarios reached the decision to form a political government of all parties, and selected from a list that AKEL had submitted Kostas Partassidhis, a former member of AKEL's Political Bureau. The statement says the cancellation of the formation of a political government is owing to Kliridhis' negative stand.

The statement further says the new Council of Ministers is one of the strongest that has ever been formed, and that the new ministers are persons of known ability. AKEL, the statement adds, has not set any conditions for its cooperation, and naturally it did not ask for and has none of its members in the Council of Ministers. The AKEL statement rejects the socialist EDEK party's view that the two parties' cooperation constitutes a violation of the democratic institutions.

Spokesman Replies to Kliridhis

NC211218 Nicosia PUBLIC INFORMATION OFFICE in Greek 21 Apr 82

[Text] Commenting on yesterday's statement by Democratic Rally [DISI] Chairman Kliridhis on the government reshuffle, the government spokesman made the following statement:

Before the new ministers had time to take over their duties, the Rally, through its chairman, hastened to make unfounded allegations against them. With a little patience the DISI leader could judge the new ministers on the basis of their work instead of proving himself an incorrigible adherent of negation and nihilism. Kliridhis describes the Democratic Party [DIKO]-AKEL cooperation as unholy, while he is fully aware who it is who maintained, and continues to maintian, unholy alliances with those guilty of the tragedy of Cyprus. Even today it is others who go after such unholy alliances. Kliridhis resorts to dangermongering and once again takes up his usual anticommunist ravings in his statment which, unfortunately for him, only brings to mind some of the slogans of the protagonists of today's sinister anniversary [establishment of Greek junta]. As usual, he again brandishes the communist scarecrow in the very same way the protagonists of the 7-year period used to do. The people, however, know that neither the president of the republic nor any other member of the Ministerial Council were proposed by the communists.

Instead of resorting to such dangermongering, he ought to study the program and goals of the cooperation, and if he has any good faith he will conclude that this is a policy which serves fully and in an excellent way the self-evident interests of all levels of the population. If Kliridhis is unable to come to such a conclusion, we have absolutely no doubt that the greatest majority of the people will be in a position to do so. The truth is that the DIKO-AKEL cooperation raises an obstacle to the plans of the reaction forces and lays the foundation and strengthens democratic processes which others have tried to overthrow.

The reshuffle was undertaken with the more general interests of the people in mind and the members of the Ministerial Council are personalities of known value, who are inspired by a desire to serve their fatherland, while Kliridhis' change means nothing more than backtracking and a possible undermining of the democratic institutions. As to his joining and withdrawal from the National Council, this truly reminds us of theatrics and proves the lack of sincerity with which he treats the national issue by placing petty party aspirations above all else. For a long time now, however, the people stopped being impressed by melodramatic moves which are only aimed to serve the various expediencies of the DISI chairman. At these critical moments the people demand from those who claim their vote a high sense of responsibility in handling the peoples fate.

Democratic Party Statement

[Text] In reply to a statement made yesterday by Kliridhis, chairman of the Democratic Rally, the Democratic Party states that instead of dealing with the content and the positions of the joint declaration of the two cooperating parties, Kliridhis prefers to make abusive attacks against his opponents. A Democratic Party announcement says Kliridhis is not telling the truth when he says Kiprianou is being promoted by the communists, because Kiprianou's initiative in contesting the coming presidential election was not personal nor the affair of any party, but the exclusive affair of the Democratic Party, which decided and unanimously suggested Kiprianou's candidacy.

The Democratic Party announcement says Kliridhis has alleged arbitrarily that as a result of the cooperation between the two parties, the Democratic Party is absolutely dependent on AKEL. The announcement stresses that neither the Democratic Party nor AKEL have lost their party identities and independence. Quite simply, two independent and self-sustained parties, after assessing and appreciating the current situation, decided that cooperation was imperative. Maintaining their party identity, the statement adds, they have sought and noted points of contact and identity of goals, and for the sake of the general national and social interest have reached an agreement and a minimum program that they will jointly promote.

In conection with Kliridhis' statement on differences in the Democratic Party, the statement says the Democratic Party is now united and firm in its decisions and aims as never before.

DISI on Government Statement

[Text] The Democratic Rally [DISI] Political Committee has issued a statement in reply to today's government spokesman's statement which called on Kliridhis to show some patience before judging the deeds of the new government ministers. The DISI says there is no reason whatever for patience or waiting because, it says, it is evident that the work these people have undertaken is nothing other than gradually turning Cyprus to communism. The DISI statement says that since yesterday the president of the republic and DIKO Chairman Kiprianou has been an official candidate of AKEL for the presidency and that he speaks about concessions to the demands of the AKEL leadership and the appointing of communists and those dependent on the communist leadership as ministers.

With regard to the issue of the National Council, the statement says DISI has no intention whatever of participating in an organ that, during the presidency of Kiprianou, never operated substantively and that from now on will be used exclusively to promote AKEL's policy. In conclusion, the statement reiterates that DISI will engage unyieldingly in a struggle to stop Kiprianou from being reelected president of the state.

DENKTAS: KIPRIANOU'S NEW GOVERNMENT ILLEGITIMATE

TA212108 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 21 Apr 82

[Excerpts] President Rauf Denktas has said that Kiprianou's new government is not the legitimate government of Cyprus because the appointments and claims to be a government are not based on any constitution. Replying to questions on Kiprianou's new government, Denktas explained that the Greek Cypriots had usurped the government of Cyprus and that Kiprianou was misrepresenting the situation. Denktas stressed that any sensible and impartial person could see that Kiprianou's government was not the legitimate government of Cyprus.

Denktas said: There are two governments in Cyprus today: the Turkish Cypriot government in the north and the Greek Cypriot government in the south. Until a partnership agreement is signed once again between these two equal administrations and between these two equal peoples, that is how the situation will be.

[Excerpt] The foreign minister of the Socialist Republic of Czechoslovakia, Mr Chnoupek, arrived in Cyprus this morning on a 4-day official visit at the invitation of Foreign Minister Rolandhis. Welcoming his Czechoslovak counterpart at Larnaca Airport, Rolandhis stressed the friendly bonds which for many years have linked Cyprus with Czechoslovakia. He expressed thanks for Czechoslovakia's continuing and courageous support of the Cypriot people's struggle for vindication. In reply, the Czechoslovak foreign minister said his country nurtures feelings of friendship and respect for Cyprus, for its struggles, for freedom and for its dedication to peace and cooperation among peoples.

OZAL URGES FURTHER ISLAMIC ECONOMIC COOPERATION

[Text] State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal has called on the Islamic countries to increase economic cooperation among themselves. In a speech prior to the Turkish-Libyan talks that began in Ankara today, Ozal stressed the mistake of the Arab countries, especially those producing oil, in emphasizing luxury investments. He added that considering past experiences, the Islamic countries must develop economic relations among themselves. He pointed out that instead of buying from the West, the Islamic countries must try to buy many items from one another.

Ozal noted that Turkish-Libyan relations had shown important developments during the past 1 and 1/2 years, adding that the volume of reciprocal trade exceeds $1 billion. He explained that Turkish businessmen had assumed business totaling about $8 billion in Libya and that there were 80,000 Turkish workers employed in that country. Ozal said all this is beneficial to the economies of both countries.

Turgut Ozal stated that relations between Turkey and other Islamic countries had shown important developments during the past years, adding that this was possible because of the realistic policies pursued by the government and because of the support extended by Turkey. Ozal said Turkey was ready to help Libya in agriculture.

In a speech, Libyan Agriculture Minister Abu-Zayd 'Umar Durdah said his country supports Turkey's efforts to develop economic cooperation with the Middle Eastern and other Arab countries. He added that Libya believes all Islamic countries should cooperate economically. Durdah said trade had been stressed in relations between Turkey and Libya -- relations which are becoming increasingly deep-rooted -- and added that now they want to venture into joint production.

Following the speeches, the official talks began. After the talks Durdah called on Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen.

VICE CHANCELLOR COMMENTS ON MOSCOW VISIT

AU232026 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1600 GMT 23 Apr 82

[Otto Hoermann interview with Austrian Vice Chancellor Fred Sinowatz in Moscow, 23 April -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Vice Chancellor, what is your assessment of Austrian-Soviet relations after your talks in Moscow?

[Answer] We -- Austria and the Soviet Union -- have completely different political systems and economic foundations. But the talks which we have been able to conduct here in these 2 days have certainly consolidated the past policy line of establishing a good relationship with the Soviet Union, not only generally, politically, but also with respect to cultural policy projects and specifically in an economic respect.

[Question] What specific results are you bringing with you since we have mentioned the economy and culture?

[Answer] We discussed cultural policy problems with Minister Demichev. To me personally it appears to be very meaningful that culture and the economy constituted the basis for talks. We primarily visualized exchanges in the field of theatrical and musical ensembles. These talks will bear fruit very soon. In the economic field we were able to conduct very useful talks with Premier Tikhonov and with the Soviet foreign trade minister. We have a very high trade deficit with the Soviet Union. We were told quite unambiguously that the Soviet side is also interested in reducing this trade deficit, and this will be done as early as in the next few years. There exists a series of interesting projects which were discussed very specifically today, and we have received the assurance of our Soviet partners that these projects will not only be examined but that very concrete results will be available in the next few months.

[Question] Mr Vice Chancellor, here is a domestic policy question: Is it possible to say that your visit to Moscow is, so to speak, the first visit to the Eastern state treaty partner?

[Answer] No. First, I have been to the Soviet Union earlier in my capacity as education minister, and second, it is important to define time and again these good relations. I have said this already, in the economic respect, in the cultural-policy respect, but also with a view to very interesting projects involving cooperation in the scientific-technical field. I would roughly formulate this as follows: This visit is extremely favorable for the continuation of these relations, and primarily, as I said earlier, that these economic relations will be intensified.

[Question] But the visit to Moscow had no connection -- or very little connection -- with your political future?

[Answer] I know what you are driving at. I am being asked everywhere in Austria in this connection. I can assure you that this visit had been planned for some time. Naturally, I came here as the vice chancellor but whatever happens is carried out, so to speak, in keeping with the policy of this federal government.

THAI PREMIER HOLDS TALKS WITH EC COMMISSION

[Text] Brussels, 23 Apr (AFP) -- Thai Premier Prem Tinsulanon's economic talks here ended today following a long conversation with the European Community's executive commission. General Prem is on a 10-day European tour aimed at promoting Thailand's economy. He is scheduled to leave for Vienna tomorrow prior to visits in London and Paris. Two days after the visit here of Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach, the political talks also conducted by the premier centered on the Cambodian question.

Gaston Thorn, the president of the Executive Commission, expressed gratification at the convergence of views of the European Community with those of ASEAN, the Association of Southeast Asian Nations of which Thailand is a member, on Afghanistan and Cambodia. Both groupings condemn outside interference in these countries. In a conversation with Belgian Premier Wilfrid Martens, General Prem was assured that Belgium will extend no aid to Vietnam as long as its forces have not left Cambodia.

In the course of his economic talks with the Commission, the general, who was accompanied by a high-powered delegation, asked for a revision of the 1980 agreement between Thailand and the European Community on a 5 million ton ceiling on Thai manioc exports to Europe in 1981 and 1982. Thailand would like to postpone the imposition of a gradually lowered ceiling for the years to come. The Commission declared readiness for greater suppleness but pointed to its own problems of agricultural surpluses and proposed its help in a diversification of Thai farm production. Any agreement on these points, however, it recalled, would require prior approval by the Community's ministerial council.

The Thai businessmen accompanying the premier on his European tour meanwhile conferred today with the Belgian Office for External Trade. They suggested greater European investment in their country, bringing up several specific agro-industrial projects and mining possibilities, notably as far as zinc was concerned. They also mentioned the needed infrastructure for the extraction of natural gas from the Gulf of Thailand. At the end of 1980, they (?noted), investments by the 10 Community countries amounted to only 39 million dollars, or a mere 12 percent of all foreign investments in Thailand.

SCHMIDT CITES U.S., USSR VIEWS OF CONFERENCE

[Excerpts] Bonn, 23 Apr (DPA) -- On Friday Chancellor Helmut Schmidt described the discussions about the cabinet reshuffle as "rumor-mongering." Speaking on the ARD television program Bericht Aus Bonn, the chancellor said he did not want to participate in this, but to stick to what the basic law prescribes.

Referring to the resolutions on security policy [passed at the SPD conference] Schmidt said that Washington would view this party conference as providing the desired clarification, because the government's statements were supported by a very large majority of the dominant governing party. In the chancellor's view, Soviet observers will have recognized the seriousness with which the greater part of the SPD supports disarmament. Nor will Moscow overlook the repeated emphasis with which he had spoken of the need "to negotiate with each other" not only about medium-range weapons, but also in other areas, "and not to wage economic war against each other, but to cooperate if possible."

NATO'S LUNS VIEWS SPD CONGRESS, PEACE MOVEMENT

[Text] Bad Salzuflen, 24 Apr (DPA) -- NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns has emphatically welcomed the SPD's adherence to the NATO dual decision at its party congress in Munich. Speaking today to journalists in Bad Salzuflen (Northrhine-Westphalia), Luns said: "The alliance followed the German Social Democrats' congress with great satisfaction. It is pleased that Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's security policy was affirmed and that SPD chief Willy Brandt too had defended the Federal Government's course."

With reference to the fact that the Federal Republic is, after the United States, the most important part of the Atlantic defense community, Luns confirmed the view that NATO's modernized weapons' arsenal serves the preservation of peace. The credibility of these weapons has been restored by the NATO dual decision. This decision has deterred the Soviets from using their so-called tactical SS-20 nuclear missiles which are, however, really strategic weapons. Luns was speaking at a public meeting of the Society for Defense [Gesellschaft fuer Wehrkunde] which was protected by 100 policemen from protesters. He said that the peace movement is being closely followed by the alliance, and it is giving rise to concern. The great majority of the pacifists, it is true, act in good faith, but they are not aware of playing the same game as Moscow and of putting forward the same arguments as the Soviets.

Luns said that the U.S. Government's greater defense efforts are "for promoting peace" since they increase the Soviets' fear of the alliance. The withdrawal of British troops from Europe in the direction of the Falkland Islands does not mean a weakening of the allies in Europe, especially as the "well-drilled British Rhine Army is not involved in the South Atlantic.

APEL VIEWS SOVIET 'LACK OF FLEXIBILITY'

[Text] Bonn, 25 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel (SPD) has expressed concern about the future of the arms control negotiations in view of the lack of flexibility he finds in the Soviet attitude.

"Has there any move there yet?", he was asked on Sunday on Deutschlandfunk Radio and replied, "I see, rather, tactical movements, but none in content, and this worries me." The minister strongly advocated an early start to the American-Soviet negotiations on limiting intercontinental strategic nuclear weapons (START). If they do not begin, the Geneva negotiations on medium-range weapons could run into difficulties. Apel appeared optimistic that the United States will open the START negotiations very soon and is not linking them with unrelated preconditions. He was alluding here to the announcement by President Ronald Reagan on making the beginning dependent on the international situation.

Apel sees the recent proposal by American politicians, including former Defense Secretary Robert McNamara, to renounce the possibility of a nuclear first-strike in the event of conflict as problematic, especially for Europeans. Apel's view is that in such a case a war in Central Europe would again be conceivable without the existence of the United States or the Soviet Union being directly affected.

Regarding the decision by the SPD party congress in favor of the Federal Government's security policy following the past months of wrangling over the NATO dual decision, Apel said he hopes that "discipline in the matter of majority decisions" will now be exercised in SPD ranks. The party congress decisions must now remain in force for at least 12 months. Anyone with a different attitude is seriously responsible not only for the future of the SPD but also for democracy.

SCHMIDT SENDS MESSAGE TO EGYPT ON SINAI RETURN

NC251808 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1610 GMT 25 Apr 82

[Text] Cairo, 25 Apr (MENA) -- Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali has received the statement that was issued today by FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on the occasion of the Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai. The statement, which FRG Ambassador in Cairo Kurt Mueller delivered to 'Ali during a meeting today, said that Egypt and Israel have opened a new page following a 30-year enmity. In the statement Schmidt expressed his appreciation and esteem for the Egyptian people who extended their hand to peace, having acquired elevated feelings through four wars. The following is the text of the statement:

Israel today completed its withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula. Thus, the Israelis and Egyptians turn over a new leaf in their long history after 30 years of enmity and wars. We, the Germans, together with all the friends of both peoples hope that this withdrawal will constitute the beginning of a permanent peace, security and cooperation.

Both peoples have made arduous efforts, sacrifices and concessions to attain this goal with the effective help of the United States. These efforts and sacrifices can be considered to have yielded the desired fruit if the Sinai Peninsula becomes a bridge in the form that the senior leaders, politicians and men of religion in both countries imagine.

I would like to express my kind feelings and esteem for the Israeli people who have proven through their difficult struggle for survival that they are far-sighted and desirous of peace. I harbor the same kind feelings and esteem for the Egyptian people who managed through their greatness to extend their hands to peace after four wars.

I would like also to express my appreciation for the brave leaders of Egypt and Israel who made peace possible. They have worked to achieve peace despite all resistance inside and outside their countries. I point here in particular to my friend As-Sadat, who exposed his life to danger and was assassinated.

Peace between Egypt and Israel has overcome the barrier of hatred, violence and non-confidence. Peace proved what can be achieved through negotiations between the parties concerned. It is the first big and indispensible step on the path to a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the entire area.

NUCLEAR AID TO ARGENTINA TO BE ADDRESSED

[Text] Bonn, 24 Apr (DPA) -- The Federal Government will comment in the Bundestag on nuclear cooperation with Argentina and once again clearly reject the charges made in a British BBC television film that the Federal Republic assisted that country in developing a nuclear bomb. Questioned by DPA, a Research Ministry spokesman confirmed today in Bonn that this will be in a comprehensive government reply to parliamentary questions.

SPD Deputy Klaus Thuesing was the first to ask the Federal Government for information on what it has done so far to reject the statements in the controversial television film, and since then notice has been given of furtther questions from coalition deputies, and also from parliamentarians of the CDU/CSU opposition. It was reported that when this topic is dealt with in one of the Bundestag's next question hours -- possibly next week -- emphasis will be placed on the consensus of all Parliamentary Groups and the government that the Federal Republic's conscience is absolutely clear concerning cooperation with Argentina in the peaceful use of nuclear energy.

GoverNment Spokesman Lothar Ruehl, in connection with the screening of the television film, has already repeatedly rejected the claims made in it that Bonn at least indirectly aided development work on an Argentine nuclear bomb and as a result of inadequate surviellance contributed to Buenos Aires soon being able to sell plutonium for the manufacture of nuclear weapons to other states. He pointed out that in its safety requirements the Federal Government adheres strictly to the agreements of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna.

LAMBSDORFF ADDRESSES ARGENTINE TRADE OFFICIALS

[Text] Bonn, 26 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff underlined on Monday in a speech to Argentine trade representatives that the use of force in establishing legal claims in the Falkland conflict is unacceptable to the FRG under any circumstances. With this statement the minister was replying to reproaches that the Argentine Government is disappointed at the German stance in the British-Argentine conflict over the Falkland Islands.

The representatives of the Argentine Chamber of Trade and Industry now visiting the FRG expressed concern that the joint European trade sanctions could cause permanent damage to trade relations between their country and the FRG. Lambsdorff regretted that the traditionally good and friendly German-Argentine relations had suffered through the Falklands conflict and at the same time expressed the hope that the crisis would be settled soon.

EXPELLED SYRIAN DIPLOMAT LEAVES FOR DAMASCUS

[Excerpts] The Rue Marbeuf attack is still at the center of the news this morning. Francois Mitterrand has just gathered a small council of war at the Elysee. Around him were Gaston Defferre, acting prime minister during Pierre Mauroy's absence, and officials in charge of French security, also represented by Interior Minister Gaston Defferre. He was interviewed by one of our special correspondents when leaving the Elysee presidential palace:

[Begin recording] [Defferre] The president of the republic gathered around himself some sort of council of war. In future, we shall hold daily meetings [words indistinct] to face up to this situation because the French Government intends to do everything necessary, everything in its power, to put an end to international terrorism in our territory.

[Question] Who was present?

[Answer] There was (Pierre Marion) of the SDECE [Foreign Intelligence and Counterintelligence Service], General Saunier from the presidency of the republic, (Maurice Grimaud), my director of the cabinet, (Marcel Chalet), director of the DST [Directorate of Territorial Surveillance], and myself. [end recording]

This morning one of the two expelled Syrian diplomats left Paris on a direct flight to Damascus. The second diplomat will leave France shortly, sources at the Syrian Embassy in Paris said today.

GOVERNMENT ADOPTS ACTION PLAN AGAINST TERRORISM

LD231234 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 23 Apr 82

[Text] France is to have a plan of action to fight terrorism. At the end of a council of war this morning with the president of the republic, Minister of the Interior Gaston Defferre announced the birth of such a plan. The main lines will be: Reinforcing border checks; increased vigilance when issuing entry visas for France; thorough examination of the situation of foreigners enjoying political asylum in our country -- without, however, going back on the principle of: France -- land of asylum. Defferre said it is important to do everything so that French blood should not be shed in the national territory.

Francois Mitterrand himself asked that he should be kept informed through daily reports on the implementation of this plan of action.

L'HUMANITE CARRIES PCF-CUBAN COMMUNIQUE

PM220831 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 13 Apr 82 p 8

["Full text" of joint PCF-Communist Party of Cuba statement issued in Havana on 12 April]

[Text] PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais and Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz visited Cuba at the invitation of Fidel Castro, first secretary of the Communist Party of Cuba [PCC]. On that occasion the leaders of the two parties exchanged detailed information on the situation in their respective countries and in the international sphere. People's action for real independence, development and peace, to which Fidel Castro and Georges Marchais attach particular importance, was the focal point of their talks, which took place in a warm and fraternal atmosphere.

Active Solidarity

First Georges Marchais reaffirmed to Fidel Castro the French Communists' deep feelings of solidarity with and friendship toward socialist Cuba in face of the U.S. administration's increased hostility. He welcomed the successes which the PCC and Cuba's people are achieving in building a socialist society.

The PCF secretary general informed Fidel Castro of the new situation which has been created in France with the left's victory. He reported on the PCF's action as a party of struggle and as a government party. In that context the party is sparing no effort in the government, the National Assembly and the country to ensure that the choices made by the majority of French people and the necessary changes are implemented. With its 24th congress the PCF took as a central part of its action the development of democracy carried through to the end, to democratic and self-managing socialism, as an answer to the crisis in French society.

Fidel Castro informed Georges Marchais of the Cuban people's and PCC's gratitude to the PCF for its active solidarity with the Cuban revolution and for its tireless action to promote friendship between France and Cuba. He welcomed the political changes which have come about in France and, in that context, he stressed the important role which the PCF has played and is playing in French political life. He reported on the situation in Cuba and on the implementation of the decisions taken by the second PCC congress in December 1980.

North American Interference

Georges Marchais and Fidel Castro spent a long time discussing developments in the international situation and primarily in the Latin American and Caribbean region. They condemned the U.S. administration's aggressive policy, its increased hostility, its economic pressures, its propaganda based on lies and its threats of aggression against Cuba. With its campaign of slander imperialism is trying to isolate Cuba and distract the attention of world public opinion from its constant interference in the lives of peoples.

It is not the alleged Cuban intervention or any shady international subversive action which is behind the heroic struggle in Central America. The roots of that rebellion can be found in the pitiless systems of exploitation and oppression, in the brutality of the regimes imposed on those countries by American imperialism, with its avowed disdain of basic human rights. The spirit of struggle and resistance and aspirations to freedom characterized the people's action in that region long before the triumph of the Cuban revolution.

It is the Reagan administration which is prolonging the war in El Salvador and the martyrdom of its people by its political and economic support and its multifaceted aid. It refuses to promise publicly not to intervene militarily in Nicaragua or to end its actions to destabilize that country and also the progressive Grenada government.

The truth is that the most powerful imperialist country in the world cannot tolerate the example set by the undoubted success which Cuba is achieving in building socialism, which guarantees its people and youth progress, dignity and freedom. The lucid analysis of the record of the situation in Cuba made by the second PCC congress in December 1980 bears witness to the considerable progress already made.

The great scourges which affect hundreds of millions of men, women and children in the countries in Latin America and the world which are still suffering imperialist exploitation and domination have already been overcome in Cuba. By constantly and more effectively focusing socialist development on meeting human needs, the PCC and the Cuban people are making major social, economic, cultural and democratic progress despite the difficulties.

Cuba's success, its constant action for peace and development, its solidarity with the peoples of Latin America and the world who are struggling against imperialism and reaction and for progress and democracy, confer growing prestige and respect on it. It is really all that which is leading American imperialism to step up its aggressive attitude to socialist Cuba.

National and Social Liberation Struggles

Georges Marchais and Fidel Castro stressed that the aggressive attitude to Cuba and the Central American and Caribbean peoples is part of an imperialist counteroffensive on a world scale aimed at curbing the advance of the process of peoples' national and social liberation.

Nonetheless, imperialism's language and attitude do not frighten those who are fighting for their freedom and independence and for justice and progress. Their determination is reflected especially in the massive mobilization of their peoples, as in Cuba and Nicaragua, to face the threats of intervention. It is reflected in the Salvadoran people's struggle under the leadership of the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front and the Democratic Revolutionary Front. It is reflected in the struggle being waged despite terrible repression, by the Guatemalan people and their organizations grouped within the Guatemalan National Revolutionary Union.

In an extremely complex international situation, the French-Mexican declaration and the peace proposals drawn up by Mexico and Nicaragua are positive contributions to restoring peace, justice and freedom in Central America. They have been supported by Cuba, which has several times declared its desire to contribute to a political solution to the conflict in Central America.

Moreover that aggressive attitude by the American administration is encountering international condemnation, even in some U.S. circles, and facing a vast movement of solidarity developing in the world with the Latin American and Caribbean peoples. Times have changed, and it is not in its power to halt the peoples' national and social liberation struggle.

Georges Marchais reitereated his support for the Cuban people, their desire to defend their revolution and independence, unconditionally recover their territory of Guantanamo, illegally occupied by the United States, and their demand for an end to the blockade imposed more than 20 years ago and which imperialism is now trying to strengthen. He reaffirmed the French Communists' active support for Nicaragua and Grenada, for the Salvadoran and Guatemalan peoples and those peoples in this region who are struggling against imperialism for their final liberation.

Battles for Development and Peace

Georges Marchais and Fidel Castro paid particular attention to the struggle for development, peace and disarmament, whose close link they stressed. They expressed the view that until the tragic situation of poverty, famine, sickness and ignorance affecting the vast majority of mankind is overcome, progress along the path of effective and lasting peace will be limited.

In the statement they made on 3 January 1980 Georges Marchais and Fidel Castro had highlighted the importance and urgency of stepping up battles for those objectives. The fate of millions of human beings who, without taking part in any armed conflict, die each year from hunger, poverty and endemic diseases depends on the battle for development. Mankind's future depends on the battle for peace at a time when imperialism is playing dangerously at war.

Despite the ideological efforts made by imperialism, there is a growing awareness that peoples and all nations have a common interest in the establishment of a new type of development, a new international order based on justice, equality, sovereignty, and mutually advantageous cooperation in a world of peace and security.

However, the policy of hostility, the economic aggressions, the threatening atmosphere, the encouragement of subversion and attempts to negotiate from positions of strength cannot form the basis for the constructive dialogue which the world needs. The Nonaligned Movement, of which Fidel Castro is chairman, plays an important and positive role in that decisive action for mankind.

Georges Marchais and Fidel Castro condemned the U.S. leaders' opposition and maneuvers to hinder the international community's demand for global negotiations in the United Nations as one of the possible ways of approaching the pressing problems of development.

The Arms Race

In view of mankind's present needs, the vast sums swallowed up in the arms race are a monstrous waste, an insult to the men and women suffering from hunger and from material and intellectual poverty in the world, a challenge to the progress of peoples.

The arms race revived by American imperialism and NATO is posing a great threat to mankind. That aggressive and dangerous policy pursued by the American administration which in particular inspired NATO's decision to deploy new nuclear missiles in Europe, and the decision to manufacture the neutron bomb is encountering opposition from a large people's movement which is gaining strength. The expression of international public opinion is a major form of hope and action. Never before has such a broad people's movement been formed, particularly in Europe. In very many countries various politicial, trade union and religious forces and many movements and organizations have taken up that fight for peace and disarmament.

The peoples' demand has made a major contribution to forcing the American administration to agree to start the negotiations it was shunning. It is vital to strengthen that movement if the negotiations which have been started are to lead to a halt in the nuclear escalation and the balanced reduction of American and Soviet nuclear armaments.

Georges Marchais and Fidel Castro paid tribute to the peoples' struggle for a new world economic and political order and for disarmament and welcomed the convergence which is emerging between the peoples of the developing countries and those of the capitalist countires in struggles.

Georges Marchais and Fidel Castro reaffirmed their intention to take action to strengthen relations of friendship and cooperation between France and Cuba. The furthering of French-Cuban cooperation and exchanges in the economic, political, culture and scientific spheres on the basis of mutual respect, sovereignty and reciprocal advantage is in keeping with the interests of the two peoples and the two countries. In the framework of the new situation and of the possibilities stemming from it, the PCF will continue to take determined action in that direction.

Georges Marchais and Fidel Castro expressed satisifaction at the quality of the ties of friendship and solidarity which unite their parties. Since their meeting on 3 January 1980 those relations have been further strengthened on the basis of their profound convergence of views. They have decided to work for new progress in that fraternal cooperation between the PCC and the PCF. Thus they intend to increase their contribution to the peoples' struggle for peace, democracy, national liberation and socialism.

PCF FLOOR LEADER CRITICAL OF TAX CUT PLAN

After recalling that the Communists supported a change in labor tax reducing the burdens on labor-intensive small and medium-sized enterprises, the Central Committee secretary continued: "When we are told that there is going to be an Frll billion reduction in labor tax, in other words the only tax on capital at present, the question which we ask is the following: Who is going to pay? There is talk of increasing VAT [value added tax]. Even if it is changed, VAT will be paid by the workers. Now, that indirect tax is the most unfair since it makes people pay without taking account of their incomes.

"It is clear that the measures announced," Lajoinie said in reply to a journalist asking about a "halt," "are a postponement of the decisions taken. Moreover, exoneration from labor tax compensated for by VAT is a different measure. The figures for the recent period were cited: Profits were up. There are 500 billion [Presumably French francs] in Switzerland, 60 billion of which have gone there since 10 May. Under the previous government tens of billions were given to the capitalists without any guarantee being obtained that they would be invested. We did not approve of those measures. We now have evidence and figures to show that that capital was not invested. Guarantees must be obtained on the use of public money."

Another journalist spoke of "a rather gloomy spring." "There are indeed some worrying measures," Lajoinie said. "It is not by concessions to and compromises with the employers and the right that we will make progress. We communists have more advanced proposals. We agreed to participate in the government in a context which is not ideal, since the French people did not give us the majority, because we still think that it is possible to make progress. But the measures which I have just recalled, especially the handouts to the employers, are no way to overcome the crisis."

What will the Communists do, another journalists asked. "They will give their opinion when those decisions are put to the cabinet," Lajoinie replied. "But I must recall, and it is no secret, that there are only 4 Communist ministers out of 40."

Lajoinie recalled the Communists' constructive action on problems like workers' rights, "but there are also remarks and criticisms which must be expressed." After recalling the Communists' position on radio and television, Lajoinie expressed the view that it would be better for questions such as security and the freedom issue to be discussed in the cabinet first. "I do not think that differing statements give a coherent image of the government's action."

VERSAILLES SUMMIT TO OFFER 'INNOVATIONS'

[Text] The summit meeting of seven heads of state to be held in Versailles in 6 weeks' time will differ from previous meetings because of two innovations: A report presented by Mr Mitterrand, and a greater flexibility in the agenda and the discussions.

According to a well-informed source Mr Mitterrand will open the summit with an initial report comprising specific proposals on ways of overcoming the economic crisis. He will strive to define the long-term stakes of this crisis by stressing the role of new technologies and the problems of training people and of employment.

At the same time, he will link short-term problems (monetary instability, trade imbalances, excessively high interest rates, fixing raw material prices, North-South relations) with this consideration of an all-embracing strategy.

In addition, according to the same source, the advisers to the heads of state who are responsible for preparing the summit are trying to "debureaucratize" it. Unlike the previous seven meetings, the joint communique will not be mainly written in advance and will therefore not form a basis for discussion.

GOVERNMENT STATEMENT PRAISES SINAI RETURN

AU251855 Rome ANSA in English 1844 GMT 25 Apr 82

[Text] Rome, 25 Apr (ANSA) -- The Italian Government reconfirmed the desire of all Europe to "further the strengthening of a climate of confidence and greater understanding between the Arabs and Israel" in a comment released here by Premier Giovanni Spadolini's office on the completion of the Israeli evacuation of the Sinai today.

The note insisted that this climate must be "based on the right to existence and security of all the states in the region, beginning with Israel, and on justice for all peoples.

"This implies," the statement continued, "recognition of the rights of the Palestinians through a process of gradual self-determination."

Italy, one of the four European nations participating in the multilateral peacekeeping force in the Sinai, noted that the Israeli withdrawal from the occupied peninsula marks "an important historical step reached by the Israeli and Egyptian Governments thanks also to the farsightedness and courageous work for peace generously undertaken by (the late Egyptian) President Anwar as-Sadat."

Referring in more general terms to the Arab-Israeli conflict, the note reiterated the Rome government appeal "to all the sides involved to not provoke new violations of the ceasefire and to show greater responsibility and moderation to guarantee the continuation of the ceasefire in southern Lebanon."

FOREIGN MINISTER REPEATS APPEAL ON FALKLANDS

LD252230 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2200 GMT 25 Apr 82

[Text] Following confirmation by the British Ministry of Defense on the recapture of South Georgia, a statement was issued in Rome by Minister of Foreign Affairs Emilio Colombo.

The news of a landing of British troops on islands in the South Atlantic, said Colombo, requires us to reiterate an urgent appeal not to arrive at a generalized and bloody clash. European solidarity with Great Britain following the military intervention in the Falklands-Malvinas Islands, which was condemned by the UN Security Council, as well as the intense links that bind us with the Argentine people, make us insist that the road of negotiations be followed, as traced out by the commitment taken by the U.S. Secretary of State Haig.

L'UNITA JOURNALIST RELEASED FROM DETENTION

[Excerpt] Rome, 24 Apr (ANSA) -- A Rome magistrate today conditionally released the staffer on the Communist Party daily, L'UNITA, arrested in Naples March 20 in connection with her story based on a false document alleging that two Christian Democrat members of government sought the mediation of a Naples crime boss in a bid to free a Christian Democrat kidnap hostage held by Red Brigade terrorists.

According to the phoney document, thought to be a genuine Interior Ministry communique at the time it ran on the front page of the Communist paper, the two members of government asked an imprisoned camorra (the Naples version of the mafia) boss to intercede for the liberation of Ciro Cirillo, a regional assemblyman from Naples who was subsequently freed following payment of a huge ransom.

The L'UNITA staffer, Marina Maresca, was arrested for failure to disclose her source. In questioning later, she identified the man who gave her the false document as Luigi Rotondi. Rotondi turned himself in to police and he and Maresca were then charged with libel and the publication of false news. Rotondi has reportedly confessed to his role of fabricating the document on which Maresca's story for the Communist paper was based.

AEROFLOT OFFICIALS TO BE EXPELLED FOR ESPIONAGE

[Text] Two Soviet citizens will shortly be expelled from Spain for alleged espionage activities, according to confirmation we have received from completely reliable sources. Our news team has learned that the suspected spies are not diplomatic officials at the Soviet Embassy in Spain, but it does seem that they are linked to the Soviet airline Aeroflot.

Since the reestablishement of diplomatic relations between Madrid and Moscow in (?February) 1977, eight Soviet officials or diplomats have been expelled from Spain after being accused of spying.

Details Reported

LD231354 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1230 GMT 23 Apr 82

[Text] The Spanish Government is considering the expulsion of two Soviet spies who work here under the guise of employees of the Soviet airline Aeroflot. The two are members of the military, one of them a captain, who belong to the Soviet Army's espionage service, according to the Spanish counterespionage services. While one of them was studying the level of acceptance of Spain's entry into NATO among Spanish officers and had contacts with the air force, the other directed his efforts toward the companies supplying electronic equipment to the army both in the security and communications field.

The expulsion of these two Soviet spies now awaits a decision from the prime minister.

NICARAGUAN ARRIVES; SEEKS SUPPORT FOR PLAN

LD252150 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1930 GMT 25 Apr 82

[Text] At this time when talks between the United States and Nicaragua, via Mexico, for a nonbelligerency agreement are stalled, a delegation led by Sergio Ramirez, who is the ranking head of state in the Nicaraguan ruling junta, has arrived in Madrid. They are here to seek Spanish support for Mexico's peace and nonaggression proposals for Central America, particularly Nicaragua. This was what Mr Ramirez said when he arrived here at Barajas Airport today:

[Begin recording] Well, we believe that the framework of the Mexican proposals offers real prospects for a solution to the problem, and we also feel that support from the Spanish Government to that Mexican position would extend possibilities for negotiations. [end recording]

PARLIAMENT COOL ON NEW DEFENSE, SECURITY BODIES

PM221033 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 17 Apr 82 p 7

["G.A." report: "Total Defense Commission Rejected"]

[Text] A majority of Folketing members are not prepared to accede to the Radical Liberal Party's request for the appointment of a total defense commission, which would investigate various "alternative defense models," for example. Interior Minister Henning Rasmussen takes the view that if the government appointed such a commission it could be seen abroad as a sign that Denmark is considering changes in it present defense and security policy. The majority of Folketing members support this view. Only the Radical Liberals themselves, plus the Socialist People's Party and the Left Socialist Party, take a different view.

The Radical Liberals have also proposed that a committee be appointed to take responsibility for an overall security policy information service. Education Minister Dorte Dennedsen and a majority of Folketing members consider that there is no need for such a committee.

PRIME MINISTER REMARKS ON NUCLEAR-FREE ZONE

[Text] In the opinion of Swedish Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin, a Nordic nuclear weapons-free zone should not be viewed as a separate issue. It is realistic to place the matter in its broad European context. The goal is a nuclear weapons-free Europe, Prime Minister Falldin told a group of Finnish journalists in Stockholm.

Falldin links the issue of a Nordic nuclear weapons-free zone with the U.S.-Soviet talks in Geneva concerning tactical nuclear arms. These talks are currently suspended, but nevertheless a continuation is possible. Prime Minister Falldin also sees a connection with the idea raised at the Madrid CSCE talks.

BRITONS ADVISED AGAIN TO LEAVE ARGENTINA

[Message from Foreign and Commonwealth Office in London for British citizens in Argentina -- recorded]

[Text] Now that the British task forces are approaching the area of the Falkland Islands, a period of increasing tension and risk could lie ahead, which should be taken into account by all British citizens remaining in Argentina. Those who have not so far acted on earlier warnings are asked to consider again whether they should take an early opportunity of leaving the country by normal commercial means. If necessary, advice can be obtained from the British interest section of the Swiss Embassy which is located in the former British Embassy building in Buenos Aires.

PYM INTERVIEWED IN WASHINGTON; DISCUSSES TALKS

[Interview with Foreign Secretary Francis Pym by Keith Graves at the British Embassy in Washington on 23 April -- live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Pym, you have just come from talking to the secretary of state, can you tell us if any progress has been made?

[Answer] Yes, I think progress has been made. I had a very valuable first meeting with Mr Haig yesterday and others, and our officials worked all yesterday afternoon and evening. I've had a meeting this morning with Judge Clark from the White House. Mr Haig and I have had an hour or two together this morning and continued this afternoon. I must tell you that serious difficulties remain. Given the decision taken by the Argentines that their aggression should be rewarded, it hardly surprised me that it should be difficult to reconcile British and Argentine views. But we remain determined to work for a peaceful solution if it is humanly obtainable. And I shall spare no effort, and we know Mr Haig is sparing no efforts. But we shall not shrink from the use of force if that is necessary. It would be no service to the cause of peace for us to pretend otherwise. So the position here is that I'm in the middle of the work that I have come to do, and we will continue it this afternoon.

[Question] You last night used the world "useful" as your first thought. Are you now in fact using the world "progress," or did I put that into your mouth?

[Answer] I think you suggested it, but it is useful, and obviously discussing together how we can improve the proposals and how we can make them perhaps mutually acceptable, that must be helpful. But, as I say, I don't disguise the problems [words indistinct].

[Question] Are you still going home tonight in a few hours time?

[Answer] My plans are to go home tonight, and that remains my present intention.

[Question] Have you given the Americans any assurances over the use of violence? Have you said we would use it when necessary, or we will not use it until a certain point is reached?

[Answer] No, I wouldn't give assurances of that kind nor have they been sought. What we are spending our time doing is in trying to find a way to a peaceful settlement. But, as I say, we shall make every endeavor to achieve it.

[Question] So what progress will you have made by the time you leave? You arrived here yesterday not feeling very optimistic. When you leave, will you just have put over our case to the Americans or will you actually have made any progress?

[Answer] Well, I hope we will have made progress. I hope we will have worked towards more mutually acceptable arrangements. That remains to be seen.

[Question] The OAS is meeting here on Monday. Have the Americans discussed it at all with you, because it is quite a vital meeting, obviously?

[Answer] Yes, I have discussed it. Mr Haig referred to it and [words indistinct] on Monday. But that is not directly relevant to the [chief answers?] we are trying to obtain.

[Question] It's relevant presumably though, in that the Americans will be very unhappy if there was any violence because it's going to embarrass them with the OAS. So to them it's relevant, presumably?

[Answer] Yes, but all our work -- and incidentally our work is based on the U.N. Charter, the Security Council resolution while the Argentines just ignore it, and that is the starting point of everything, and that is what we've got to work to achieve. And really that is absolutely vital because we can't allow a country that has annexed another country's [word indistinct] to simply go on enjoying the fruits of what is has achieved [words indistinct], orderly bases in the world, by basing on the U.N. and that resolution and that is what our work is dedicated to.

[Question] Finally, the fleet is now -- we know because the government [words indistinct] -- virtually in position. Are you saying again, as you've been saying all along, that military confrontation is now all that much closer: Are you likely to resort to that over the weekend?

[Answer] Our strategy has been [words indistinct] to apply maximum pressure on the Argentines by diplomatic means, by economic measures and by the buildup of military forces, and we remain in exactly the same position today. And I hope, I hope very much, that they will realize that they must behave in an orderly way and they are subject to a mandatory resolution. Our strategy is to apply pressure to them. Our friends are helping us all round the world -- the European Community, the Commonwealth, and others.

Returns to London

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Excerpt] Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym flew into London today to report immediately to the prime minister on the outcome of his two gruelling days of talks in Washington over the deepening Falkland Islands crisis. Mr Pym whose mission left Britain and Argentina no nearer to any kind of agreement or compromise, now believes it is virtually impossible for the crisis to be resolved without a shot being fired. He has also told his close friends, as the British task force moves towards the brink, that he thinks the crunch will come in days rather than weeks.

Mr Pym came at the double from his RAF VC-10 at Heathrow to get into a Foreign Office car, which had pulled up to the steps of the airliner. He told officials who met him: "I am in a hurry and I want to go straight off." As he got into the car Mr Pym said: "I am going straight to Number 10 to report to Mrs Thatcher on the work I have been doing during the past two days."

Asked for his latest view on the crisis, Mr Pym said: "I am not going to say any more at the moment. I am in a hurry to report to the prime minister." The VIP lounge had been opened for Mr Pym but his car, with a police escort back and front, sped straight from the airport.

While in Washington Mr Pym had talks with U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig, but did not see President Reagan. He has brought back to London the latest American proposals to head off a war with Argentina over the seizure of the Falkland Islands. No details of these have been released, but there is no suggestion that they amount in any way to a breakthrough.

Mr Pym is to make a statement to the Commons on Monday about his visit. He is still warning of "very real difficulties and obstacles" that lie in the way of a diplomatic settlement.

Mr Haig has found the Argentine junta, beset by personal rivalries and ambitions, almost impossible to treat with. However, with new ideas emerging as a result of Mr Pym's flying visit, Mr Haig is to see Mr Costa Mendez, the Argentinian foreign minister, in Washington tomorrow. These new ideas have largely been compiled by the Americans, but represent a composition of ideas which Mr Haig has developed and which Mr Pym took with him to Washington from London. They are alternatives to what British sources have described as "horrendous" recent Argentinian proposals. Mr Pym will now present these new proposals to the prime minister and then the cabinet.

The message from British sources was that Britain was not particularly enamoured of them, but felt that they -- or a modified version of them -- might have to be lived with. The government's restriction to them will be relayed to Mr Haig, but probably not before the secretary of state has had discussions with Mr Costa Mendez.

Mr Pym has been quick to deny that this new package represents an Anglo-American proposal. The government is believed to be angered by the Argentinians' assumption that sovereignty of the islands should be theirs, without any interim period for further discussion on the future of the islanders, and that they should thus be rewarded for an act of aggression.

Mr Pym and his colleagues are determined that unless Argentina withdraws totally and unconditionally, then force will be used to achieve that end. The foreign secretary now sees a clash as inevitable. Even so, he believes that the new outburst of bellicose noises from the Argentinians is just a show of bravado to conceal their dismay at the reaction to their invasion. Mr Pym is sure that Argentina believed the invasion would raise a flurry and a few eyebrows, and then be quickly forgotten.

'A Bit of Progress'

[Text] Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym reported "a bit of progress" in the Falklands crisis talks, following a two-hour meeting with Mrs Thatcher today. Mr Pym emerged from Number 10 Downing Street and told newsmen: "I've been reporting to the prime minister the discussions I had with Mr Haig in Washington during the last two days.

"We discussed very thoroughly the ideas which he had produced. We also discussed the British ideas, which I took over. I have now come back at the end of that process and reported to the prime minister. We shall be meeting again, probably later today, when I will discuss it also with other colleagues. I think you can say that that is a bit of progress, but as I say, I must consider with others, and the prime minister, again."

Mr Pym seemed determined, and smiled briefly at newsmen at the end of his statement. Asked if he had rejected the proposals he brought back from Washington, Mr Pym said nothing, and simply turned away to walk across Downing Street through the wrought-iron gates of the Foreign Office.

Thatcher Calls 'Inner Cabinet'

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Text] The prime minister this afternoon summoned an urgent meeting of the inner cabinet committee of senior ministers which is dealing with the deepening Falklands crisis. It has been called to consider the latest batch of proposals which the foreign secretary, Mr Francis Pym brought back from Washington after two gruelling days of talks with the U.S. Secretary of State, Mr Alexander Haig. Mr Pym went direct from Heathrow airport to Downing Street, where he presented the proposals to Mrs Thatcher.

These proposals have been largely compiled by the United States, and include ingredients of both British and Argentinian proposals made recently. Mr Pym has not endorsed this new package, which, in his opinion, falls short of Britain's determination for the total withdrawal of Argentinian forces from the Falklands unconditionally.

After studying them, Mrs Thatcher decided that the inner cabinet committee -- sometimes known as the "war cabinet" -- must be called immediately. This entails bringing back the home secretary, Mr William Whitelaw, from Exeter, and Mr Cecil Parkinson, paymaster-general and Tory party chairman, from Harrogate. The committee's other members are Mr Pym and Defence Secretary Mr John Nott. Usually service chiefs also attend.

Meeting Concludes

[Text] Hopes of a peaceful solution to the Falklands crisis still looked dim tonight. The message from Downing Street after a three-hour meeting of the so-called "war cabinet" was that the situation remained gloomy.

Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym left the Downing Street talks tightlipped. He would only say that he had given details of the proposals he brought back from Washington. These new proposals, largely compiled by the United States, fall short of the government's firm determination to enable the Falkland Islanders to decide their own destiny.

As the prime minister prepared to leave for Chequers with no further meetings planned over the weekend a No 10 spokesman said that contacts with U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig would continue. This leaves the door open for some kind of agreement without the use of military force.

But as things stand now it seems Britain may have to accept that all the diplomatic channels have been exhausted. The Downing Street spokesman said "Mr Pym reported to his colleagues on his talks with Mr Haig and we are still in touch with Mr Haig as the search for a peaceful settlement continues."

Asked if the meeting affected the gloomy forecasts about the possibility of peaceful settlement, he said it "wouldn't change that feeling." "Overnight we shall be in touch with the State Department and through the State Department with Mr Haig," he said.

There had been no direct contact, and no messages have been sent during the meeting. "The nature of the meeting is that decisions are taken on what we need to communicate. People will have gone away now to communicate."

He would not comment on what decisions had been taken or say anything about the content of the discussions. Mr Pym was expected to make a statement to the Commons on Monday, he said.

Earlier, on his return from the U.S., Mr Pym had a two hour meeting with Mrs Thatcher. It was then that she called together the "inner cabinet." Those at the meeting included chief of the Defence Staff Admiral of the Fleet Sir Terence Lewin.

NEW BLOCKADE FOR 'SHIPS, AIRCRAFT' ANNOUNCED

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] Britian piled on the military pressure on Argentina in the Falklands dispute by setting up a "no go" zone for Argentinian ships and aircraft approaching the Royal Navy task force last on Friday night, it was disclosed early today (Sunday).

A Defence Ministry statement in London warned that any Argentinian aircraft, including civil aircraft spying on British forces, "will be regarded as hostile and are liable to be dealt with accordingly." The new blockade also includes Argentine warships -- particularly submarines -- and military aircraft which pose any threat to interfere with the task force, which is now nearing the Falklands.

The full statement, issued early today, reads: "On Friday, April 23, at 1720 Buenos Aires time, the Swiss conveyed to the Argentine Government the following communication from her majesty's government."

"In announcing the establishment of a maritime exclusion zone around the Falkland Islands, HMG made it clear that this measure was without prejudice to the right of the UK to take whatever additional measures may be needed in the exercise of its right by self-defence under Article 51 of the UN Charter.

"In this connection, HMG now wishes to make clear that any approach on the part of Argentine warships, including submarines, naval auxiliaries and military aircraft, which could amount to a threat to interfere with the mission of British forces in the South Atlantic will encounter the appropriate response."

"All Argentine aircraft, including civil aircraft, engaged in surveillance of the British forces will be regarded as hostile and are liable to be dealt with accordingly. The president of the Security Council at the UN was subsequently informed that this message had been delivered."

The latest announcement is another clear signal to Argentinian junta leader General Leopoldo Galtieri that Britain's military resolve is as firm as ever as the task force closes on the Falklands. Unofficial estimates of the position of the main body of the fleet place it about 500 miles from the islands, or 36 hours steaming in the present bad weather.

The new "no go" restriction follows two probing flights by an unarmed Argentinian Air Force Boeing 707 in the vicinity of the fleet late last week. On both occasions a Sea Harrier jet, fitted with air-to-air missiles and rapid-fire cannon, was launched and intercepted the intruder, which flew away.

HELICOPTER ATTACKS ARGENTINE SUB OFF S. GEORGIA

[Text] British helicopters today attacked an Argentine submarine near the dependency of South Georgia, the Defence Ministry announced in London. There are no details of any casualties and there is no more information about the incident at present.

A brief statement from the ministry said: "In pursuance of our inherent right to self defense under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter, British helicopters today attacked a hostile Argentine submarine in the vicinity of South Georgia. There is no further information at present." This is the first official report of any aggressive action being taken by the British task force since it set sail for the Falklands. It was known that part of the task force had split from the main group and was nearing South Georgia, which is about 800 miles from the Falklands.

A Defense Ministry spokesman said the action was judged to be "an appropriate response" within the terms of a statement issued in London early today. That statement said that a no-go zone had been imposed around the task force. Part of that statement read: "The government now wishes to make clear that any approach on the part of Argentine warships, including submarines, naval auxiliaries and military aircraft which could amount to a threat to interfere with the mission of British forces in the South Atlantic will encounter the appropriate response."

The ministry spokesman said today: "In judging the response to the Argentine submarine the commander (Rear Admiral Sandy Woodward), acting within his rules of engagement, took the action he thought was appropriate." The spokesman explained that the new "defensive area" around the task force was a position of "self defense."

The spokesman went on: "It is an area in which within his rules of engagement the commanding officer would be making decisions about appropriate responses." "The appropriateness of any response would depend on the circumstances of the time and of the threat of any Argentine presence in the area."

The spokesman said the action had been taken in the context of the latest statement which was given to the Argentine Government of Friday although not released in London until earlier today. "The statement we made on Friday to the Argentine Government made it very clear that we would think it right within this defensive area to take appropriate responses."

Cabinet ministers including Foreign Secretary Francis Pym, Defence Secretary John Nott and Home Secretary William Whitelaw went to the combined operations headquarters at Northwood, West London this morning to be briefed by military chiefs on the disposition of the task force.

But it is not thought that the decision to attack the Argentine submarine was taken by the service chiefs. Mrs Thatcher had a similar briefing at Northwood yesterday. The Defense Ministry hope to have more details of today's incident later.

Further Details Reported

[Excerpt] The government later issued more details about the attack. A statement said: "A British task group engaged in operations off South Georgia detected an Argentine submarine close off the coast near the harbour at Grytviken at first light this morning.

"Helicopters were sent to engage it in order to safeguard our ships and the men aboard. The submarine, which has been damaged, is believed to be the Santa Fe." The submarine was on the surface at the time, but it nevertheless could have fired torpedoes. In this action, however, it did not fire. But the message from British sources was: "If you are under threat, you don't wait."

The prime minister was informed of the incident before noon by the chief of the Defense Staff, Admiral of the Fleet Sir Terence Lewin. Later she had a working lunch at Chequers with members of the so-called war cabinet -- the inner cabinet committee handling the crisis.

ROYAL MARINES LANDED ON S. GEORGIA THURSDAY

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] The first British forces landed on South Georgia on Thursday, authoritative Whitehall sources confirmed tonight. About a dozen men, of the Royal Marines crack Special Boat Squadron — their equivalent of the SAS -- landed from a submarine, to prepare for the main force which landed today.

It is understood the cabinet was unaware of the SBS presence on the island at the time. The advance party is believed to have radioed details of the Argentine presence around Grytviken back to Britain. This amounted to 44 men, plus a mortar team.

Island Retaken

[Text] Britain has retaken Grytviken on South Georgia, Defence Secretary Mr John Nott announced tonight. He said: "British troops landed on South Georgia this afternoon. They have now successfully taken control of Grytviken." Mr Nott went on: "At 6 pm, the white flag was hoisted in Grytviken beside the Argentine flag. Shortly after, the Argentine forces surrendered to the British forces. The Argentine forces offered only limited resistance."

There were no British casulties. Mr Nott added: "Our forces were landed by helicopter and were supported by a number of warships, together with a Royal Fleet auxiliary. During the first phase of this operation, our helicopters engaged an Argentine submarine, the Santa Fe, off South Georgia. This submarine was detected at first light and was engaged because it posed a threat to our men and to the British warships launching the landing."

Mr Nott added: "So far, no British casualties have been reported. At present, we have no information on the Argentine casualty position."

Mr Nott said: "The commander of the operation has sent the following message: "Be pleased to inform her majesty that the white ensign flies alongside the Union Jack in South Georgia. God save the queen".

Mrs Thatcher, who appeared outside No 10 with Mr Nott, told waiting pressmen: "We should rejoice at that news and congratulate our forces."

The Defence Ministry added a brief statement later tonight which read: "The operation was conducted in pursuance of our inherent right of self-defence under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. The government nonetheless remains committed (on the basis of Security Council Resolution 502) to the continuing and intensive search for a solution by negotiation to the crisis provoked by Argentine aggression.

"But we have throughout made clear that our search for a negotiated solution does not rule out the use of force."

'No British Casualties'

[Text] Nobody died and only one Argentinian was injured during the South Georgia invasion, the Ministry of Defence announced early today (Monday). "The latest information from South Georgia is that no British casualties were sustained during the successful operation mounted to retake Grytviken," said a short statement from the ministry.

"There was only one serious Argentine casualty -- a seaman who suffered leg injuries as a result of the attack on the Argentine submarine," it added. There was no information available at this stage on how the injured sailor was treated, or on the number of Argentines taken prisoner, said the ministry.

THATCHER SEES QUEEN, NOTT TO MAKE STATEMENT

LD252014 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2000 GMT 25 Apr 82

[Text] The prime minister tonight had a routine audience with the queen and brought her up to date with the crisis. Whitehall officials said tonight that Mr Haig's bid to find a diplomatic settlement was "still in play."

Britain has sent a formal reply to the American ideas that Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym brought back from Washington after his talks with Mr Haig. Mr Nott is expected to make a Commons statement about the submarine attack tomorrow.

But the opposition may press Mrs Thatcher to make the statement herself, covering not only the military situation but the diplomatic negotiations as well. Labour leader Mr Michael Foot said on ITV's Weekend World programme today that the submarine attack made it "all the more necessary that we should return to the negotiating table."

FORCES CAPTURE LEITH IN MOPPING-UP OPERATION

[By Alan Jones, PA defense staff]

[Text] British troops today increased their grip on the South Atlantic island of South Georgia after more fighting with Argentinian forces. After yesterday's dramatic counter-invasion by marines at Grytviken, the troops moved along the coast to Leith.

It is believed fighting took place, but the Defence Ministry in London said there were no reports of any casualties. The taking of Leith was described as part of a "mopping up operation" by one Whitehall source today.

Leith harbour, about 10 miles north-west of Grytviken, is a significant catch for the British. The harbour houses the whaling station where the Argentinian scrap merchants landed and sparked off the Falkland crisis.

It was thought in Whitehall today that there may still be small bands of Argentinian troops hiding out on South Georgia. But the two main areas, Grytviken and Leith, are now under British control.

The commandos who recaptured South Georgia yesterday were thought to be members of 42 Commando from Bickleigh, near Plymouth. They sailed to Ascension Island in the liner Canberra and were later transferred for the assault. They are commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Nick Vaux, but he was not thought to be involved in the landing.

There was no fresh news early today about the Argentinian submarine, the Santa Fe, which was attacked by helicopters before the landing at Grytviken. Latest reports said the submarine was listing heavily and had possibly run aground in Grytviken Bay.

FALKLAND BRIDGEHEAD LIKELY 'WITHIN 48 HOURS'

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defense correspondent]

[Text] British forces are likely to be in action against Argentinian occupation troops on the Falklands "within the next 48 hours," Whitehall sources disclosed today. Said one official: "The break of cordite is pretty strong this morning in the corridors of Whitehall."

Time is against the British task force -- and in the interests of Argentina. The fighting edge of the marines and troops embarked in the task force, now said to be "very close" to the Falklands, will be blunted by prolonged periods in the stormy waters of the South Atlantic. Sources predicted that "some kind of bridgehead" will be established in the remoter areas of the Falklands by British forces as a means of applying more pressure on the Argentinians to come to diplomatic terms over the sovereignty of the islands.

On the other hand, it is expected that the Argentian Navy may make an attempt to move out of its 200 mile operational zone along its own coasts. Officials in London pointed out that the South Georgia landing may goad Argentina into taking wider military action, if only to demonstrate the resolve of its government to public and world opinion.

WHITEHALL DETAILS COSTS OF TASK FORCE OPERATION

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] The cost of the Falklands task force has jumped to around 275 million pounds according to Whitehall sources today. This will not be drawn from the Defence Ministry's 14 billion pound budget, but from the government's contingency fund. Defence sources, while stressing "discipline" in expenditure, say that the prime minister has told Defence Secretary John Nott "to spend what is necessary to recapture the Falklands." The force, with its staggering arsenal of weaponry, carries enough bullets and missiles for 20 day's fighting. Whitehall officials said today that the final bill will not be known for some months after the operation is completed. This will take account of new orders for production of ammunition to replace that used in training and in any combat that takes place.

Much of the stocks have been drawn from NATO-declared reserves and these will have to be renewed in line with Britain's commitment to the Western alliance. Further orders can therefore be expected for the state-owned royal ordnance factories and companies like British Aerospace Dynamics.

An indication of the expenditure so far committed is given by the following disclosures:

-- A Rapier battery requested permission to fire 180 missiles at Ascension Island to become battle ready. Each missile costs 9,000 pounds.... Making a total of 1,620,000 pounds for this exercise alone.

-- SNEB ground attack two-inch rocket pods have been fitted to some helicopters -- notably the Gazelle. One aircraft was despatched to the French manufacturers, Matra, to pick up 40 pods -- and this was just part of the arming process.

Costs also include requisitioning and chartering some 35 civilian ships, and paying some of their crews 150 percent pay. The Defence Ministry has pledged to pay a "fair price" to owners of requisitioned ships. There will also be compensation for lost business in cases like that of Uganda. Its 260 schoolchildren passengers had to be ferried home by aircraft because their cruise was cut short, and subsequent schools cruises were cancelled. By contrast, the cost of the Argentine invasion of the Falklands is estimated at about 20 million pounds.

ATLANTIC CONVEYOR SAILS WITH HARRIERS ON BOARD

MORALE-BOOSTING SHOW BROADCAST TO TASK FORCE

LD260938 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0910 GMT 26 Apr 82

[Text] Sarah Kennedy, one of the presenters of London Weekend Television's "Game for a Laugh" programme, has been chosen to present a morale-boosting radio show for British troops in the task force. The half-hour record request programme has been arranged by the British Forces Broadcasting Service [BFBS] in conjunction with BBC External Services. It will be transmitted on Mondays, Wednesdays and Saturdays at 1100 GMT.

The first show, on the 13 and 14 metre wavebands, was being broadcast today via a relay station in the South Atlantic. So far BFBS has received more than 400 requests for pop and light music from families and girlfriends of the troops heading towards the Falkland Islands.

Sarah Kennedy, who served for six years with BFBS in Singapore and Germany and has given up her holiday leave to do the Falkland broadcasts, said today: "The aim of the programme is to give the troops a link with home and boost their morale. The messages are all on the same theme -- 'loving you, missing you, come home soon.'"

Ohter selected BFBS programmes are also sent to four of the Royal Navy ships in the task force.

FRIGATE TWICE INTERCEPTS ARGENTINE 'SPYSHIP'

PM261115 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 26 Apr 82 p 26

[Charles Laurence dispatch: "Spy Ship Chased Away"]

[Text] "Pooled dispatch" from aboard HMS Canberra -- A Royal Navy frigate and rocket-carrying helicopter sped off at action stations to intercept an Argentinian spyship snooping near the main amphibious assault group of the British task force yesterday.

It was the second time in 48 hours that the Argentine ship, the 10,000-ton merchantman Rio de la Plata, had been spotted spying on the troop-laden vessels. A few days ago the Rio de la Plata hove into sight as the frigate carried out gunnery practices. The frigate's captain challenged the ship by signal lamp, but it refused to acknowledge and sailed off.

Then, at breakfast-time yesterday, she was back on another spying mission, sailing clearly into view. Although the incident happened in international waters the Argentine vessels was well away from any recognised shipping lane. The force commander flashed an alert to the jet-powered frigate and she swept out to sea, chasing the spyship over the horizon.

Last night the frigate was still stalking the Rio de la Plata. It was not clear if the snooper had been trying to monitor top secret British radio signals or if the British frigate had set off in pursuit carrying a boarding party of marines.

ARGENTINE AIR STRENGTH INFORMATION REPORTED

[Ian Glover-James report: "Mirage Fighters 'Fly Over Port Stanley'"]

[Text] Information about Argentine air strength over the Falklands has reached Britain with the arrival of Mr David Colville, 28, who has made a study of military movements in the islands since the invasion on April 2. He left Port Stanley on Thursday and said that French-built Mirage supersonic fighters and former RAF Canberra bombers, bought in 1971, had been seen over the Falklands for the first time.

They made no attempt to land at Port Stanley's short airstrip and circled overhead only briefly. The Mirages would have been at the limit of their 745-mile range from mainland air bases in southern Argentina.

Mr Colville who was editor of the Falkland Islands TIMES until the Argentine authorities confiscated his printing machinery, said the occupying forces had made no attempts to extend Port Stanley's runway to accommodate combat aircraft.

They have flown in construction equipment to extend the hard-standing "apron" at the airfield because of the constant flow of transport planes. Most were Hercules C130 cargo carriers, but Mr Colville flew out in a military Boeing 737 converted into a troop carrier.

He estimated Argentine troop strength in the Falklands at 14,000, but said morale was low. Many appeared to go hungry and Mr Colville himself had observed soldiers receiving only one cupful of stew a day to eat. Islanders had told him that 20 Argentines had died of exposure in the Falklands, four had been shot by firing squads for stealing eggs, and other soldiers had been so hungry they had been eating horsemeat.

Mr Colville said the Royal Marines who resisted the Argentine invasion had apprently sunk an incoming landing craft with 200 troops on board. The Ministry of Defence, however, could not confirm this. Mr Colville said a friend in the Falkland Islands defence force (the local home guard) had seen the marines fire a hand-held rocket at the leading vessel in the narrows approaching Port Stanley Harbour, sinking the landing craft. The defending troops then scattered before their position was overrun. What happened next is unknown.

Mr Colville said that later he saw the dead bodies of two Argentine soldiers washed up on the foreshore in Port Stanley Harbour and other islanders told him they had spotted bodies at other points.

But a suggestion that the marines had killed seven Argentines on April 2 by firing a rocket at an armoured personnel carrier was discounted by Mr Colville. The incident was reported by Mr Rex Hunt, the returning governor.

Mr Colville said a significant number of those remaining wanted to be evacuated before fighting started. They would prefer compensation and resettlement elsewhere to life under any form of Argentine authority. "Falklanders were very pleased when Margaret Thatcher sent the task force. Then when it got closer they began to become extremely worried," he said.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA'S CHNOUPEK CONTINUES VISIT

Meets With Kiprianou

[From the "Echo of Events" program]

[Text] Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Chnoupek, who is on an official visit to Cyprus, was received this morning by President Kiprianou. After the meeting, President Kiprianou made the following statement:

[Begin recording in English fading into Greek translation] I would like to say how pleased I was to have this meeting today with the foreign minister of a very friendly country and a very good friend of Cyprus who knows the Cyprus problem well. We have discussed various matters of common interest, the international situation and various other problems concerning the international situation, particularly the need for detente in the world and progress toward a peaceful solution of international problems.

Naturally, we have discussed the Cyprus problem and I have availed myself of the opportunity to express once again the Cypriot people's and my own gratitude for consistent support of Czechoslovakia and its leaders for the Cypriot people's just cause for freedom and justice.

Allow me to say that, responding to my invitation, the president of Czechoslovakia will visit Cyprus at a time to be fixed later. The visit will give us the opportunity to meet again and discuss various issues. The visit will also enable us to further strengthen the relations and cooperation between the two countries.

I believe that the foreign minister's visit will, to a great extent, contribute to the strengthening of relations and long cooperation between our two countries in all fields. I would like to conclude by repeating that I am very pleased with this meeting with Mr Chnoupek. It was a very constructive and useful meeting that was held in an extremely friendly atmosphere. [end recording]

Then Mr Chnoupek made the following statement: [Begin recording in Czech fading into Greek translation] I agree with what President Kiprianou has said. Our meeting was held in a very friendly and sincere atmosphere. It was indicative of the friendly relations between our countries. These relations were not established yesterday or today but many years ago when we were by the side of the Cypriot people in their struggle for freedom and sovereignty.

We have availed ourselves of this opportunity to discuss our bilateral relations, which are based on the principles of peaceful coexistence and can be described as exemplary. These relations have rendered, during our long cooperation, many benefits to our peoples. We would like to explore all the possibilities in expanding our relations even further and deeper.

We have also reviewed the international situation and discussed the main problems emphasizing the need that the policy of detente should continue -- this policy is the only way out of the present complicated international situation -- the need of continuing the policy of disarmament and expansion of international cooperation. We have discussed with Mr Kiprianou the Soviet peace proposals -- as they were submitted by President Brezhnev -- which aim at helping solve international problems. We expressed the hope that the dialogue between the Soviet Union and the United States will continue and will have positive results.

As was natural, we also discussed the Cyprus problem. I have regrettably observed that there have not been any chances since the last time I visited Cyprus and that the island continues to be divided. I have expressed our full support for the UN resolutions and the other efforts being exerted by the United Nations as well as for the struggle for independence, sovereignty and nonaligned policy of the Republic of Cyprus and also for the island's demilitarization.

I am very happy over having been recieved by the president. It was a great honor and privilege for me. I believe that this meeting constitutes a good preparation for the visit which President Husak will pay to Cyprus, probably this year. I believe this visit will confirm the good relations between Cyprus and Czechoslovakia. [end recording]

After his meeting with Presidnet Kiprianou, Mr Chnoupek laid a wreath at Ethnarch Makarios' statue in the front yard of the presidential palace.

Cooperation Agreement Signed

[Text] Continuing his contacts which began this morning with a meeting with President Kiprianou, visiting Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Chnoupek has held talks with Foreign Minister Polandhis. The two ministers initially had a private meeting, which was followed by a broad conference with officials from both sides participating. During the talks they discussed the Cyprus issue in all its aspects, the humanitarian issue of the missing persons and bilateral relations. They also reviewed the international situation. Afterward, the two ministers signed a legal cooperation agreement.

Mr Chnoupek also visited the House of Representatives, where he met with the acting president of the House, Mr Papioannou. Mr Chnoupek was accompanied by Czechoslovak Ambassador to Cyprus Hejc and by Cypriot Ambassador in Prague Angelidhis. Mr Papaioannou briefed Mr Chnoupek on the present phase of the Cyprus issue and expressed the thanks and gratitude of the House and the Cypriot people for Czechoslovakia's strong support of Cyprus both at the United Nations and internationally. Mr Papaioannou said that Czechoslovak President Husak's visit to Cyprus this year is awaited with pleasure.

After the meeting, the acting House president said Mr Chnoupek assured him that the Czechoslovak Government will continue its multifaceted support for the government and people of Cyprus both in the political and economic fields until the island's liberation.

Speeches at Dinner

Referring to the Cyprus problem, Mr Rolandhis stressed that the Cyprus Government will continue the efforts for a fair and sound solution despite the fact that the Turkish side's attutide does not create any optimism regarding the future of the intercommunal talks. Mr Rolandhis referred to the repercussions from Turkish invasion and occupation that have been continuing for the last 8 years and stressed that in the case of the 2,000 missing Cypriots, all the principles of the international community have been violated.

In his reply, Mr Chnoupek stressed that Czechoslovakia has always firmly supported, and will continue to support, the Cypriot people in their struggle for the independence and freedom of their country and their struggle against foreign intervention in their internal affairs. He also expressed the certainty that the removal of all foreign troops from Cyprus and the demilitarization of the island will contribute to the solution of the Cyprus problem and the improvement of the general situation in the Mediterranean.

Mr Chnoupek also extolled the cooperation between Cyrpus and Czechoslovakia in the economic, cultural, educational and other fields and stressed that in the last 5 years there has been an increase of almost 50 percent in the exchange of products between the two countries.

Visit Ends

[Text] Czechoslovakia's Foreign Minister Chnoupek ended his 3-day official visit to Cyprus and this morning departed for his country. Bidding goodbye to Mr Chnoupek, Foreign Minister Rolandhis mentioned that Chnoupek's visit had been most fruitful and expressed profound respect for Czechoslovakia's support of and solidarity with Cyprus. Rolandhis recalled that in Cyprus' situation a foreign army is hampering the impelementation of the principles of sovereignty, independnece, territorial integrity and unity, causing misery and hardships to the Cyrpus people.

In a statement Foreign Minister Chnoupek reiterated his country's position on the Cyprus problem, stressing that from the outset Czechoslovakia has stood by the Cypriot people in the struggle they are waging. Chnoupek reiterated Czechoslovakia's decision to use all possibilities so that a just solution of the Cyprus problem can be achieved in accordance with UN resolutions and those by other international organizations. The solution should guarantee the independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and dimilitarization of the nonaligned Cyprus republic.

Referring to the talks he had with Rolandhis, Chnoupek said that these had been friendly and constructive and had been conducted in a spirit of mutual understanding, covering both bilateral relations and the international situation. In connection with bilateral relations, Chnoupek said among other things that an increase in the export of Cyprus products to Czechoslovakia had been agreed upon. Relations, he said, between Cyprus and Czechoslovakia constitute a strong exmaple of peaceful coexistence and mutual understanding between two states with differing social systems.

In addition to Rolandhis, Chnoupek was seen off at Larnaca Airport by the Soviet Union's ambassador, Czechoslovakia's ambassador, the ambassadors of other socialist countries, and by the Cypriot ambassador in Prague.

SPOKESMAN SAYS 'MINIMUM PROGRAM' CONSTITUTIONAL

[Text] Answering a question as to whether the implementation of the minimum program is unconstitutional, since the constitution provides for the policy to be charted by the Council of Ministers, the government spokesman said that the minimum program outlines a policy framework. He said: Within this framework proposals will be submitted to the council of ministers of concrete questions for their approval.

Asked about the appointement of advisers by the president of the republic, the government spokesman said that presidents in every country have the right to have a number of advisers. In the case of Cyprus, he said, one must take into consideration that the president's office does not have a sufficient number of personnel. As for the question of the adviser's salary, the spokesman said that special provisions will be made for each case on the basis of existing regulations.

ATHENS TO KEEP OUT OF CYPRUS ELECTION CAMPAIGN

NC251747 Athens KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 25 Apr 82 p 20

[Text] Nicosia, 25 Apr -- It has been learned from a well-informed source that the Greek Government has informed Nicosia that it does not desire to have any involvement in the [presidential] election campaign in Cyprus. Athens considers that the elections constitute a clear internal affair of the Cyprus political parties and the people themselves. Athens hopes that the election struggle will be waged within a civilized framework, without fanaticism and incidents, as was the case in the parliamentary elections.

On the contrary, the Turks and certain Western quarters expect the presidential elections to split the unity of Hellenism so they may avail themselves of promoting their plans.

It has been learned that, following the imminent resignation of Mr Ioannidhis, who will run for president, Mrs Stella Soulioti will be appointed the new interlocutor. She has been adviser to interlocutors since 1977 and has excellent mastery of the subject. Following Mr Ioannidhis' announcement that he will be a candidate, four persons will be running for president: Mr Kiprianou (Democratic Party-AKEL), Mr Kliridhis (Democratic Rally), Mr Lissaridhis (EDEK) and Mr Ioannidhis (non party).

EXPORTS TO GDR -- East Germany has decided to increase fivefold the imports of Greek products this year compared with 1981. This was the result of talks held in Berlin between Deputy Coordination Minister Ioannis Pottakis and the East German Government. During the talks, which have already concluded, topics of mutual interest in the fields of trade exchanges and technical and economic cooperation were discussed. Mr Pottakis is now in Sweden to participate in the OECD conference, which will deal with the policy of balanced social and economic development within the framework of the current world economic crisis. ECEVIT TO APPEAR IN MILITARY COURT 29 APR

[Text] Ankara, 26 Apr (AFP) -- Turkish authorities today leveled a new charge against former Social Democrat Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit for violating the military regime's Decree 52 against political discussion, it was announced here. Mr Ecevit, former head of the People's Republican Party, has been under arrest in military prison since April 10.

He is accused of criticising, in a Dutch TV interview on February 11 and March 22 article in the West German weekly DER SPIEGEL, Turkey's military regime for betraying the legacy of Turkish founding father Kemal Ataturk.

Today's charge was for a letter Mr Ecevit sent to Dutch TV on April 3 in which he said he would not make any more statements to the foreign press, following "instructions he was given about this by the military regime." Dutch television broadcast the contents of the letter, which were then broadcast on April 3 by the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC).

Mr Ecevit will appear in military court on Thursday, facing a minimum of five years in prison if convicted. Three other judicial inquiries are continuing against him, his party and former People's Republican Party members. These charge him with "collusion with far left terrorist groups," "complicity with DISK (trade union association)," and "insulting a judge."

Mr Ecevit was imprisoned from December 3, 1981 through February 1 for having criticized a government decision abolishing political parties. After his release he made statements to the foreign press sharply critical of Turkish National Security Council decisions limiting human rights, freedom of expression and labor unions.

EVREN VIEWS PROGRESS OF NEW CONSTITUTION

TA251556 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1525 GMT 25 Apr 82

[Text] Ankara, 25 Apr (AA) -- Head of state Gen Kenan Evren said progress was being made toward the goal according to the timetable announced (for the return to democracy), and when the goals were reached, those who had any doubts about the political maturity of the Turkish people would be ashamed.

Speaking at the 20th anniversary ceremony at the Constitutional Court, Evren deplored the frequent inquiries by representatives of friendly countries about the content of the new constitution to be drafted. It was impossible, he said, for anyone or any authority to give information in this respect before the constitution is actually drafted.

He was confident that both the Consultative Assembly and the National Security Council would draft a constitution worthy of the Turkish nation, adding it would be unthinkable and without precedent to require the approval of other states for one's constitution. "Membership of one state in certain international or regional organizations should not necessitate sacrifices from national sovereign rights," General Evren declared.

He admitted the Constitutional Court could not perform its functions fully under the current extraordinary conditions, but added after the new constitution is drafted, "in the light of our past bitter experiences," and approved by referandum, the high court will "undoubtedly resume its functions."

He told justices of the Constitutional Court their court would have a critical and historic role in ensuring that the new parliamentary democratic regime based on the new constitution works soundly and effectively and that the country never returns to the pre-12 September 1980 holocaust.

More Powers for President

TA251616 Ankara ANATOLIA in French 1600 GMT 25 Apr 82

[Text] In a statement to ANATOLIA agency on Sunday, the Consultative Assembly Constitutional Committee chairman, Prof Orhan Aldikacti, said that the new constitution will grant to the president of the republic the right to dissolve the parliament and to declare a state of emergency if necessary. He added that the principle of nationalism will be mentioned in a more significant manner in the new fundamental law of the country as compared to the former constitution. He noted that he is in favor of introducing the principle of a "social state" and not a "socialist" one into the constitution. He stressed that this was his personal view.

Moreover, Aldikacti said that the representatives of the dissolved political parties will be invited to express their opinions to the committee. Noting that the establishment of a special organ made up of state functionaries and retired high level military officials would be useful especially in times of crises, Aldikacti said that the opinion of this "council" should not be above that of the future parliament.

IRAQI OIL MINISTER ARRIVES IN ANKARA FOR TALKS

[Text] It has been announced that technical talks will be held in the near future in a bid to increase the volume of crude oil being pumped through the Turkish-Iraqi oil pipeline. Deputy Oil Minister ('Abd al-Mumin as-Samarra'i), who arrived in Turkey last night, is continuing his official talks in Ankara. The visiting deputy minister was received this afternoon by Energy and Natural Resources Minister Fahir Ilkel. Official talks then began.

An announcement by the Energy and Natural Resources Ministry on this subject says that the exchange of energy and particularly cooperation in the field of oil were discussed during the official talks. Increasing the capacity of the Turkish-Iraqi oil pipeline which is currently transporting 35 million tons a year was also taken up during the talks and it was decided that technical delegations from both countries would soon meet to discuss this issue. Officials of the Iraqi national oil company as well as the director of the Turkish Petroleum Corporation [TPOA], Ismail Kafescioglu, and Pipelines and Petroleum Transport Corporation [BOTAS] Director Cahit Eris were also present at the talks.

KREISKY INTERVIEWED ON AL-QADHDHAFI, ISRAEL

[Excerpts] Bonn, 26 Apr (DPA) -- Austrian Federal Chancellor Bruno Kreisky has said that his European opposite numbers should take more seriously the efforts of Libyan head of state Al-Qadhdhafi for a rapprochement with Europe. In an interview with the SPD weekly VORWAERTS published on Monday, Kreisky said that Al-Qadhdhafi might be a revolutionary but he is an honest man who means what he says. If such a man shows a certain measure of willingness to reach understanding, this should be taken up and not rejected continuously in a manner which must be insulting to him. He would be forced back into isolation, and the consequences of this isolation would have to be borne again.

Kreisky again criticized Israel's policies in the Near East. The socialist government leader said that Israeli policy had not made use of the opportunity to establish a relationship of peace with the Arab world. The greatest problem in this respect is the Palestinian question, on which the Israeli Government rejects any interference.

CHANCELLOR DENIES TANK SHIPMENTS TO ARGENTINA

AU261342 [Editorial Report] The communist Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German on 25 April 82 on page 1 carries a brief report "Argentina Wants Steyr Tanks in Roundabout Ways," citing Buenos Aires arms dealer circles as saying that the Argentine generals in their current endeavors to obtain additional military equipment are seeking to circumvent the export freeze imposed by Austria on Cuirassier tanks. Such attempts, the paper says, "need not necessarily be futile," as the Steyr Company has "lots of connections with countries where the Austrian export freeze does not apply." The paper adds that "only last Saturday a tank shipment left Austria for an unknown destination."

The socialist Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German on 26 Apr 82 carries a front page short report headlined: "Kreisky: No Tanks for Argentina." The paper reports that when asked to comment on "reports in Sunday papers" that Argentina wanted to get Austrian Cuirassier tanks via a third country, the chancellor declared: "I regard this as quite impossible. Should there actually be such attempts, they will not be successful. It is out of the question for us to deliver war materials to a country involved in an acute conflict. That would be such a violation of the law that it could not go unpunished. The management of the Steyr Company, should it allow itself to become involved in something like that, would jeopardize the existence of the company. I cannot imagine that the responsible managers would get mixed up in such a thing."

CHANCELLOR INTERVIEWED ON MUNICH SPD CONGRESS

DW261245 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1940 GMT 23 Apr 82

[Reporter Dieter Zimmer interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Munich on 23 April -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] The party congress has followed your security policy conceptions. In matters of economic policy, however, it has decided in favor of Social Democratic positions which have been immediately rejected by the FDP. Do these decisions support you in dealing with the coalition partner, or are they a handicap in governing?

[Answer] The party congress as a whole supported me with regard to security policy and energy policy. As regards economic and social policies, I think it is good that the public of the Federal Republic has been informed about the wishes of the Social Democrats, about the things they would implement and handle if they were ruling alone. But everybody who had a say in the decisions knows that we have a coalition government, that we have a Bundesrat where the CDU holds a majority. We will try not only to incorporate one point after the other in the coalition discussions, but we will also try to implement them step-by-step.

[Question] That will probably be difficult.

[Answer] Yes, that is so.

[Question] You said at the end of your party congress speech: We Socialists must approach each other. That has happened here in Munich in many cases. Are you not afraid that many things could break up again if the elections in Hamburg and Hesse are lost by the SPD?

[Answer] Well, I am not afraid! Secondly, these elections will not be lost.

[Question] Are you certain?

[Answer] Yes! Thirdly, I am stressing that the party congress really was a congress of rapprochement. I have predicted to many journalistic colleagues in past weeks that this would be the case. They did not believe me, saying that I was an optimist. But I was certain, and developments have proven me right. I have, therefore, a right to feel certain with regard to Hamburg and Hesse.

[Question] Why was there so little talk at this party congress about the political opponent, namely the CDU/CSU union parties?

[Answer] It is not the main task of a party congress to deal with the CDU/CSU union parties. The main task is consensus, analysis, aims -- that has been emphasized here. It was a party congress of work and not polemics. A few polemical or critical remarks have been made here with regard to the CDU and particularly the CSU. I have been cultivating this myself occasionally, but really only occasionally. We have not come here to indulge in a media dispute with the CDU/CSU.

[Question] Rumors have been heard recently about a cabinet reshuffle. I heard from several deputies that it is time now to hear a clear word from you. When will you say something?

[Answer] I said to the party congress that I feel bound by the Basic Law. The Basic Law gives me the right to suggest the appointment and the termination of ministers. The appointments and the terminations take place through the Bundestag president. First I must report to him. I do not want to make any statements in advance, neither today nor tomorrow.

SCHMIDT COMPLETES LIST OF CABINET RESHUFFLE

[Text] Bonn, 26 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has completed the list of his reshuffle in the federal cabinet. Bonn government circles stated on Monday that the following changes are planned in the government reshuffle which is to take place this week and which affects only SPD members of the cabinet:

The new minister of labor, succeeding Herbert Ehrenberg, will be Heinz Westphal, heretofore the SPD's budget expert. The parliamentary state secretary in this ministry will be Juergen Egert, the party's expert on social issues.

Antje Fuchs, heretofore parliamentary secretary of state in the Labor Ministry, will replace Antje Huber at the head of the Federal Ministry of Youth, Family and Health. Her parliamentary state secretary will be Claus Grobecker, one of the party's budget experts.

The new finance minister will be Manfred Lahnstein. He was heretofore state secretary in the federal chancellor's office and is now replacing Hans Matthoefer, who is taking over the Ministry of Posts and Telecommunications from Kurt Gscheidle. New parliamentary state secretary in the Finance Ministry will be Gunter Huonker, whose post as minister of state in the chancellor's office will be taken again by Hans-Juergen Wischnewski.

Government Spokesman Kurt Becker will be replaced by Bonn's permanent representative in the GDR, State Secretary Klaus Boelling, who had already held this post prior to Becker for almost 7 years. Fhanz Otto Braeutigam, departmental head in the Foreign Ministry and former deputy of the permanent representative in East Berlin, will go to the GDR capital to replace Boelling. The new and departing ministers are to be confirmed in or released from their posts on Wednesday by federal President Karl Carstens. The new ministers are to be sworn in on Thursday at the Bundestag.

GOVERNMENT MAINTAINS 'SOLIDARITY' WITH BRITAIN

[Text] Bonn, 26 Apr (DPA) -- The FRG Government is maintaining its "unchanged solidarity" with Great Britain in the Falkland conflict. This was said by Government Spokesman Kurt Becker on Monday at the federal press conference, where he explained Bonn's position. He said that so far hardly any details had emerged on the fighting during the occupation of South Georgia. On the basis of official British information, the FRG Government considers that first, there is not a state of war, and second, British territory had merely been reoccupied.

The position of the FRG has also not changed in its support of all efforts to find a peaceful solution to the conflict, especially the efforts by U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig. Within the framework of European political cooperation, the foreign ministers of the EEC will meet in Luxembourg on Tuesday to discuss the new situation.

MINISTER COMMENTS ON DEFENSE OF TERRITORIES

He added that as regards the islands in the Indian Ocean and the Pacific, "there is no reason to think that any disproportion of forces threatens our sovereignty." He added: "Nonetheless we do not think that gunboat diplomacy is enough; it strikes us as more important to develop goodneighborly relations and establish links which will politically guarantee French sovereignty. If we are to do that we must remedy some past mistakes. For instance, in the Pacific previous governments allowed the situation to deteriorate by a policy of inflexibility and even disdain toward other states. We are now trying to restore links and restore an atmosphere of political confidence. That is what we are doing in particular with Vanuatu -- a joint commission, which I chaired, held a meeting for that purpose.

"In the world today the guarantee of sovereignty cannot be purely military and there cannot be any solution by force. That is why we condemned the operation carried out by Argentina. But the lesson which we learn from that affair is that action should be taken at all levels to ensure that such a situation does not arise."

EMBASSY REPAIRS OPEN WAY FOR NORMAL LIBYA TIES

[Text] The French authorities have taken possession of the new premises of the French Embassy in Tripoli, the Quai d'Orsay said on Monday, 19 April. All the rebuilding work on the embassy ransacked by Libyan demonstrators in February 1980, for which the Tripoli government was paying, has now been completed. However, some work for which France is paying still has to be done and will be completed in 2 or 3 months, it was added.

When he met Mr (Hafiana), chief of the Libyan Diplomatic Mission in Paris, on 9 July, Jean-Pierre Cot, assistant to the external relations minister, told him that France wanted "normal relations" with Libya; those relations would only be possible, he said, if the Libyan forces withdrew from Chad (which has been done) and after the French Embassy in Tripoli was repaired.

PCI'S BERLINGUER REPORTS TO CENTRAL COMMITTEE

PM261055 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 15 Apr 82 pp 1, 8, 9

["Text" of PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer 14 April report to PCI Central Committee and Central Control Commission session in Rome]

[Excerpts] Rome -- The Central Committee and Central Control Commission session opened yesterday. Comrade Berlinguer delivered the report on the country's situation and on the PCI's role in the struggle for the democratic alternative. The text of the speech is as follows:

This Central Committee and Central Control Commission session was convened to respond to the need to elucidate the tasks, initiatives and objectives in various fields which the party must carry out to perform its role. This role is the driving force of the struggle to advance and establish a democratic alternative to the approaches and methods characteristic of the present power system and the present government coalition.

My report will center on this subject. I will therefore not illustrate and explain the stances and initiatives taken over the past year on various important international, economic, social, institutional and cultural topics at other Central Committee meetings (the most recent of which was January's, on Poland) and at various meetings, through the recent meeting of our two parliamentary groups.

Before embarking on the substance of my report I feel it is necessary to reassert our party's position on the danger of an early dissolution of Parliament which, following the announcement of the meeting I just mentioned, has again appeared imminent, or at least possible in the summer or fall. In this connection in my address to our parliamentarians on 5 April I gave an interpretation (which is not mine alone) of Comrade Craxi's speech at the [PSI] conference in Rimini, drawing their attention to two of his assertions: That the PSI is not promoting its own candidacy for the prime ministership in this legislative period and that the last commitment to which it feels bound with respect to the Spadolini government is the finance bill (which was subsequently passed by the Lower House and will be voted on by the Senate in the next few days). I have seen nothing to gainsay that these two assertions express the aim of reaching early elections as soon as possible.

In my speech to the parliamentary groups I also indicated which other forces, interests and objective factors can contribute to this outcome. I confirm at once our clear-cut opposition to this hypothesis, and in a moment I will give our reasons. But first I would like to stress that in the past few days other forces too have for various reasons spoken out against a further interruption of the legislative term. Moreover, we are being asked how it is possible to reach elections by June if due account is taken of the political wills expressed and the procedures that will presumably have to be pursued in the event of a government crisis and a crisis in whatever political initiatives and proposals might emerge from the various sides involved in it.

Be that as it may, the danger exists and we must continue to combat it. The reasons we oppose with the utmost determination the fourth consecutive premature dissolution of Parliament are certainly not partisan ones. We are opposed to early elections because:

1 -- They would halt government and parliamentary activity for several months in a situation in which there is a pressing need to decide on several serious problems, especially economic and social ones, many of which can be tackled positively. As shown partly by the proposals made by our parliamentary groups, which have already demonstrated even from the opposition, it is possible to make Parliament work constructively if there is a real and responsible willingness for dialogue on the part of the government and the majority. This is, unfortunately, something that has often been lacking.

2 — They would impart a further blow, in the citizens' eyes, to the prestige of the institutions and the parties, which has already been thoroughly shaken by the conflicts and disputes among the governing parties, sparked partly with the aim of preparing for an electoral contest, which was beginning to be considered even at the beginning of the year.

3 -- Italy would be in the worst possible position and would present a discredited image vis-a-vis imminent, demanding international meetings, such as the industrialized countries' and Atlantic council summits and the talks with the U.S. President. This would nullify the positive effects on international public opinion recently achieved, first with Genral Dozier's release from the terrorists, and then with President Pertini's visits to various countries of the world.

Despite all these negative considerations, early elections could be understandable if the aim was to create a new and different, fully democratic political order without boundaries or exclusions which would at least free Italy from the instability and inefficiency of recent years. The absurd thing is, however, that the five parties in the present coalition would present themselves to the voters with acknowledged failure of their work behind them, but again proprosing the same coalition attempted over the past 3 years. They would claim they would acquire the ability to govern simply due to some changes in internal balance of forces and a reshuffle (which would still be very problematical) in the premiership and in the number and importance of ministers allocated to the five parties.

Such intentions, despite the facade of dynamism and action, would lead not to real change but to an essential lack of change of the fundamental political and social factors of the Italian crisis, in which so many signs of erosion and regression have already accumulated.

On the other hand, our resolute opposition to early elections deos not signify in the least that we are frozen in a wait-and-see stance of immobility. It must prompt us to act and struggle more resolutely, promptly and openly in the two directions that can actually change the fundamental realities of the Italian situation: in the struggle to resolve the problems assailing the people and the country and in the initiative to bring about a real political and government alternative. To make the party, its organizations and the broad masses move in this direction the first necessity is a lucid policy line and consistent conduct in implementing it.

PCI the Driving Force of the Alternative

It was this need that prompted us to propose the democratic alternative policy: After taking shape during 1980, it was outlined by the Directorate on 27 November that year and then adopted by subsequent Central Committee meetings, which expanded and went further into nuclear aspects.

This line was not adopted hastily or rashly. It stemmed from the experiences not only of the party but also of the people's masses, various social sectors and our young supporters during the period of the democratic solidarity majority and the subsequent period when events showed something that is now evident to everyone. The government agreement among the DC, PSI, Italian Social Democratic Party, PRI and Italian Liberal Party in no way guaranteed a start to resolving the crisis or even a minimum of unity of government action or the normal functioning of Parliament.

Since then there have been several situations of chaos, the latest being the case of the finance bill. This bill, which should have embodied the government's thorough and clear approach to economic decisions, was first regarded as a "portmanteau bill," (a description made by one of its former advocates) in which every minister and under secretary tried to insert whatever wares, whether fresh or tainted, he had to sell. Expanded to include almost 100 sections, it encountered our steadfast opposition in Parliament, which obtained significant successes on two substantial points -- cuts in local spending and increases in medical charges. Its course through Parliament was accompanied by the majority's vacillation between arrogance and uncertainty.

Eventually the finance bill was relieved of a large number of its sections (decisions on expenditure and investment, though the charges were maintained) and its lengthy and inglorious journey is about to end, while the approval of the state budget is uncertain because of the shortage of time. This is only the latest example which shows how essential it is to give the country an alternative to this method of government, to the power system dominated by the DC and to the alignments that have hitherto led Italy. But this alternative cannot be realized unless the PCI is its essential driving force, with its open and unitary inspiration, its wealth of energies, ideas and popular representativeness; with its capacity for making proposals, taking the initiative and waging struggles, which must nevertheless be sharpened and updated. The PCI's very nature and characteristics -- which distinguish it, but do not set it apart, from the international workers movement and the Italian and European leftwing forces -- do not constitute an obstacle. These can be the most valid basis for creating a broad current in favor of the democratic alternative and for struggles, proposals and alignments that will inspire confidence and hope in the forces, both inside and outside the parties, that want to eliminate the constraints of an interplay confined entirely within the present power system, which is not changing the fundamental class and political relations in Italy. We are motivated neither by dogmatism nor by petty partisan interests and we must always guard against lapsing into splittist stances. We are aware that everything that the PCI has become in the history of Italy is, on the contrary, due both to the national role and the capacity for innovation it has succeeded in displaying and to the policy of broad unity it has succeeded in seeking and pursuing. By now setting the goal of the democratic alternative and of the decisive role in achieving it that the PCI must perform, we are not distancing ourselves from this fundamental inspiration and characteristic, but conferring on it the specificity and forms demanded by present conditions. In this way we are interpreting an objective need that has become pressing for the sake of national recovery and the consolidation, development and, in some respects, the very survival of Italian democracy, of the foundations of the constitutional order of the republic that stemmed from the resistance.

The fact that the democratic alternative necessarily requires the PCI shoulder government responsibilities reflecting its role and influence in the country is the consequence of the Italian historical and political process. But it will not happen on its own: It can only be the result of a new effort to make theoretical and practical advances, an incrase in our ability to interpret and channel the needs of the workers and the country, to make proposals and perform actions capable of stimulating energies within society and the parties and to achieve substantial understandings, partial agreements and unity.

An Italy Which Reacts and Struggles

The need for the alternative is confirmed by the failure, now acknowledged, of so-called "governability." Our analyses have not been mistaken. Within a brief space of time three governments have fallen because of conflicts within their majority and their unpopularity in the country; while the fourth continues its "obstacle course" with increasing difficulty and increasingly imminent expectations of falling.

What is its record as regards policy and results? In foreign policy: Little autonomy of attitude; a considerable increase in military spending; lamentable initiatives such as the offer of the Comiso base; and rash and dangerous initiatives such as the sending of a military contingent to Sinai.

In economic policy: Uncertain and inconsistent measures against inflation, which have reduced it only slightly and not stably, at the cost of a recession that has led to a very rapid increase in unemployment and lay-offs and to serious difficulties for companies of all sizes, whether public, private or cooperative. Many women have been deprived of their jobs, and for young people (the still sizable generation that grew up during the years of high birthrates) many of the paths to securing employment are being closed. None of the major social disputes that have been going on for a long time (the reform of pensions, severance pay, housing and so forth) or the major national imbalances (the southern problem, agriculture, and so forth) has begun to be resolved. Even the reforms laboriously gained together with the Socialist Party, such as in health and housing, have been obstructed or distorted.

With regard to the moralization of public life there have been three scandalous votes of acquittal -- of political responsibilities in the oil imports case, at the Catanzaro trial and in the Sindona case -- with the risk of further encouraging corruption and contamination of public bodies and the parties. We are witnessing the spread of scourges such as drug abuse and organized crime which often, as in the case of the Camorra or the Mafia, are connected with contracts, economic life, political activity and sometimes terrorism. This interconnection causes the spread of the method of conspiracy, blackmail and provocations in the political struggle.

Even our party has been the object of a provocation (and further attempts might be made) in connection with the false documents on the Cirillo case [published by L'UNITA as genuine]. We promptly acknowledged our error of assessment and method and have publicly stated our apologies to the Christian Democrats unjustly accused. As the days have gone by, however, a campaign has emerged, designed not to censure the error but to eliminate the misdoer, in other words the validity of the PCI's policy and the credibility of its daily paper. A correct and strong response to this has been issued by many organizations and very numerous comrades, who have stepped up their commitment to distribution. It has also become clear that there are still many unclear aspects about the Cirillo case. It is not yet known who paid his ransom, which in any case served to nurture the terrorists' activity. It is not known what part was played by DC members and secret service agents in negotiations with the terrorists and in relations with the Camorra. We are not accusing the entire DC but, as in other cases, it is protecting all its members and shows no capacity for self-criticism.

"Rotation" Uses Discrimination Against PCI

We see no really innovative proposals emerging from the other political forces. Indeed, what seems predominant is an effort to promote their own party, to strengthen their own public image and to conduct a harsh conflict with their government allies. For months we seem to have been in the midst of the harshest kind of electoral rivalry, reflected in a no-holds-barred fight for the mass media, which reveals the existence of tendencies to debase democracy and to totalitarian-type methods. It is extraordinary that the Communist opposition is continually being asked for demonstrations of understanding and good will, while the harshest and most contemptuous verbal polemics are conducted among the components of the majority, among which not a day passes without conflicts, disputes and glaring incidents accompanied by continuous demands for explanations, "verifications" and "clarifications."

The actual facts have shown the invalidity of the theses regarding the Communists' resentful and evil nature, put forward at the start of this legislative period in connection with the failure of the second Cossiga government and the Forlani government. The Communists returned to opposition when it proved absolutely impossible to persuade the other political forces -- starting with the DC -- to regard the democratic solidarity majority as a starting point for a long-term regeneration of society and the state. We regard and conduct our opposition in terms of the full exercise of democratic and national responsibility. Therefore, we have conducted vis-a-vis the governments of this legislative term the necessary task of censure and have waged the necessary struggles supported by constructive proposals, motivated by the realization that the policy of a conservative stabilization would have imposed a heavy price on the people's masses and the country and would have increased the threats to the democratic order. Unfortunately, this is what is happening.

The Communists have never played at bringing down governments. We have never pursued such a policy as if it were our constant method and our principled position, even when we have struggled to bring down particularly dangerous and inefficient governments. Everyone knows, however, that in Italy governments die quickly primarily because of an inherent suicidal tendency, to extend the morbid metaphor.

But this ministerial instability must not overshadow the essential factor connected with it -- that is, a constancy of real power unparalleled in any other democratic society. I noticed that at the Socialist comrades' recent policy conference there was a debate on the expression that emphasizes the existence of a "DC power system," described by some as a kind of ideologism.

It is in fact something very specific, real and particularly relevant in those parts of the country -- such as the South -- where the state shapes society more than elsewhere. The DC power system consists of an interconnection among the party, the government and the combination of public corporations and companies active in all areas of society -- from finance to the production of goods and services, from welfare to the media. It is via the control of this complex system -- managed in alliance with some of the economically strongest private groups and directed toward influencing everyone's life by means of more or less short-lived and often humiliating promises and favors -- that real and large-scale control is exercised over decisive aspects of the country's life. This system, very largely immune from democratic supervision, is used to perpetuate, through itself, the ladder of hierarchies and privileges and, ultimately, of abuses and despotism, which it has created and on which it is founded.

That it is a sufficiently real phenomenon to become not only conservative but above all stifling with respect to the many hopes which some Catholics used to place in the DC is shown partly by the evidence of the most aware "day scholars" ["esterni" current of the DC] who were recently called on to express themselves on the subject of the DC's present difficulties.

But the effort to impart a new thrust to the DC, far from going to the root of the damage that has accumulated over the years, seems to consist basically of a desire to defend itself against the rivalry attacking an area hitherto considered exclusive -- namely relations with the sectors which grew up during the period of DC management and occupation of the state. Consequently the emphasis is placed not on how to restore democratic efficiency to what has become a kind of prerogative of the party but, on the contrary, on the defense of its own power positions from new claims and new ambitions. It is not apparent how this can be consistent with the high-sounding assertions of the desire to return to the values of democratic Catholicism, or even with Moro's effort to instill a less narrow and short-term view of Italy's national affairs.

Nevertheless, this also reveals the shortcomings of the competitive alliance promoted by the Socialist Party in the same field and within the context of the power system desired and built by the DC. Even selecting an isolated aspect of the complex Italian Socialist tradition (Turati-style reformism), it cannot coincide with the moderate line now prevalent within the DC, which emerges strengtheneed from it to the detriment of the forces aiming regeneration.

But this is the very reason why there is no great future for the attempt to channel the desire for change within the confines of an alternative within the present government line-up, in other words, a simple "rotation." This competitive line, which was orginally presented as a necessity, has assumed the value of a fundamental option, which must be a cause for concern for the entire workers movement and all left-wing forces. Of course it attempts to use, rather than to combat, discrimination against the PCI, despite the fact that it is proving impossible now to find any credible pretext for maintaining it. This means, in practice, keeping in power the same political and social bloc that has governed hitherto, while the fact is that the negative experiences carried out hitherto derive not from individuals, but from the nature of the interests that have prevailed and still prevail in that power bloc.

Our party has agreed on practicing what Comrade Craxi, in a recent speech, called the "constructive spirit and respectful tone." But who, if not us, has had to react against the rule -- which everyone should regard as despicable -- whereby anything goes against the Communists? It is precisely on the basis of such a rule that for a long time and despite the conquest of democracy, an out-and-out persecution was carried out against the Communists and that, as we have seen and can still see, there has been a continuous campaign of lies. All this, however, has almost never prompted us to use in our necessary polemic the tone habitually used by others toward us. This is why we wonder what it means to say, as the PSI secretary recently did, that it is necessary to "extend the area of understanding of all the forces of regeneration and progress, to advance the process of change." This is undoubtedly a necessity, but if it is situated within the outlook of "rotation," it poses an insoluble contradiction. It means allocating an internal role to the DC and an external one to the PCI.

The result would be that in the country's leadership the PSI would be not equidistant -- which already tends to negate the existence of at least a potential proximity among the leftwing forces -- but extraordinarily closer to the DC with regard to the major national problems. Encounters -- strife-ridden ones -- with the Communists are possible only in local administrations and in the mass democratic organizations and on individual issues. But clearly all this reduces rather than increases the area of understanding among the forces of regeneration and progress and does not in the least advance a process of real change, but obstructs it and mystifies it, while maintaining the splits among the people's and leftwing forces.

Indeed, this gulf has increased in a very worrying manner over the years. It is obvious that the exacerbation of splits on the left, which we have not sought (though we have not failed and must not fail to criticize splittist stances), has in no way benefited the workers masses and the country.

In saying this we are not, however, underestimating the autonomous role of the Socialist Party, to which we are bound by an original shared mold, much shared history and, even today, major unitary experiences. We have also tried to understand and to appreciate, as far as possible, the role of the other forces of secular traditions. The understanding between these forces and the Communists and Socialists and the contribution made by the more open-minded and advanced forces of the Catholic-inspired movements have also led to some important results in the task of elucidating and educating the country, as in the referendums on abortion and divorce. But recent years have shown that the combination of forces contained in the "five-party coalition" is not producing a policy any different from the kind known hitherto.

Facile Contrasting of 'Ancient' and 'Modern'

The need to modernize the country's leadership is referred to in abstract terms by many people. They stop short, however, of the fact that in Italy the protagonists of a change in the country's leadership cannot fail to include the PCI.

The tests we have been asked to submit to are endless and interminable. Unfortunately, this protracted campaign has not remained fruitless even within the ranks of the democratic and leftwing forces. Even among our own comrades there might be some who perhaps believe that it is too bold and ambitious an aim to aspire to a participation in government equal to our support in the country (obviously together with other leftwing and democratic forces).

But by raising the issue of the democratic alternative, our directorate and Central Committee were actually combating an unfounded and unjustified attitude toward us, our role and the future of the Italian workers movement. The ideological prejudice against our party has disappeared only verbally. Every attempt is made to avoid applying to us the rule whereby every political force is assessed according to its real actions and positions (not according to intolerable and factious questionings of intent) and has an influence proportionate to its popular representation.

In fact the fight is directed precisely against the most positive aspects of our party, in other words, the fact that it is a truly and fully autonomous communist party that considers itself a fundamental force of the working classes, of democracy and of the nation, which does not follow the experiences of either Soviet-type or social democratic societies. The existence of this extraordinary political group is irritating, so people try to ignore its historical roots and its original policy, and this is why its distinctive characteristics are portrayed as useless vestiges of the past or as futile gestures of vanity.

The pressure exerted on our party is designed to drive it either toward an abandonment of itself, its role in transforming society, its entire heritage, or toward a minority and splittist mentality that would cause it to relinquish any national leadership role. Both these stances would doom our party to sterility and would eliminate that which has made Italian Communists a factor of protection and hope for such a large sector of our people and for others besides.

The democratic alternative certainly requires dialogues and policy convergences primarily on the left, but it also requires a broader receptiveness and above all a clear option for the future. If it is recognized that the so-called policy of "governability" is in dire straits, a decision must be made to take stock of its sad conclusion and choose a different path for the future. It is not a valid objection to tell us that the option of a government alliance with the DC exists because it is impossible to embark on a "treasure hunt" for the third way with the Communists. In fact, the need to attempt new ways of tackling the problems of contemporary society is not our requirement alone. Whatever name one wishes to give this need, it now confronts the workers, people's, progressive and leftwing forces of all capitalist countries. The very difficulties of the major social democratic countries, including Germany, show that the issue raised by Italian Communists is a pressing one.

In this regard it is not valid to argue that the third way is defined solely in terms of negotiation of the Soviet-type and social democratic-type models. In fact, it already has a specific and positive substance which lies, for instance, in our formulations aimed at defining a new relationship between the market and economic planning, between the quantity and quality of development, between representative democracy and forms of popular participation, between the need for unity of leadership and social management. Moreover, the path that we are following is a continuation of a long road: that which many years ago used to be called "the Italian road to socialism." Even then it did not consist solely of a vindication of national peculiarities with respect to a general model considered valid. Of course, it took time and experience before we realized, though aware of our abilities and strengths, that we faced a task not confined solely to our own nation. It is this realization that prompted and still prompts our effort to instill in the Italian workers movement a new European outlook on its own problems and on the struggles to be waged to change society at the summits of capitalist development and to establish a policy aimed at eliminating the blocs.

So, we are not working as part of a constellation centered on the Soviet Union, nor do we resign ourselves to considering capitalist-type society the summit of human history and therefore continue to work and struggle to give full value and validity to the past and present hopes of the exploited, the oppressed and all the forces that seek change and that try to introduce it on the basis of present objective economic and social processes and by promoting progressive and innovative solutions as needed in Italy and throughout Western Europe.

We have no desire for splendid isolation: Quite the contrary, we seek dialogue with all communist, socialist, democratic and peace-loving forces of all inclinations. It is significant that meetings with the major leftwing parties of the West are developing, the latest being with the French PS in Paris. Even the European socialist and social democratic parties now realize the inadequacy of the solutions they have attempted, while in our country time is still being wasted on inappropriate attempts at imitation.

Being and Acting Like Communists

Over the past year we have enhanced and expedited many formulations which are now being tested not only in program documents and study conferences -- useful and necessary though they are -- but in everyday work throughout the country. I will limit myself to mentioning the domestic issues closely connected with the aim of quickly increasing the ability of the entire party at all levels to realize the policy of the democratic alternative.

To the politicians and media that speak of the PCI solely in denigratory terms, portraying us as an old and ailing party destined to decline and die, we state that we would tackle any challenge we had to face, including general elections, with vigor, unity, a modern attitude and, I believe, success.

We do not wish to deny our difficulties, which are, however, due largely precisely to the newness, complexity and scale of the problems we face and with which we are grappling. But for this very reason and to inspire complete confidence, a new combativeness and a stronger capacity for expansion by the party, several conditions are necessary. I wish to discuss only three of these, which are fundamental and which depend to a large extent on the leadership bodies, starting with the central ones.

The first is the continuous defence of the party from the attacks, denigrations and insinuations to which it is submitted every day, obviously without confusing lies with criticisms, which we must be able to heed. The defense of the party -- an attitude that should reflect a fundamental duty and correct behavior for every Communist Party member, leader and press organ -- has become less incisive and resolute recently. This is not solely a matter of party conduct. When there is a failure to react to lies, when there is a failure to respond promptly and vigorously to the enemy counterattack, to distortions and manipulatory misrepresentations of the party's aims and proposals, the net result is a jeopardizing or loss of just political battles. Moreover, let us not forget that the party's fundamental options and cohesion must also be defended against falsifications, conspiracies and maneuvers originating outside Italy.

The defense and development of the party also require the nondivulgence, as stated in our statute, of "private party matters" and require a more careful vigilance and attention against possible infiltrations of provocative elements into our ranks (some cases of which have been discovered) and against whatever traps might be laid for us, as was the case with the false document on the Cirillo case published by L'UNITA.

The second fundamental condition for the party to act safely is that there be lucidity and consistency in the implementation of our policy. This, too, is primarily the responsibility of our central bodies and their individual members. Of course there is the very complex problem of the ways in which divergent stances or policy lines within the party and its leadership bodies should be expressed in an orderly way, while standing firm on the exclusion of factions. This problem has been discussed many times and I believe that the next congress must deal with it in depth and reach a decision.

I am referring now, however, to the fact that confidence, trust and combativeness of the party as a whole are certainly not enhanced by certain forms of behavior which, once a line has been adopted or a decision taken, give interpretations or versions of them which alter or contradict them, thus weakening their comprehensibility and effectiveness. It is entirely legitimate and normal for differing assessments and disagreements to exist on issues under discussion, and there must be more collegiate decisions in all the leadership bodies at all levels. The party's leadership bodies rightly strive to take account of different opinions and contributions in an attempt to achieve political unity on the basis of a fuller and more accurate formulation of stances untainted by unilaterality. When this proves impossible a majority decision is taken. But in either case a policy line or a specific decision is taken which the entire party is obliged to follow. This rule has proved valid at all times and has protected our party from the ailments afflicting other parties. I believe that it remains valid. But for this very reason we must require that every one of us observe its preconditions and characteristics, which are the democraticness and collegiality of decisions and joint responsibility in supporting and implementing them in all forums.

The third condition for new reinvigorating the party's initiative, role and political presence is a more prompt and coordinated operational management of all the activities of our organizations.

Obviously every organization, starting with the cells and sections, and every working commission needs to exercize its own autonomous initiative, which is now more essential than ever in the presence of so many needs and requirements emerging from society, and to fully restore a diligent attention toward and concern with the detailed and everyday problems of all citizens.

But it is also necessary to surmount lack of focus and discontinuity in initiative, so that when certain general objectives are set and major mass political campaigns are promoted the party will concentrate its efforts and respond with a prompt mobilization. This requires that the leadership bodies' work be less tortuous, more orderly, more attentive toward operative decisions and particularly toward monitoring implementation.

The congress will examine whether modifications should be introduced into the party's organizational structure, including the central leadership and working bodies. But even now every party body, including the Directorate and Secretariat, must examine its own functioning and its own relations with the working departments and sections and with the regional committees and federations.

SPECIAL POLICE ARREST RED BRIGADES LEADER

[Text] Milan, Italy, 23 Apr (AFP) — Italian police today arrested Francesco lo Bianco, a Red Brigades leader sought since autumn 1980 who was among those charged with kidnapping U.S. General James Lee Dozier last December, a police source said. Two other Red Brigades members were arrested but their identities were withheld, the source said.

Lo Bianco, 32, who has also been accused of seven murders, including that of a Genoa police commissioner, heads the Genoa column of the Red Brigades and is said to be one of the group's strategic directors.

He was sentenced in absentia to 26 years in prison for the kidnapping of Gen Dozier, who was freed in a police commando raid on January 20 after one month in captivity.

The sources said he called himself a "communist guerrilla" as he was taken by police. His arrest marked another success for Italy's special anti-terrorist police, known as the Digos. Lo Bianco is the third presumed strategic leader put behind bars in the past year, after the earlier capture of Mario Moretti in Milan last April and the criminologist Giovanni Senzani in Rome in January.

NICARAGUA'S RAMIREZ SEEKS TO STRENGTHEN TIES

PA260438 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1129 GMT 25 Apr 82

[Text] Madrid, 25 Apr (EFE) -- Spain "is called upon to play an important role in the stability of Central America," Sergio Ramirez Mercado, president [as received] of the Nicaraguan Junta of the Government of National Reconstruction, announced today on his arrival in Madrid. On this visit, decribed by Sergio Ramirez as intended to "strengthen ties with the Spanish Government," the president of the Nicaraguan junta is accompanied by Nicaraguan Labor Minister Virgilio Godoy, Foriegn Trade Minister Alejandro Martinez Cuenca, Deputy Foriegn Minister Nora Astorga and other ranking government officials.

On his arrival, Ramirez thanked the Spanish Government for its firm support in the UN Security Council last week and noted his country's efforts to achieve stable peace in Central America. He added that he will have the opportunity on this trip to report on the situation in that region and to meet with Spanish Government leaders to discuss the possibility that Spain can play an important role in stability there. Sergio Ramirez stressed that Spanish assistance to Nicaragua has been ongoing, in keeping with plans, and that he will discuss various aspects of financial cooperation with Spanish authorities.

On the peace plan for Central America proposed by Mexico, he noted that it is developing satisfactorily and that it is contributing toward a real solution of the problem. He noted that Spanish support for this plan would aid in expanding the capacity for negotiation.

Regarding Nicaraguan rapprochement with the United States, he said that his government is ready to negotiate at any moment and is only waiting for the United States to say when. The Nicaraguan president [as received] added that a bilateral understanding is necessary between the United States and Cuba, and that it should be extended to the belligerent forces in El Salvador as well. Asked if Nicaragua has any fear of a possible U.S. armed attack, he replied: "We have never spoken only of an U.S. armed aggression, or of a landing by marines -- which would not be improbable, for we have already experienced two in this century -- but also of the support that certain U.S. circles give or may give to more than 5,000 former Somozist guards, who have more than 17 camps on the other side of the Honduran border."

Lastly, he spoke of the recent charges made by commander Eden Pastora against the Nicaraguan revolutionary junta, saying that these charges are nothing new, as they have been repeated ever since the Reagan administration took office. He stressed that if Commander Pastora's evolution seems a radical change to the public, it is no suprise for the revolutionary junta, because they were aware of it ever since Commander Cero left Nicaragua.

During its stay of several days in Spain, the Nicaraguan delegation will hold meetings with Spanish Foreign Affairs Minister Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca and with other political party leaders. After this visit, it will go to various other European countries.

[Text] The president of the Nicaraguan ruling junta, Sergio Ramierez, held talks today with Spanish Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo. The meeting lasted almost 25 minutes. Sergio Ramierez has been on an official visit to Spain since yesterday to request Spanish support for Mexico's peace proposals for Central America. The Nicaraguan leader declined to make a statement as he left the Moncloa Palace. Tomorrow before leaving, he will give a press conference.

THATCHER ADDRESSES PARLIAMENT ON SOUTH GEORGIA

[Speech by Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher to the House of Commons in London -- live]

[Text] With permission, Mr Speaker, I should like to make a statement about recent developments with relations to the Falkland Islands and South Georgia. In our continuing pursuit of a negotiated settlement, my right honorable friend the foreign secretary visited Washington on 22 and 23 April. He had many hours of intensive detailed discussion with Mr Haig. Their talks proved constructive and helpful, but there are considerable difficulties. Mr Haig now intends to pursue his efforts further with the Argentine Government. However, the Argentine foreign minister is reported to be unwilling to continue negotiations at present. I hope he will reconsider this.

As the British task force approaches closer to the Falklands, the urgent need is to speed up the negotiations, not to slow them down. We remain in close touch with Mr Haig.

I now turn to events on South Georgia yesterday. The first phase of the operation to repossess the island began at first light when the Argentine submarine Santa Fe was detected close to British warships which were preparing to land forces on South Georgia. The United Kingdom had already made it clear to Argentina that any approach on the part of Argentine warships, including submarines, or military aircraft which could amount to a threat to or interfere with the mission of British forces would encounter the appropriate response. The Santa Fe posed a significant threat to the successful completion of the operation and to British warships and forces launching the landing. Helicopters therefore engaged and disabled the Argentine submarine.

Just after 1600 London time yesterday British troops landed on South Georgia and advanced towards Grytviken. At about 1800 the commander of the Argentine forces in Grytviken surrendered, having offered only limited resistance. British forces continued to advance during the night and are now in control of Leith, the other main settlement on South Georgia.

At 1000 this morning the officer commanding the Argentine forces on South Georgia formally surrendered. British forces throughout the operation used the minimum force necessary to achieve a successful outcome. No British casualties have been notified, and it is reported that only one Argentine sustained serious injuries. About 180 prisoners were taken, including up to 50 military reinforcements who had been on the Argentine submarine. The prisoners will be returned to Argentina.

British Antarctic survey personnel on the island were reported to be safe when we last heard from them early yesterday afternoon. Our forces are now making contact with them. Arrangements are in hand to evacuate them if they so wish. I'm sure the House will join me in congratulating our forces on carrying out this operation successfully and recapturing the island. [loud cheers] The action we have taken is fully in accord with our inherent right of self-defense and Article 51 of the UN Charter.

Mr Speaker, my right honorable friends and I will continue to keep the House fully informed on the situation as it develops. I should like to emphasize that the repossession of South Georgia, including the attack on the Argentine submarine in no way alters the government's determination to do everything possible to achieve a negotiated solution to the present crisis. We seek the implementation of the Security Council resolution, and we seek it by peaceful means if possible. [cheers]

Responds to Questions

LD261640 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1614 GMT 26 Apr 82

[Excerpts] Britain's recapture of South Georgia Island in no way alters the government's determination to do everything possible to get a negotiated settlement to the Falklands crisis, the prime minister told MP's today. For the opposition, Mr Foot told her there was "a deepening sense of anxiety." But he backed the South Georgia invasion as fully within Britain's international rights.

The prime minister told questions "We search for peace...but we didn't break the peace." Mr Foot stressed that the most important question was "How are we to pursue the search for the diplomatic and peaceful settlement?" And he demanded: "When are we going to go back to the Security Council?"

Mr Foot stressed that Labour remained "firmly, unshakeably and persistently committed to fresh initiatives in the search for a peaceful settlement. If one initiative fails then another has to be started," he said as Tory MP's jeered. Mr Foot retorted: "That is the spirit in which the government should be going about their business."

He sounded a note of caution by warning MP's: "What is legal is not necessarily also prudent. That has to be taken into account as well. The search for peace must never be torpedoed by us." He called for more detailed reports on the peace options discussed by the cabinet.

Mr Foot said the Commons should debate the crisis again on Thursday and as a few Tory MP's shouted out "No, no," the Labour leader continued: "I believe we in this House have the right to speak in this matter and I believe we in this House of Commons should keep persistent control over what the government proposes and intends."

Mrs Thatcher said the government shared people's anxiety about the search for a peaceful solution to the crisis. "It is now more than three weeks since the UN Security Council resolution called upon Argentine force to withdraw. During that time far from withdraw they have put reinforcements, re-equipment -- men and materials -- on the islands."

Mrs Thatcher stressed: "If we have not yet reached a settlement the blame lies at the foot of the Argentine Government. Of course we are searching for peace -- we did not break the peace. We must in fact remember while we search for that peace that our people, British people, are under the occupation of the Argentine invader. We must remember that in the way in which we carry out the negotiations."

Mrs Thatcher said the UN had not been drawn into the negotiations for a solution to the crisis as she understood the feeling at the UN headquarters in New York was that it should not get involved while Mr Alexander Haig's peace bid continued. She hoped the Argentine foreign minister, Mr Costa Mendez, would re-consider his decision not to see Mr Haig.

For the Social Democrats, Dr David Owen announced his party's "full and unequivocal" support for the government's decision to re-possess South Georgia. Dr Owen asked for as assurance that before there was an escalation of violence, Mrs Thatcher would be ready to go to the United Nations and discuss under Articles 82 and 83 of the secure trust areas — which would allow for British administration -- the possibility of using these provisions for an interim administration.

Mrs Thatcher stressed it was implementation of a UN resolution that Britain was seeking, but which the UN was not in a position to implement itself.

On the future course of negotiations as a whole, she told MP's: "I must point out to the House that time is getting extremely short." The prime minister added: "The task force is approaching the islands. It has been three weeks since that resolution.

"One cannot just have a wide range of choices -- of military options -- with the task force in the wild and stormy weather in that area."

Senior Tory backbencher Sir Derek Walker-Smith (Hertford E) asked that if the Argentinians withdrew their troops in conformity with the United Nations resolution, was it the government's policy to refer the dispute or suggested reference to the International Court of Justice, in accordance with the UN Charter.

Mrs Thatcher said the matter of the dependency of the Falklands had been referred to the International Court in 1955. The prime minister said both parties had to agree to such a move. "We did, but Argentina did not."

Mrs Thatcher said that the majority of people knew that unprovoked aggression must not be allowed to succeed. "If it does then there will be no international law and many, many people will fear for their future."

Labour's Mr Tony Benn, a leading campaigner against sending the Falklands task force, said that although the House of Commons and the country were united in condemning the aggression, public opinion as far as it could be ascertained, favoured a "much more serious attempt at negotiation through the United Nations."

Mrs Thatcher told Benn there was no lack of vigour or will to pursue the negotiations on the part of the government. "The lack is on the part of the Argentine Government to obey Security Council resolution," she said. "Our people are under the heel of the Argentine invader," she told Mr Benn.

For the Liberals, Mr Russel Johnson said it would be increasingly difficult to give the prime minister a blank cheque without much more information. He asked if she had further considered the suggestion by Liberal leader Mr David Steel for all-party talks on the matter. Mrs Thatcher agreed that time was short. "But there is no lack of will on our part to negotiate. The trouble is in getting the Argentinians to withdraw.

"It may not be possible to do it by negotiation. But we are still seeking to do it. They have had over three weeks in which to comply with that resolution. They have shown no inclination to do so whatsoever, indeed they have reinforced all their troops." Mrs Thatcher told MP's: "I believe we will have a greater chance of getting a peaceful settlement if we bring greater military pressure to bear on the Argentine Government."

Of a peaceful solution under the UN Charter, the prime minister said: "If we are not successful in achieving one the fault will not lie with us...." The blame will lie fairly and squarely with the Argentine Government. The government was constantly trying to take the initiative to see that negotiations continued.

The one thing that needed to be done immediately under the Security Council resolution was the withdrawal of Argentinian forces. "As soon as that is achieved, we are quite prepared to go into negotiations again," she said.

Mrs Thatcher said Britain was not at war with Argentina. Of the Argentine prisoners, she said: "These are not prisoners of war. A state of war does not exist between ourselves and Argentina." The names and state of health of the prisoners would be released, and they would be returned "as soon as possible." Mrs Thatcher said the Argentine commander on South Georgia had been "very grateful for the very quick medical attention that was given to the Argentine man who was badly hurt."

Mrs Thatcher added that talks with the Argentine junta could continue in other ways, if the Haig meeting with Mr Costa Mendez was cancelled. Pressed by a Labour MP on her decision to let the pace of military priorities to dictate the rate of diplomatic moves, Mrs Thatcher pointed to the weather in the South Atlantic.

The stormy conditions were a limiting factor in possible military activities which any sensible government must take into account." "Negotiations are more likely to succeed if military pressure is kept up," she added. "We always have to consider the military options, and in considering them to look after our soldiers and marines who have to undertake them."

Spokesman Details Operation

LD261654 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1630 GMT 26 Apr 82

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent, and Alan Jones, PA defence staff]

[Text] Helicopters from the British task force were fired on before they attacked an Argentine submarine at Grytviken, it was disclosed today. Lieutenant Colonel Tim Donkin also revealed there were three direct hits on the submarine, the Santa Fe.

One Argentine sailor was seriously injured, it was confirmed. There were no British casualties even though British troops had to pick their way through mined approaches to Grytviken, and booby traps on the site of the Leith garrison.

Lt-Col Donkin, who is on the staff of the major general of the Royal Marines, and is based at Northwood, North London, gave his account of the counter-invasion at a packed and tense press conference at the Defence Ministry in London. He said helicopters from the task force flew over Grytviken at dawn on Sunday on a reconnaissance mission. "As they were returning they saw the enemy submarine in the East Cumberland Bay area. The helicopters were fired on, but the pilots were able to assess that the submarine was known to be Argentinian."

He went on: "Accordingly the ships at sea were alerted and helicopter attacks were made against the submarine. At the time, the submarine was heading into harbour and three direct hits were scored. It managed to struggle into port."

Lt-Col Donkin said a "major bombardment" then took place to clear a landing site for the British helicopters. As this gunfire was taking place, helicopters landed from the ships, and brought the Royal Marines and army troops who were landed safely ashore. The troops headed for an Argentine garrison at Grytviken, and were met by limited opposition, described as "unenthusiastic" by Lt-Col Donkin.

The time was then about 5 pm local time, and the white ensign flag was then hoisted alongside an Argentinian flag flying outside the garrison. Forty-five minutes later the Argentine flag was lowered and the garrison was "assessed to have surrendered."

Lt-Col Donkin said there was no loss of life during the operation, and added that the only injury was to an Argentinan leading seaman, who suffered a severe leg wound. He said 140 "prisoners" were taken at Grytviken, of whom 60 were from the crew of the submarine.

About 10 miles along the coast there was a smaller garrison of 16 Argentinian troops at the settlement of Leith. There were also 38 Argentinian civilians in the area.

Lt-Col Donkin said the British commander leading the counter-invasion contacted the small garrison and asked the Argentinians to surrender. The civilians said they would surrender immediately. But the 16 troops "elected to fight on."

British troops left Grytviken, and headed up the coast in ships to occupy Leith. Lt-Col Donkin went on: "This was done during last night and by first light today Leith was in our hands without loss of life. At Grytviken there were land mines laid on the likely approach route."

He disclosed that the commanders of the Santa Fe and the Argentine garrison at Grytviken were entertained to dinner on board a ship from the British task force, and expressed their "gratitude to the humanity being shown to the prisoners." Lt-Col Donkin said all the prisoners were now being looked after and there appeared to be no further dangers of fighting breaking out on the island.

The Argentinian submarine was carrying re-enforcements to the Grytviken garrison -- to the surprise of the British forces. Lt-Col Donkin said the submarine was "disgorging people at a rush." The task force commander brought forward the operation because of this new factor. "He judged it right to move, and then to move very swiftly."

The submarine had been spotted by British helicopters returning from dropping troops on a reconnaissance mission, five miles north east of Sappho, north of Grytviken.

Lt-Col Donkin said 156 Argentine servicemen had been captured, together with 38 civilians. Although they were not prisoners of war, they were being treated consistent with the rules laid down by the Geneva Convention.

"No Royal Marine likes to kill people unnecessarily," he said. "This operation had been planned beforehand with the direct aim of minimising loss of life." The bombardment of shore observation posts and the helicopter landing zone before the troops went in had deliberately been aimed to avoid casualties on the Argentinian side, he said.

He stressed that resistance had ended on South Georgia. Asked if there were any more Argentinians on South Georgia, he said: "This is most inhospitable country. Unless you are in close vicinity of Leith and Grytviken, where there is accommodation and cover they will be extremely cold." If they stayed out too long in such conditions "they will not be battle-worthy at this stage."

DEFENSE MINISTRY DENIES TROOPS ON FALKLANDS

[Text] The Ministry of Defence today issued a categorical denial that a small British force had landed on the Falklands Islands proper. A report in THE TIMES today said an advance party had landed there and was seeking a landing site for the main force.

But a Defence Ministry spokesman stressed: "That is not true. We are saying quite specifically that this is definitely untrue." THE TIMES report said that task force commander, Rear Admiral Sandy Woodward, had been given the go-ahead to make a landing. The report claimed that he had been given orders to make a landing "at his discretion" but not to attack the capital, Port Stanley.

Any assault on the capital would have to be decided by a meeting of the full cabinet. Men of the Special Boat Service -- the navy equivalent of the SAS -- landed on a reconnaissance mission three days before the main attack on South Georgia.

It is unusual for the Defence Ministry to issue such a flat denial as it has over the report in THE TIMES. Normal routine is to decline to discuss operations.

PRIME MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON CRISIS, PROGRESS

LD262236 London BBC Television Network in English 1910 GMT 26 Apr 82

["Panorama" program: Robert Kee and Richard Lindley interview with UK Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher at 10 Downing Street -- live]

[Excerpts] [Kee] Mrs Thatcher, thank you very much for giving us your time. You must have even less of it to spare than usual.

May I come straight to the point and say that while the country is indeed filled with rejoicing -- as you put it -- at the remarkable success of the South Georgia operation, and I think particularly because there was no loss of life, there is a certain amount of concern about where we go from here. Is there any prospect this evening that our military success has brought a diplomatic solution any closer?

[Answer] I think there is bound to be concern and I'm the first to feel concern, because when, you know, you've got your own forces out at sea and marines have landed on an island and you're worried about whether the operation could be a success, then I know exactly what anxiety and concern are like, and for the families too. I don't believe that diplomatic negotiations would have any chance of success unless they were backed up by the task force and the certainty on the part of the Argentinians that we would use that task force if need be. I've always hoped that we wouldn't have to use it, because after all that United Nations resolution passed just over 3 weeks ago told the Argentinians to withdraw and all they've done is pile on more and more soldiers and more and more equipment into the islands. And in the meantime our people, our British people, are living under their occupation. This is a totally wrong action, totally unprovoked aggression and if actions like this were allowed to stand, then there would be many many territories the world over where people would fear invasion.

[Kee] You did say in the House of Commons this afternoon that there was a better chance of a peaceful settlement if you increased military pressure on Argentina. That does rather suggest that perhaps this was a prelude to another military move rather than an immediate diplomatic offensive.

[Answer] The first thing we did was to send the task force and then I think there was a feeling growing up that we wouldn't use it. Well, it was obvious that we needed to recapture South Georgia. It is, after all, a quite separate British dependancy. It's not a Falkland Island dependancy, it's a British dependancy and it's very important. Of course, we'll go on trying to get a peaceful settlement. No one wants it more than I do. I seems to me absurd that Argentina doesn't withdraw her young men from those islands under the United Nations resolution. If she did and we could get, say, the United States to guarantee the security of the islands, or even perhaps a United Nations force, then we could withdraw our task force. And then there would be hope of solving it all peacefully. That's my objective and what I shall work for.

[Lindley] Prime Minister, you said this afternoon that the urgent need is now to speed up the negotiations. But has the use of force in South Georgia really done that? Has it helped that process? Far from it bringing Argentina closer to a diplomatic deal, their foreign minister has been saying that for the moment negotiations are at an end. Is there a danger, do you think, that you stiffened the resistance of Argentina instead of making it more amenable?

[Answer] I don't think so. Don't forget, we didn't use force first. Britain didn't break the peace. Argentina used force. Argentina is the invader, Argentina is the occupier, so it's not for her to complain about other people using force to recapture our own possessions...

[Lindley] But have you made it harder for them...I beg your pardon.

[Answer] And to see that our people don't live under an invader. After all in a way Argentina is punishing these British people there because they refused to belong to Argentina. They refused to let us discuss sovereignty with Argentina. Now in the face of what's happened in the last few weeks, in the face of the fact that Argentina hasn't withdrawn at all, but has piled on her soldiers, and equipment and aircraft onto those islands, I don't think the fact that we took South Georgia would increase the Argentine's resistance to a peaceful settlement. I hope it will make them realize that we are quietly determined in support of a principle. We don't want to use force. Democracies never do.

[Kee] There is always though this difficult problem, isn't there, in using force as a backing for diplomacy: that if you use the force and it's successful, as it was in this case, you do injure Argentinian pride and perhaps make them more intransigent rather than pliable.

[Answer] Force has been used: It's been used against our territory, against our people; It's been used totally illegally, and if this kind of force is allowed to succeed, there'll be many, many other examples the world over. And someone, some country has to care enough about it to say "stop." It's like, in a way, those hijackings. Some people take the view -- some countries -- of the hijack plane being let through as quickly as possible. That's the way to increase hijackings. When we got one coming here I said: Right, they come down here and understand -- they're not going to take off again. That's the way to stop hijackings.

[Kee] And you mean it's not the hijackers pride that is your first consideration in dealing with them?

[Answer] My first consideration is the British people of those islands, who for years and years would not let us even discuss sovereignty with the Argentinians because they did not want to go under the Argentine. And the Argentine is now punishing them for it and it's our duty to them, our people, our sovereign territory, to stand up for them and to show the whole world we're prepared to.

[Lindley] If this military action in South Georgia is designed to spur negotiations on, as you say, how long will you give Argentina to respond before you have to take the next military step?

[Answer] One thing I was trying to explain in the House this afternoon is that you can't just go on indefinitely with negotiations. Some people say: But don't use force while the negotiations are continuing. It's a very easy argument, isn't it? It just enables the Argentinians to carry on negotiations on and on and on, a perfectly easy ploy. And in the meantime, it will get more and more difficult for us to use a military option 8,000 miles away from home, at the onset of winter, in very terrible weather -- gales, freezing -- that would be their ploy.

[Lindley] So you can't say at the moment how long you will give Argentina before we move again?

[Answer] No, of course I can't. I should be very remiss if I were to give any hint, because it would put the lives of some of our people at risk, and that I would never do.

[Lindley] Prime Minister, can I ask you this: What is the danger, do you think, that this crisis will escalate to involve other countries, perhaps even involving Russia in some way in support of Argentina?

[Answer] I dont't believe that it will involve the Soviet Union.

[Lindley] Other countries?

[Answer] I don't believe it will involve other countries.

[Lindley] You think you can contain it?

[Answer] Yes. You know, other countries are obviously very slow to become engaged. They sometimes can help, for example, as we helped the United States in a multinational force in Sinai, because when that withdrawal was undertaken -- and as you know that was good news also this weekend, on the Egyptian-Israeli agreement -- the United States asked ourselves and a number of other countries to take part, not in a United Nations force, but in a multinational force, to see that the withdrawal took place and that it was adhered to. Some countries will come and help in these kinds of operations but not get involved in the immediate dispute.

[Lindley] You took action in South Georgia before the Organization of American States [OAS] had met as they're doing now. What happens -- how will you react if their decision goes against Britain?

[Answer] Yes, can I make one thing clear? There are certain international meetings scheduled, but you can't, when you're deciding to take action, have those paramount in your mind, for the simple reason -- supposing you were to say: Look, we won't take that action now -- you're dealing with the most inclement, uncertain weather conditions, in an area where gales are the usual order of the day. So you have to decide on practical considerations...

[Lindley] Like D-Day?

[Answer] Like D-Day. You have to decide on practical considerations when to take your military action. We owe that to our own boys. And you simply can't say: You must try to stop for a couple of days because of the OAS or another meeting.

[Lindley] Prime Minister, can I get you to clarify what seem, from what you've already said, to be sticking points? First, that the Argentine invasion forces must leave the Falklands. Second, that the islands should return to British administration. On your first condition, does that mean that every Argentine must withdraw, or would you allow some Argentines to remain behind, perhaps civilians or policemen or something?

[Answer] Oh well, the military forces must withdraw, that's United Nations resolution. The military forces must withdraw completely.

[Lindley] Could they remain behind in any way as civilians or policemen or something like that?

[Answer] There are about -- on the Falkland Islands -- there are about 40 Argentinians, but only about 20 who reside there and the others change over for business reasons; some of them do a spell of duty from Argentina and so there's quite a turnover. But look, the Falklands has no Argentine history as far as Argentinians living there are concerned. The people there are of British stock -- the enormous majority, about 1,800 of them, there are about 20 civilian residents and about 20 others who come from time to time. [as heard]

[Lindley] Could we share in any civilian interim administration with Argentina?

[Answer] Well, you're talking about an interim administration as a means of restoring to the longer term solution. [sentence as heard] There obviously would have to be an arrangement to supervise the withdrawal from the islands, and of course such an arrangement is one that is being considered although the details, of course, are not decided in any way. It's a matter of practicality, really. They've got a lot of forces there, and they have to get off, and someone has to supervise the withdrawal. So you'd need to have some authority to go on actually to supervise that withdrawal and to see that it was carried out in accordance with any agreement. So that, in itself, would mean some interim arrangement. In the meantime, of course, the law and the administration have to be carried on, and the law is British law, and the executive and legislative councils are the British executive and legislative councils, and most of the work is done and exercised through them in accordance with the constitution of the Falkland Islands.

[Kee] In order to get them to comply, it does seem we'll have to offer them something, because they're not going, or we'll have to use force. Could we offer any form of joint Argentine administration or could we allow them just to keep their flag there, because they've made such a point of their flag staying at all costs?

[Answer] What do you mean, keep their flag there? Not as an indication of sovereignty in any way. If, after all, if an ambassador is in a place, he flies his own flag in his own gounds; that's different.

But I mean, our ambassador in our grounds all over the world will fly his own flag on his own ground -- but not a flag as an indication of sovereignty in any way. The sovereignty is British and has not changed by invasion.

[Kee] And the sovereignty, of course, is to be possibly negotiated, or talked about, in the second phase?

[Answer] We have in a way been discussing sovereignty for quite a long time. But if it came even to talking about leaseback, the islanders wouldn't contemplate it. The right of self-determination is under the United Nations Charter for the people. It is not, certainly, the only thing, because when you come to the dependencies, namely, South Georgia and South Sandwich, they have no settled population. And again I stress, they're not dependencies of the Falklands; they're dependencies of Britain. Now they have no settled population, and there is a right of sovereignty. Our title -- after all, South Georgia was discovered by Captain Cook -- their title is different, we own them through a different title from the Falklands or we have sovereignty over them. So you can't, in looking at that territory, apply the same test.

[Kee] Prime Minister, can I just bring you back for a moment to the principle of self-determination on which you stand so firmly? If we continue to say that those islanders' views are paramount and that they do have, as it were, a veto over the negotiations, what can the Argentines think there is to negotiate?

[Answer] But you can have come up right against the problem. This is the problem of a negotiation between a dictatorship which does not believe in the rights of the people -- and you know how many people have disappeared -- and a democracy that does. And really you've said it all for me: We're standing up for the rights of democracy, law and liberty and those are very, very big things.

[Kee] Prime Minister, you've expressed your admiration for Mr Haig's efforts at peace. But I wonder if now you would like America to come down firmly on our side?

[Answer] If the negotiations don't get anywhere -- and I think they'll have to come to a head soon -- then Mr Haig I think, has made it abundantly clear that if the negotiations do not succeed, the United States -- one of the great democracies of the world -- would be on the side of Britain.

[Kee] You mentioned just now "coming to a head" -- "negotiations coming to a head." Can we still not look a little into what that might mean?

[Answer] Well, you can't go on for ever and ever with us saying: Look, you must withdraw because of the United Nations, and if you withdraw, when your withdrawal is complete, of course, we'll withdraw our task force and then we'll go back to negotiations. You can't go on for ever saying that.

SINN FEIN TO CONTEST SEATS IN ULSTER ELECTIONS

[Colin Brady dispatch: "Sinn Fein Will Seek Seats in Assembly"]

[Excerpt] Belfast -- Provisional Sinn Fein, the IRA's legal political front, confirmed in Dublin yesterday that it would contest seats in elections to the Northern Ireland political assembly planned for the autumn. But Mr Rory Brady, the organisation's president made it clear that any successful candidates would follow the party's traditional abstentionist policy and refuse to take their seats.

"We will be fighting the elections with the intention of giving the Nationalists a republican voice and an alternative," he said. It is expected that the Sinn Fein campaign will be a limited one extending only to areas where it has guaranteed support.

KIPRIANOU DENIES AKEL ALLIANCE CONDITIONS EXIST

[Text] President of the Republic and Chairman of the Democratic Party [DIKO] Kiprianou, speaking at a gathering of his party's cadres at Paralimni, has stated the party's goal was always to achieve a democratic coalition which would contest the next presidential election.

With the party's authorization, we reached an agreement with AKEL on a democratic coalition, he said. We prepared a program and issued a joint statement. We have not closed the doors to any other democratic forces. It is the other democratic parties which did not want, at least to date, to join in the framework of cooperation. Our doors remain open, said President Kiprianou.

The content of the agreed-upon program, he continued, as well as the content of the declaration, represent the true interests of the people and the aims and goals are those which serve our national issue in the best possible way and the peoples prosperity which are the necessary substructure of the struggle for liberty. AKEL, President Kiprianou said, did not want to impose conditions or to make cooperation difficult by making claims.

Referring to reports about a directorate and a superauthority, President Kiprianou said there is no effort from any direction to isolate the president or the ministerial council from their constitutional rights and authorities. There is neither a directorate nor any superauthority, he added. There are only the necessary measures for the dictated close cooperation.

Referring to reports about a communist danger and about a people's democracy, President Kiprianou said these allegations are ridiculous, to say the least. He added there will be no effort to alter the social and economic system now in operation.

EDEK Issues Statement

[Text] The socialist EDEK party's Central Secretariat has issued a statement on the situation following the declaration of cooperation between AKEL and the Democratic Party [DIKO]. The statement says the party has made a final and irrevocable decision to contest the presidential elections with its chairman, Lissaridhis, as candidate.

The statement says President Kiprianou agreed to the cooperation with his reelection as his sole goal, while the AKEL leaders agreed to it with the aim of securing petty advantages by supporting a rightwing socioeconomic policy in return. Furthermore, the statement says that in regard to the Cyprus problem, the two parties' joint program does not utilize the Greek Government's policy. It adds: The joint program's reference to the treaties of alliance, guarantee and establishment as well as the ommission of occupation from the four components of the international aspect constitute an undermining of the substance of the Cyprus issue, which is the occupation and the demand for its termination.

The EDEK statement further says that the joint program does not elucidate on the views which each party abandoned in order to reach this result. The statement reiterates EDEK's view that the government reshuffle was made on the basis of partisan criteria and not in order to form an interim government that will guarantee irreproachable elections.

GOVERNMENT AGAIN STATES PROGRAM CONSTITUTIONAL

[TExt] In answer to a question, the government spokesman has stated that the fact that the Council of Ministers was asked to implement the policy provided under the Democratic Party-AKEL minimum program does not violate the constitution. The spokesman stated that implementation of the minimum program before the elections had begun because it coincides, to a great extent, with the existing government policy. He said: This policy is being adopted and implemented by the Council of Ministers and nobody else. Nothing, he added, in the program replaces the authorities and jurisdictions of the president of the republic and the Council of Ministers.

CAGATAY ADDRESSES NATIONAL UNITY PARTY CONGRESS

[TExt] Lefkosa, 25 Apr (AA) -- Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus said the true liberation of Cyprus lay in cooperation between the two Cypriot communities. Addressing the National Unity Party's special congress as its chairman Saturday, Cagatay deplored the announced collaboration between the Greek Cypriot party "DIKO" and the communist "AKEL" party to support the re-election of current Greek Cypriot leader Spiros Kiprianou.

Cagatay also condemned the attempts by Kiprianou, together with Premier Papandreou of Greece, to push aside intercommunal talks in order to internationalize the Cyprus issue. He cited the attempts to get a draft resolution on Cyprus passed by the U.S. House of Representatives.

Observing Israel had escalated its aggression against Lebanon recently, Cagatay called the recent attacks as a clear sign of attempted genocide against the Palestinian people, whose just cause Turkish Cypriots support wholeheartedly.

KIPRIANOU: IOANNIDHIS RESIGNATION UNJUSTIFIED

NC261747 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1730 GMT 26 Apr 82

[Text] Yeoryios Ioannidhis submitted his resignation today from the post of representative of the Greek Cypriot side at the intercommunal talks. Ioannidhis submitted his resignation to President Kiprianou, whom he visited this afternoon. A statement issued by Ioannidhis' office states that the reasons for his resignation are explained in a letter he handed to the president.

In a statement tonight President Kiprianou said he explained to Ioannidhis the reasons for which he considers this action both unjustified and totally untimely at a time the UN secretary general, he added, resolved on a speeding up of the talks and discussion on the basic issues which would demonstrate to what extent there could or could not be any progress. Because, President Kiprianou added in his statement, the Ioannidhis resignation is totally unjustified and, as I understand, he added, it is submitted for other reasons. I could not refuse to accept it, and I reserve my right to reply in detail to his letter. Despite this, President Kiprianou concluded in his statement, I thanked Ioannidhis for his services and for the cooperation we have had.

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ON CHNOUPEK VISIT RELEASED

[Text] Constructive negotiations between the two Cypriot communities cannot be conducted on the basis of proposals that aim at the island's division. This is stressed in a joint communique issued this afternoon on the official visit to Cyprus by Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Chnoupek at the invitation of Foreign Minister Rolandhis.

In their talks, the two ministers stressed again the importance of achieving a final and just solution of the internal aspect of the Cyprus issue through negotiations between the two communities under UN auspices, without foreign interventions and in the interest of an independent and united Cyprus. The two ministers expressed regret that the UN and Nonaligned Movement's resolutions on Cyprus have not yet been implemented. At the same time, they stressed their support for the efforts being exerted by the UN secretary general concerning the intercommunal talks in the hope these will result in the necessary momentum leading to an early achievement of progress in the negotiating process.

At the same time, the two ministers agreed that a just and lasting solution can be accomplished only with the respect for the independence, sovereignty, territorial intergrity, unity and nonalignment of the Republic of Cyprus as well with the respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms of all Cypriots. The joint communique adds: The two sides have also stressed that the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Cyprus territory is essential in attaining a lasting solution of the problem while, at the same time, they stood against unilateral actions that could unfavorably affect such a solution.

The joint communique goes on: The two ministers share the view that a representative international conference on the Cyprus issue, within the UN framework, would contribute considerably to the problem's peaceful solution. At the same time, they stressed that the island's complete demilitarization and disarmament would be in the interest not only of its people but also of the cause of peace, security and stability in the area. The joint communique further says that the two sides paid attention to the humanitarian problem of the missing persons and agreed that every effort should be exerted to secure the early tracing of their fate.

During their talks, Mr Rolandhis and Mr Chnoupek noted with satisfaction that there is identity or proximity of views between the two sides on many international issues while, at the same time, they expressed serious concern about the present international situation.

Referring to bilateral relations, Mr Rolandhis and Mr Chnoupek expressed satisfaction at the development of bilateral trade and examined the possibilities for further strengthening the economic cooperation between the two countries. The two ministers also signed a legal cooperation agreement between Cyprus and Czechoslovakia. Mr Chnoupek has invited his Cypriot counterpart to visit Czechoslovakia. The invitation has been accepted, and the exact date for the visit will be set later through diplomatic channels.

DELEGATION TO CZECHOSLOVAKIA -- A Cyprus trade delegation departed for Prague, where it will contact various state organizations concerning expansion of Cyprus exports to Czechoslovakia. The delegation, under the director general of the Ministry of Commerce and Industry, will also sign the annual trade protocol between Cyprus and Czechoslovakia. KKE CENTRAL COMMITTEE MAY DAY PROCLAMATION

NC252042 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 25 Apr 82 pp 1, 2

[Excerpts] Workers, Workwomen, Employees! Working people and pensioners! On the occasion of May Day, the KKE Central Committee addresses warm militant greetings to you and calls on you to stand again in the vanguard of our people's struggle for peace, national independence, democratization, a true change and the opening of the road to socialism.

World peace is being threatened more than any other time during the postwar years. The reactionary warlike circles, with the U.S. imperialists in the forefront, answer to the peace proposals by the Soviet Union and the socialist countries as well as to the people's demand for detente and disarmament by intensifying armaments, promoting the policy of intervention in foreign countries -- such as in martyred El Salvador -- with threats against Nicaragua, Cuba, Libya. They strengthen the inflamatory policy of Israel, intensify the antisocialist campaign and continue their undermining role in Poland. They insist on the installation of nuclear missiles in Europe and promote their plans for a nuclear showdown.

Capitalism, by its very nature, cannot give the working people peace or secure their economic progress without crises and unemployment, without making political and social life autocratic. In the face of the war threat, the international proletariat unites in the struggle for the defense of peace. Its battle against armaments and for detente and peace is firmly linked with the struggles for deep political and social changes, abolition of the system of exploitation and for the peaceful socialist future of the world.

Our country's working class strengthens its bonds with the international proletariat in the common battle for the defense of peace. It struggles for a nuclear-free Balkans, removal of nuclear weapons and foreign bases from our country, withdrawal of our country from the imperialist NATO bloc and its liberation from the economic and political subjugation to the EEC monopolies.

Workers, employees, working people throughout the country: In its May Day account of struggles and conquests this year, the working class notes a big victory: The removal of the rightwing from the rule of the country and the creation of possibilities for a substantive change in the economic, social and political life of the country. However, despite certain democratic measures, the PASOK government does proceed toward the change which the country needs. It goes back on its declarations in the face of pressure by the monopolies and the rightwing which try to lead the country's life toward a reactionary retrogression.

The KKE declares that change, with socialism placed in perspective, is your affair. What you have achieved with the October elections will be promoted through your struggle:

-- To rid our country of the chains of dependency and really become nationally independent.

-- For our country to enter the road of development to the benefit of the working people, for the complete democratization without dossiers and compartmentalization and for the opening of the road to socialism.

-- Align together and repel every attempt to undermine and corrupt your struggle. Strengthen the political work within the working class to further increase the party's influence, which is a determining factor for the success of the class, unifying and militant workers' May Day.

-- Long live the workers' May Day, a day of international solidarity and workers battle throughout the world.

-- Honor and glory to the workers of Chicago, to all the heroes and martyrs who have dyed with their blood the red banner of May Day.

-- Honor and glory to the 200 patriotic communists who were executed on May Day of 1944.

LIBYAN ENVOY INTERVIEWED ON AL-QADHDHAFI VISIT

NC251635 Athens KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 25 Apr 82 pp 1, 2

[Excerpts] The aim of the Libyan leader's visit -- who expressed the desire many months ago to meet with Mr Papandreou -- is to establish closer ties with Greece, because he believes that:

-- The Greek Government maintains a very favorable stance toward the problems of the Arab world and also promotes cooperation among the Mediterranean countries.

-- Libya's "message" about the resolute facing of U.S. military presence in the Mediterranean -- which, in the opinion of Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi, can also have destructive repercussions on all of Western Europe -- can better pass through Greece to the European Community countries.

Libyan People's Bureau Secretary al-Qammudi, who also exercises ambassador duties, has talked to our political editor K. Angelopoulos about Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi's visit:

"Our leader's visit is completely natural. We have always maintained good relations with Greece. But now, with PASOK in power, we feel there is greater understanding toward us, the Arab world and the Palestinian struggle."

For the Libyan Government, "U.S. imperialism" is the number one enemy. In this connection, Al-Qammudi says: "We believe that our area, the Mediterranean region, today is the most dangerous in the world, because of the superpowers' confrontation there and the foreign intervention. Since the revolution, Libya has been in conflict with U.S. imperialism, which threatens the Arab world's interests. We firmly and immutably stand against the interests of U.S. imperialism which wants to strengthen its position in the Mediterranean. The Americans keep demanding bigger military facilities."

Asked if Libya is particularly interested about the presence of U.S. bases in Greece, Mr al-Qammudi replied; "We are not particularly concerned over this. In general, we are against all foreign intervention in the Mediterranean. We have common experience with Greece on this. We know that foreign bases in every country have a negative effect on the cause of peace."

Libya considers the Papandreou government's "Arab policy" particularly positive. Mr al-Qammudi says: "It is a very positive stand. We see that PASOK supports the Arabs and also portrays their views at international forums. Moreover, we see with greater satisfaction that the positions of the Arabs are promoted by your country's mass media; this is obvious."

Libya desires to proceed with developing its relations with the West European countries with which it considers having common interests and a common enemy -- U.S. foreign policy. In connection with this, Mr al-Qammudi says: "We already have good economic relations with Germany, France, England, Spain and other European countries. We feel that these relations should become closer, because we all belong to the region. Developments in our conflict with the United States will also affect Western Europe. When Reagan talks about a limited nuclear war, it is tantamount to saying, "Let the Europeans go to Hell; we only care about the protection of the United States." This is the mentality of U.S. imperialism. In Western Europe, at the same time, our leader wants to make it clear that support for liberation movements does not mean support for "international terrorism," as U.S. propaganda likes to say. We already think Europe understands Libya better.

Mr al-Qammudi says in conclusion: "One of the main targets of our leader's visit is to convey through Greece our message to our friends in Western Europe."

NEW ARREST ORDER FOR ECEVIT ISSUED IN ANKARA

TA261545 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1540 GMT 26 Apr 82

[Text] Ankara, 26 Apr (AA) -- Former Chairman of the defunct Republican People's Party Bulent Ecevit appeared before an Ankara martial law court Monday to hear a new order for his arrest for violating National Security Council edict No 52 and Article 16 of the Martial Law Code No 1402. The court ruled that Ecevit had broken the law by a letter he sent to the correspondent of Dutch television, which was also broadcast over the BBC.

Ecevit is already under arrest since 10 April pending trial in connection with an interview he gave to a Norwegian newspaper. His lawyers' objection to the first arrest order for Ecevit was rejected Monday by another military court, and the former RPP chairman (?was) taken to the Army Language School at Mamak where he had been placed under custody.

CANADA

SUPPLY OF NUCLEAR FUEL TO ARGENTINA TO CONTINUE

PY242215 Buenos Aires LATIN in Spanish 1403 GMT 24 Apr 82

[Text] Ottawa, 24 Apr (LATIN-REUTER) -- Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau today rejected a petition for Canada to suspend shipments of nuclear fuel for the reactor that it is building in Argentina and to withdraw Canadian technicians.

Canadian trade sanctions against Argentina -- imposed after the Buenos Aires government occupied the Falkland Islands on 2 April -- only apply to imports, Trudeau told members of Parliament who had told Trudeau that Argentina would use the reactor to fabricate nuclear arms.

Ian Waddell of the New Democratic Party demanded that the government suspend shipments of nuclear fuel worth $4 million which, according to Waddell, were being sent to Buenos Aires. Trudeau replied that Argentina had been comitted to adopting special safeguards when it signed the contract for the Candu heavy water reactor which is being finished near Buenos Aires.

Press reports had said that a cabinet document had expressed more serious concern than that expressed publicly by ministers over the possibility that Argentina might use the reactor in order to make atomic weapons.

MALTA

NATIONALISTS' SEATS VACATED IN PARLIAMENT

NC262240 Paris AFP in English 2236 GMT 26 Apr 82

[Text] Valetta, Malta, 26 Apr (AFP) -- The speaker of the House of Representatives, Dr Daniel Micallef, tonight declared that the Nationalist Party has forfeited its seats in Parliament, which it has been boycotting since it opened last February. The speaker said that elections will be held to fill the vacant seats.

The Nationalist Party has been boycotting Parliament because it could not accept a situation where the ruling Labour Party won a majority of three seats although the Nationalists outpolled Labour by 4,500 votes in the Dec 12 general election. The Nationalists blamed this on "gerrymandering" of electoral districts. Nationalist leader Dr Eddie Fenech Adami said tonight that the decision would deprive the majority of voters of their representatives in Parliament. The party would now change its political action, he said.

POLAND UNABLE TO PAY INTEREST ON $300M LOAN

[Special DIE PRESSE report by "M.F."]

[Summary] Poland's financial problems have apprently further deteriorated: Although in the past the country attempted to give preferential treatment to paying interest on project-linked loans, it has now failed to pay interest -- due at the end of March -- on the $300 million loan it was granted by Austria in 1980 in connection with coming Polish coal deliveries. Since the Federal Treasury had guaranteed this loan vis-a-vis a bank syndicate, the government is liable to pay the amount involved -- 80 million schillings -- to the banks, but the finance minister cannot make such an allotment because the 1982 budget law does not contain any authorization for such guarantee payments. Hence the banks will have to grant the government a respite for payment until the enactment of an amendment to the 1982 budget law authorizing the additional expenditure, probably by next fall. The $300 million loan concerned was granted to Poland by an Austrian bank syndicate because Poland had insisted on it as a condition for its signing a long-term coal treaty with Austria. The loan has a duration of 10 years. The coal agreement provides for delivery to Austria of 1 million tons of Polish bituminous coal annually over a period of 20 years, beginning in 1983. The quarterly interest payments on the loan were made punctually until the end of 1981.

LANC COMMENTS ON U.S., CANADIAN VISITS

[Summary] Vienna (AZ) -- At a Vienna press conference on the results of his trip to the United States and Canada, Interior Minister Erwin Lanc declared [on 23 April] that from now on 1,000 Polish refugees per month will be able to proceed from Austria to the United States, and that Canada will accept 3,500 Polish refugees this year. At present there are still some 35,000 Poles in Austria, Lanc said. He pointed out that during his visit no new immigration quotas were fixed, but that talks on this subject would be held later on, if necessary.

In reply to journalists' questions Lanc said that the deterioration of the situation in the Middle East would lead to an increase of terrorism in Europe and that Austria would probably not be spared in this respect. Although Arab countries or the PLO would not permit actions directed against Austria, the terrorist groups could hardly be controlled. "Commenting on the latest terrorist attacks in Vienna and Paris, the interior minister said that at present it was idle to speculate on the perpetrators. To date there have been two telephone calls in which an 'Islamic revolutienary guard' assumed responsiblility for the attacks, but these confessions were not absolutely credible, Lanc said. He declared that early in May he would pay a short visit to Jordan, where he was going to discuss security questions."

SCHMIDT CONFIRMS CABINET RESHUFFLE; ADDS DETAILS

[Text] Bonn, 27 Apr (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today confirmed the personnel changes in his cabinet reshuffle announced yesterday. He officially announced the list of changes -- which affects only SPD politicians in the cabinet -- to the executive of the SPD Bundestag Parliamentary Group.

Accordingly, the head of the chancellor's office, State Secretary Manfred Lahnstein, is to be appointed the new federal finance minister, replacing Hans Matthoefer in this office, who in turn replaces the outgoing minister of posts and telecommunications, Kurt Gscheidle. The new minister of labor and social welfare is Heinz Westphal, until now finance expert in the SPD group. The former minister of labor, Herbert Ehrenberg, is leaving the cabinet. Anke Fuchs, hitherto state secretary in the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare, takes over from Antje Huber as minister of youth, family and health.

A new detail of the government rearrangement at state secretary level, according to the chancellor, is that Lothar Wrede will be new parliamentary state secretary under the minister for intra-German affairs, Egon Franke. Wrede replaces Heinz Kreutzman in this post.

Another new fact is that Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, who is returning to the chancellor's office as minister of state, will also assume responsibility as the Federal Government's official in charge of Berlin. This post was previously filled by State Secretary Dietrich Spangenberg of the Intra-German Affairs Ministry. The chancellor also confirmed the replacement of Government Spokesman Kurt Becker by his predecessor of many years' standing, Klaus Boelling.

POLISH INTELLECTUALS SEND APPEAL TO GOVERNMENT

[Text] Bonn, 27 Apr (DPA) -- A group of Polish intellectuals living in the West have called for a tougher line by the Federal Government toward Moscow and Warsaw. In an appeal published in Bonn today they demand above all that no direct or indirect credits be granted to the governments in Warsaw or Moscow until the political prisoners in Poland have been released and civil freedoms have been restored. Furthermore, the FRG should "out of political good sense" renounce the natural gas pipeline deal with the Soviet Union, which could become "an instrument for blackmailing the free part of Europe."

The "Polish appeal to the Germans" was signed by, among others, the winner of the Nobel Prize for literature, Czeslaw Milosz, by the philosopher Leszek Kolakowski, the winner of the Peace Prize of the German book trade, by the writer Jerzy Kosinski and the German literature scholar Ryszard Batory, a member of the foreign section of the independent trade union Solidarity.

The appeal also calls for humanitarian aid -- which is acknowledged by all the signatories -- to be given to the suffering Polish people outside government channels via church-run and independent charitable organizations or trustworthy individuals.

CHEYSSON ALLUDES TO SYRIANS IN TERRORISM REMARKS

LD271920 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 27 Apr 82

[Text] Listen to the point of view of Minister of External Relations Claude Cheysson, who is replying to Quentin Dickenson of France INTER. The head of French foreign affairs explains the measures which France can and will implement in the fight against terrorism:

[Begin Cheysson recording] We have the same means as our partners in the civilized countries. We are not going to place the country in a state of siege, abolish all liberties, renounce the right of asylum -- certainly not. On the other hand, we must display the greatest possible rigor in the application of the law.

We have legalized the position of a great number of foreign workers in France and we are proud of that. But those whose position is not legitimate must suffer the consequences. Diplomats have allowed themselves to abuse their diplomatic status to facilitate the entry of banned material, propaganda material, and to facilitate contacts. Like the two Syrian diplomats a few days ago, they will be declared personae non gratae, that is, they will be expelled.

We must show evidence of great rigor in this respect. Cooperation between the special services is important in this matter. It has developed and it must be developed further. Finally, terrorist networks are now operating in connivance with one another, and it is indispensable for the security services which protect our population also to work in cooperation with one another. IMPORT RESTRICTIONS SET ON ARGENTINE PRODUCTS

[Text] Rome, 27 Apr (ANSA) -- Italian import restrictions requiring Foreign Trade Ministry authorization for all goods coming into the country from Argentina went into effect today and will stay in effect until May 17. The measure was drafted by Foreign Trade Minister Nicola Capria and Finance Minister Rino Formica in compliance with the economic sanctions the Brussels-based European Economic Community enacted earlier this month against Argentina for the South American state's seizure of the Falkland Islands.

Imports authorized prior to April 16 will still be admitted into country as will products for which import declarations were submitted to the Foreign Ministry before that date but processed later. Also exempted from the embargo are goods which were held up in customs or were in the process of being shipped on April 16, as well as goods that were being delivered in compliance with contracts sealed before that date. Regulations governing embargoed products, customs inspections and agricultural import certificates that were in effect before April 16 will still apply.

Papers showing contracts sealed before mid-April have to be submitted to the Foreign Trade Ministry or the Customs Department before the goods will be cleared for entrance.

RED BRIGADES CLAIM KILLING NAPLES COUNCILMAN

AU271550 Rome ANSA in English 1543 GMT 27 Apr 82

[Excerpt] Naples, 27 Apr (ANSA) -- The Red Brigades have claimed responsibility for today's killing of Christian Democrat regional councilman Raffaele Delcogliano, 38, and his chauffeur Aldo Ieramo, 45, in downtown Naples. The execution squad was made up of three persons, two women who opened fire on the official's bullet-proof car and a man at the wheel of a car first used to halt the other vehicle and then to flee the scene. The killers used diamond-tipped bullets, a caliber-nine gun and a 7.62 rifle like those used by NATO.

The attack came at 0800 GMT near the main entrance of the Naples port. A little more than a hour later, a call to a local daily said that the Red Brigades were responsible. Police believe the call is legitimate because the rifle used in the attack was almost certainly part of the booty the brigades made off with when they robbed an army barracks two months ago.

Delcogliano was the councilman for the Campania region, which includes the city of Naples.

GOVERNMENT OPPOSES UNIFIED IBERIAN NATO COMMAND

[Text] Portugal has demanded of NATO that its armed forces should continue to belong to SACLANT (Supreme Allied Command Atlantic) and that the Spanish forces, when they are integrated, should come under SACEUR (Supreme Allied Command Europe). This is one of the two demands which Portugal is making as regards Spain's joining NATO's military structure and which are revealed in the report of the Parliamentary Committee on National Defense, to whose text ANOP had access yesterday.

The other demand is that Portugal will not accept a unified command of the Iberian countries' armed forces. SACLANT, with headquarters in Norfolk (United States) and under which COMIBERLANT (DEIRAS) comes, extends from the North Pole to the Tropic of Cancer and from U.S. coastal waters to those of Europe and Africa, except for the channel and the British Isles. SACEUR, with headquarters in Mons (Belgium), extends from the North Cape to the Mediterranean and from the Atlantic to Turkey's eastern border, excluding Britain and Portugal.

The parliamentary committee on defense's report reveals that at a meeting with government representatives the latter "disclosed that although the membership protocol does not link Spain to any NATO military structure, which can only happen at Spain's explicit request when it is a full member, Portugal has fully informed the other alliance partners that there are principles which it will never relinquish and which govern Portugal's approval of Spain's possible request to belong to NATO's military structure."

The report adds that the stance on the part of Portugal, which holds a right of veto, "has met with no objection from the other partners or the Spanish Government itself." Let it be stated that the Assembly of the Republic will begin today to debate the government proposal on Spain's joining NATO. Foreign Minister Andre Goncalves Pereira's presence in the plenum is expected.

In the meantime, in statements to ANOP, Goncalves Pereira described as "extremely positive" the statements by his Spanish counterpart on Spain's joining NATO and the consequences for Portugal. The Portuguese minister also emphasized as "extremely positive" the acknowledgment that Spain does not intend to seek any change in the NATO command zones which may affect Portuguese geostrategic interests, as Portugal views them.

"This final element seems to be the most important, since Spain acknowledges and promises to respect the definition of Portuguese interests as made or to be made by Portugal," Goncalves Pereira added.

For his part, in statements to Spanish National Radio, [Portuguese Socialist Party leader] Jaime Gama has stated that the Socialist Party will not vote against Spain's NATO membership protocol. "We will never vote against, since the problem does not lie in Spain's membership but at the level of delimiting the two countries' powers after entry," Jaime Gama explained, after emphasizing that his party is waiting for the government to explain the guarantees it has secured in Brussels as regards Portugal's participation and role in the NATO area after Spain's entry in order to decide whether to vote in favor or abstain.

In Costa Rica the Spanish prime minister will attend the swearing-in of the country's president, Luis Alberto Monge. In Ecuador, Calvo-Sotelo will pay an official bilateral visit.

PEREZ-LLORCA VIEWS NATO, EEC TIES WITH PORTUGAL

[Text] The Spanish foreign minister told ANOP in Madrid yesterday that "Spain has no intention of seeking changes in the NATO military command zones which might affect Portugal's strategic interests." Perez-Llorca stated that Spain's joining NATO "represents a political rapprochement with Portugal, and if on some occasions the issue of mutual interests in the NATO command zones has arisen, this cannot be a problem."

Concerning the two countries' joining the EEC, Perez-Llorca stated that "the common nature of their interests has such depth, magnitude and dimension that they clearly prevail over any secondary consideration." "There is no rivalry between the two countries but a convergence of interests," he emphasized.

The Spanish minister said that there is no distrust or touchiness between the two countries, but if they existed, "They would have to be surmounted always with a deep sense of mutual respect for mutual interests and friendship." For the Spanish minister and his government, "The maintenance of good relations with Portugal is a priority element of Spanish foreign policy."

Perez-Llorca stated that in this context the treaty of friendship and cooperation between Portugal and Spain "is an essential element," and that both it and the operative machinery resulting from it "are working well."

Concerning the current state of relations between the two countries, Perez-Llorca said that they "are positive." Perez-Llorca stated that "moreover, there is an element of fruitfulness in the democratic identity of the political systems and in the similar European vocation."

PROSECUTOR SEEKS JAIL TERMS FOR COUP LEADERS

[Text] Madrid, 27 Apr (AFP) -- The military prosecutor of the council of war here today sought jail sentences of 30 years for the three alleged leaders of the abortive Spanish coup of last year. In seeking the sentences, the prosecutor said Lieutenant-Colonel Antonio Tejero -- who seized the Spanish Parliament at the head of 288 Civil Guards on February 23, 1981 -- had launched the attempted putsch, and was later joined by Lieutenant-General Jaime Milans del Bosch and General Antonio Armada.

He asked for the 30 other defendants to be jailed from one and a half to 15 years, and sought a 10 year sentence for Juan Garcia Carres, the only civilian on trial. The prosecutor also asked for the military defendants to be struck from the ranks of the Spanish armed forces.

He rejected defense claims that King Juan Carlos was involved in the coup attempt.

PARLIAMENTARIANS END CENTRAL AMERICA TOUR

PM270819 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 20 Apr 82 p 21

[Jesus Ceberio dispatch: "Spanish Parliamentarians' Tour of Central America Concludes"]

[Text] Mexico City -- All the countries involved in the Central American crisis are hoping for Spain to play a far more active role than that played so far in the search for peace. This is one of the conclusions reached by the six Spanish deputies who concluded in Mexico City Sunday a 7-day tour which took them previously to Panama, Nicaragua and El Salvador.

The aim of this tour was to seek first-hand information with a view to a coming parliamentary debate in which an attempt will be made to adjust Spanish foreign policy in one of the most strife-ridden regions of the world. The parliamentary delegation, headed by Congress [of Deputies] Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Ignacio Camunas, has held meetings at the highest level with all the sectors involved in the El Salvador conflict and in the difficult Nicaraguan political situation.

The delegation's ideological diversity (Ignacio Camunas and Carlos Sentis for the Union of the Democratic Center; Miguel Angel Martinez for the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] Jaime Ballesteros for the PCE; Joaquin Molins for Centrists of Catalonia; and Andoni Monforte for the Basque Nationalist Party) did not prevent consensus on one basic issue: the insufficient Spanish diplomatic presence in the area, which must be strengthened in order to play the role which the protagonists in the conflict themselves hope from our country.

However, when it comes to outlining a complete policy, the inevitable differences among the various parties emerge, although they all acknowledge that seeing the situation from close up has helped to bring closer their party stances.

Centrist Ignacio Camuas believes that in the process of pacifying Central America "Spain should join forces with other countries of the area to create an atmosphere of cooperation and peace." In his opinion, it is not so much a matter of putting forward new initiatives ("There is a welter of proposals," he said), as of creating conditions to enable those involved to enter into a process of dialogue.

On the other hand, Socialist Miguel Angel Martinez believes that the peace initiatives put forward so far, and confined in fact to those of Panama and Mexico, are insufficient and that Spain could gather together the material put forward and reassemble a specific plan, possibly in cooperation with other nations. "If that possibility exists, it would be a mistake to disregard it," he said. He added that the PSOE will submit a motion to this effect if an agreed approach cannot be achieved among all the parliamentary groups.

A second issue on which the six deputies were in agreement was the need for Spain to join in the plan of economic assistance for Central America and the Caribbean, in which the United States, Canada, Mexico and Venezuela are taking part initially and in which Colombia recently joined. Despite the difficult Spanish economic situation, the parliamentary delegation was confident about the possibility that the next state budget could include an item devoted to this end.

[Text] Madrid, 27 Apr (AFP) -- The cultural attache at the Syrian Embassy here, Hasan Dayoub, escaped injury today when several shots were fired at his car, police said. First reports said an attacker fired at the car as Mr Dayoub was entering the garage of a building in central Madrid. The diplomat pulled out a gun and returned the fire and the aggressor fled. Some witnesses said there had been two attackers.

SORSA: SUPERPOWERS MUST RENOUNCE FIRST STRIKE

[Text] Stockholm -- On Monday [19 April] Prime Minister Kalevi Sorsa called on the United States and the Soviet Union to reach a joint agreement not to be the first to use nuclear arms. In Sorsa's opinion such a decision would put an end to the discussion of the possibility of waging a limited nuclear war. "If a commitment is made not to be the first to use nuclear arms it should not be a problem to limit the use of this type of weapon," Sorsa said at the labor movement peace forum in Stockholm.

A calmer atmosphere could in its turn open up possibilities of discussions between the superpowers about the arms systems themselves, their nature and size, the prime minister said. It is Sorsa's view that the doctrine of being the first to use nuclear arms has gone the way of so many other political of military doctrines -- it has ceased to meet the requirements of the times. He pointed out that the Soviet Union had already renounced such measures long ago.

Moreover, an agreement to reject the doctrine of first use of nuclear arms and an understanding not to threaten nonnuclear nations with such use could be reached without complicated negotiations -- "as long as the political will is there," Sorsa said. "Such solutions could once again open up new possibilities of negotiations on conventional arms control."

Sorsa described the recent proposal by Robert McNamara, George Kennan, McGeorge Bundy and Gerard Smith that the NATO pact should reject the option of being the first to use nuclear arms as an example of unprejudiced thinking. It could have positive consequences, even though the men who made the proposal went on to recommend that the West's conventional arms potential should be strengthened, he said.

LITHUANIAN DEPUTY MINISTER DENIED ENTRY VISA

[Text] Oslo, 27 Apr (AFP) -- The deputy foreign minister of the Soviet Republic of Lithuania, Nicholay Neizhland, scheduled to visit Norway earlier this month, was refused an entry visa, it was announced here today. A Foreign Ministry spokesman said the Norwegian decision was prompted by Sweden's refusal to grant Mr Neizhland entry on security grounds.

Mr Neizhland, who for seven years ran the Stockholm bureau of the Soviet APN news agency, wanted to act as an interpreter for the Soviet tennis team that played Sweden last month. Invited to Norway by the Soviet-Norwegian Committee, Mr Neizhland was to have given a series of lectures here. The three other Soviet figures invited with him were allowed in.

'WAR CABINET' MEETS AGAIN; PYM IN LUXEMBOURG

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher chaired another one and a quarter hour meeting of the Falklands crisis war cabinet at Downing Street today. Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym was absent from this morning's meeting. He is in Luxembourg for a council of Common Market foreign ministers.

Although the task force is now believed to be nearing the Falklands, Britain considers that diplomatic moves are still in play and officials are awaiting a meeting between U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig and Argentine Foreign Minister Mr Costa Mendez.

British officials are taking some comfort from the apparent soft peddling by Argentina at the special meeting of the Organisation of American States in Washington and her seeming lack of success in getting the strong backing there she sought.

Officials are refusing to comment on operational matters surrounding the task force and its next moves in spite of wide expectations at Westminster that an assault of some kind of the Falklands proper is imminent or, according to some reports, has already taken place.

The line in London this morning was that the greatest possible diplomatic and military triumph would be achieved if the fleet could be turned round having succeeded in its objective of getting Argentinian forces off the Falkland Islands without firing another shot. But there is also a recognition that this is probably not a very realistic hope.

A special cabinet meeting on the crisis is to take place at Downing Street tomorrow.

THATCHER: FURTHER MILITARY ACTION NOT RULED OUT

LD271638 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1515 GMT 27 Apr 82

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Text] Britain will not rule out any further military action against Argentina while negotiations continue, the prime minister insisted today. Her tough stand came as she rejected opposition leader Mr Michael Foot's appeal that the foreign secretary should go to New York for talks with the UN secretary general on his peace plea.

"I ask you not to take any military action," urged Mr Foot. Amid noisy scenes during Commons questions Mr Foot emphasized Senor Javier Perez de Cuellar's appeal for no escalation of the Falklands conflict. But the prime minister was firm, despite shouts of "Warmonger." She said the secretary general should address his remarks to the Argentine junta.

During exchanges, Mrs Thatcher also disclosed that the pope sent a telegram to the queen yesterday urging Britain to make every effort to seek a peaceful solution to the crisis.

Mr Foot had warned the prime minister that if she did not make a proper response to Senor de Cuellar's appeal she would "inflict a grievious blow on our country's cause." Mrs Thatcher told him to loud Tory cheers: "I totally disagree...If we were to refuse to take any further military action whatsoever during these negotiations then you would be putting many of our soldiers and sailors in jeopardy."

However, she stressed throughout the extended session of prime minister's questions that the government was still determined to find a negotiated settlement, although time was "fast running out."

And she dismissed as "nonsense" Mr Tony Benn's accusation that it was always her intention that the Falklands crisis should be a "military expedition."

The first sign of a major crack in the united Commons front over the crisis came after Mrs Thatcher had given the latest situation. The division is certain to be highlighted in Thursday's emergency debate. The prime minister said the British forces on South Georgia had contacted the British Antarctic survey scientists and the two wildlife photographers on the island. All were reported to be safe and well and arrangements were being made for them to leave shortly. Mrs Thatcher said Mr Haig, U.S. secretary of state, knew time was running out and had been in touch with the Argentine Government today.

But as the prime minister was speaking, reports were saying that Argentina had rejected a request from Mr Haig to visit Buenos Aires for further talks. Labour backbencher Mr Tam Dalyell (West Lothian) had asked her what her reply would be to the UN secretary general's request that there should be no escalation of the conflict.

"I am very well aware of the secretary general's request, and that the UN Security Council resolution must be complied with," Mrs Thatcher told him. "But it is Argentina that has flagrantly failed to do this, and because of that failure, we must now be free to exercise our right to self-defence under Article 51. Mr Foot protested at Mrs Thatcher's reply urging that Mr Pym should go to New York to discuss the matter with the secretary general.

He leapt to his feet six times to press Mrs Thatcher when she refused either to send Mr Pym or to stop military action. "I believe that if you do not response to what I am asking you will do great injury to our country all over the world," he warned.

"The advice I am giving you is the best in the interests of the country as a whole," Mr Foot said to Labour cheers. But Mrs Thatcher said against a background of opposition shouts: "The foreign secretary has recently returned from Washington, and I don't think he could achieve anything by going to New York."

Labour's Mr Jack Dormand (Easington) claimed Mrs Thatcher's "belligerence" over the last two days had totally misjudged the mood of the British people and the situation in the Falklands. He also told her that President Reagan's "neutrality will not be forgotten in this country."

Mrs Thatcher replied: "I don't believe we have misjudged the views of our citizens." There were many British people living under occupation in the Falklands, and she was anxious to see they were not under that occupation "for a moment longer than may be necessary."

Mr Benn then attacked Mrs Thatcher: "Is it not clear from your statements yesterday, today and on the Panorama interview last night that the government never had the slightest intention of using the United Nations for the purposes of negotiation. It was always your intention that should be a military expedition alone. It is now clear to that extend that you have hitherto grossly misled the House and the country," he accused her.

"You are talking nonsense, and I suspect that you know it," Mrs Thatcher retorted. The government had gone immediately to the UN Security Council after the invasion, gained the support of many other nations, and secured the resolutions calling for Argentina's withdrawal.

"We do want a peaceful settlement. The easiest way for that is for Argentina to withdraw her troops," said Mrs Thatcher. Former Tory Cabinet Minister Mr Norman St John Stevas (Chelmsford) urged the government to use the mediation services of the Vatican, which had unrivalled experience, particularly in Latin America. The pope had sent a telegram to the Queen yesterday, Mrs Thatcher told him, saying he hoped the British Government would make every effort to seek a peaceful solution to the crisis. "He hopes and wishes to believe that such an international solution is still possible," she said.

"Will you publish for us as speedily as possible the exact wording of the reply given by our ambassador to the secretary general's statement?" demanded Mr Foot. "Will you publish it as soon as possible so we can all see what was said on behalf of our country?"

But Mrs Thatcher told him: "I don't think there is a formal reply to a message of this kind." Mr Foot: "Does your reply to me then mean that there is to be no official reply on behalf of the government to this appeal from the secretary general?" Mr Foot demanded.

The prime minister said: "I can make an official reply to your wish. It will not be any different from what I have said." Mrs Thatcher said she thought our ambassador's reply "is very likely to have been of the nature that the best way to comply is for the UN to bring pressure to bear on Argentina to withdraw her forces." Mr Foot retorted: "It seems from your reply you don't even know what our ambassador said, and you are making it up as you go along."

Earlier, Mr John Nott, defence secretary, had said at question time that safeguarding civilian lives would be one of the highest priorities in any military operation, but he declined to discuss future plans or operations. The Royal Navy task force deploying to the area of the Falkland Islands is prepared for a wide range of military options, he said. "The safeguarding of civilian lives will be one of our highest priorities."

Mr Nott also flatly refused to comment on a Labour MP's call for a statement on whether Britain would make use of Chilean bases. And, replying to Mr John Silkin, shadow defence secretary, Mr Nott denied that the crisis showed up shortcomings in the government's defence strategy.

"The principle threat to this country comes from the Soviet Union and its allies, not from Argentina," he said. Britain was maintaining a range of forces to counter this threat and spending sterling 500 million more on the naval programme than was spent by the last Labour government.

"There is nothing in our plans for the future which would prevent a naval task force of the kind now at sea being put into a similar task in 1985 or 1992." Any future force would be armed with more up-to-date and powerful weapons, Mr Nott added.

Sir Willian van Straubenzee (C Wokingham) said "neutralising" hostile air forces would get widespread support if the action was taken to limit later casualties in the Falklands. Mr Nott did not comment on the suggestion, but stressed: "I share your desire that we should still do everything possible to find a peaceful solution to this dispute. "We should use the minimum amount of force in order to achieve our objectives."

Mr Nott told another questioner he would be "delighted" if reports that the Red Cross were being allowed into the Falklands were true. Urged to seek to canvass the islanders' views through the Red Cross, Mr Nott said: "No one would be happier than me if we could once again get into contact with the Falkland Islanders in order to find out their wishes in the matter. That is our principal purpose."

He dismissed a challenge by Labour leftwinger Mr Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) to ban arms sales to fascist states, saying the "vast majority" of Argentina's modern weapons were supplied under the last Labour government.

After the Commons announcement by the leader of the House, Mr John Biffen, of a change of business to allow for a debate on the Falklands crisis on Thursday, similar plans were also announced for the Lords. Government Chief Whip Lord Denham said the peers would also debate the crisis on Thursday.

Labor Opposes Strategy

LD271732 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1640 GMT 27 Apr 82

[By David Healy and Andy Webb, PA political staff]

[Text] Falklands strategy just about collapsed in the Commons today. The break came when Mr Foot backed an appeal by the UN Secretary General Senor Javier Perez de Cuellar to halt any escalation of the crisis.

Mr Foot demanded that Mrs Thatcher send Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym to New York to take up the plea with the secretary general. But Mrs Thatcher said the government saw no mediating role for the international body while Mr Haig's peace initiative was still in action.

The row produced the biggest split between the two front benches and their supporters behind them since the government sent the Royal Navy task force to the Falklands. Government sources suggested that Mr Foot was using the UN appeal "to get himself off the hook" and to distance Labour from the consequences of any further military action.

The opposition leader demanded to know what the government's official response had been to the plea from Senor Perez de Cuellar but Mrs Thatcher did not know. It was only later that Downing Street learned that the appeal had come in what it described as a two-sentence press release issued by the secretary general's press office at the UN yesterday. As such it had no official standing.

The British Government had not been informed by officials of the statement and no official reply was being sent. Instead Britain's man at the UN, Sir Anthony Parsons, had a private word with Senor Perez de Cuellar, re-stating the British position. This would take the line that any suggestion that Britain was in breach of Resolution 502 of the UN Security Council was "not acceptable."

The statement from the UN secretary general said: "In view of the further armed exchange between Argentina and British forces which has taken place over South Georgia Island, it is imperative that the escalation of the situation be halted. In the critical situation the secretary general therefore appeals to both parties to comply immediately with the provisions of Security Council Resolution 502."

It goes on to call on Britain and Argentina "to refrain from any action that would broaden yet further the conflict which threatens to have serious consequences for world peace."

Mr Foot appeared to have united Labour ranks behind the aggressive line he took against Mrs Thatcher in the Commons in favour of UN mediation before any further military action takes place. Some left wing MP's have been unhappy at the support Mr Foot has been giving but tonight he received the firm backing for his position from the Tribune Group.

Mr Norman Buchan, chairman of the group, issued a statement saying: "I am quite sure the entire party and especially the Tribune Group will support Mr Foot's stand. The dispute should be solved within the United Nations and the government should be responding to the appeal by the secretary general not to escalate the conflict."

Further Dialogue

LD272110 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2100 GMT 27 Apr 82

[Text] No further major military action by Britain's task force should be authorised until Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym had gone to New York to talk to the United Nations, opposition leader Mr Michael Foot told the prime minister tonight.

He was replying to a letter from Mrs Thatcher after angry exchanges in Parliament earlier today when he pressed hard the case for Britain to take the issue to the United Nations.

Mrs Thatcher had taken the unusual step of writing to Mr Foot after their differences on British policy over recapturing the Falklands had surfaced in the Commons. Her letter was an indication of the seriousness with which she was treating the danger of a split with opposition parties at Westminster.

She wrote to Mr Foot: "I should make it clear that the UN secretary general's appeal took the form of a press release put out by his spokesman. It has not been circulated as a document of the Security Council or General Assembly, nor has it been communicated to her majesty's government in any formal way."

Mrs Thatcher went on: "It would be most unusual for any formal response to be sent to an appeal issued in this way. The United Kingdom's permanent representative nevertheless spoke to the secretary general on behalf of the government yesterday. He told Mr de Cuellar that any suggestion that we had failed to comply with Security Council Resolution 502 was unacceptable and that it was Argentina which was in breach of the resolution."

Mrs Thatcher told Mr Foot that she would be releasing the letter to the press. She also sent copies to Liberal leader Mr David Steel and SDP leader in the Commons, Dr David Owen.

Mr Foot replied: "At such a moment of international crisis, I attach the greatest importance to any statement issued by the secretary general of the United Nations, and I am shocked that the government does not appear to share that view. The government should have responded positively to such an approach even before the matter was raised in the Commons today.

"Much the best response would have been for the government to send a spokesman, preferably the foreign secretary, to meet the secretary general to discuss the matter with him immediately and directly. The better the British case, the stronger the argument for such a mission."

Mr Foot went on: "I fully accept that it is Argentina which is in violation of Security Council Resolution 502 (the resolution which demands the withdrawal of the Argentinian invaders) and the government cannot complain of any lack of support on our part. But when, in the light of the latest events the secretary general issues a special appeal, the government must respond in terms very different from the dismissive ones which you have selected.

"I still urge, as I did in the House, that the foreign secretary should go to New York without further delay to talk with the secretary general, and that no further major military action should be authorised until this has been done." Mr Foot said: "I write on behalf of a party which has given the strongest support to the role which the United Nations can play in international disputes, and I urge that all future government action should be governed by the need to support the United Nations and its secretary general."

He went on: "I continue to be amazed that the government's first response was not to propose a meeting of this nature. Human lives and great issues of peace are involved, and the proper way for the British Government to be prepared to discuss them is with the secretary general of the United Nations in response to his specific appeal."

Mr Foot warned: "I want to see our country retaining the worldwide support which hitherto has been forthcoming for the British case in this dispute. It is our allegiance to the United Nations Charter and the United Nations organisation and its institutions which has helped us to command that support. If that great asset is destroyed or impaired at this moment the responsibility will be yours."

POLITICIANS SEEK ICJ INTERVENTION IN CRISIS

LD271900 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1841 GMT 27 Apr 82

[By Chris Moncreiff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Text] A joint Labour-Tory bid was made in the Commons tonight to get the International Court of Justice [ICJ] to intervene in the Falklands crisis. It came in the form of a House of Commons motion sponsored by Sir Derek Walker-Smith, Conservative MP for Hertford East, and Mr Michael English, Labour MP for Notingham West.

Both are respected for their knowledge of international law. Their motion called on the UN Security Council to seek "an advisory opinion" from the International Court on the legal questions arising out of disputes between states over the Falkland Islands, South Georgia, the South Sandwich, South Shetland and South Orkney Islands, Graham's Land and any other territories nearby.

Mr English said: "I do not know what the Security Council would do with such a proposal, but it would demonstrate good faith for our legal case in the United Kingdom."

WAR CABINET MEETS AGAIN IN EMERGENCY SESSION

LD280906 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0854 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Excerpt] Cabinet ministers were tight-lipped today when they arrived for an emergency meeting with Mrs Thatcher at Downing Street. They did not comment on the progress of the task force or on reports of Mr Haig's latest proposals.

Asked if there was any news from the Falkland Islands, Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym said: "No, nothing." Defence Secretary Mr John Nott hurried inside No 10 without a word. And Home Secretary Mr William Whitelaw exchanged only a cheery "Good morning" with Mrs Thatcher's husband Denis.

PYM BRIEFS EEC ON CRISIS; SOLIDARITY HOLDS

LD271636 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1615 GMT 27 Apr 82

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Luxembourg]

[Text] Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym said today that peace efforts by U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig were still Britain's "best hope" of an end to the Falklands crisis. But he warned that if they failed, the situation could change.

Mr Pym, who was speaking after updating EEC foreign ministers in Luxembourg on latest developments, was asked about reports that a British invasion force was already in the Falkland Islands. He replied, "I never make any comment about speculation about the disposition of British forces, and it would not be right to do so.

"The Haig mission is still very much in play. Whether it will produce a successful result I just don't know at the moment. We believe it is the best hope. It is one we have supported right the way through, and we must continue to hope for it. But if not, the situation can change."

(At about the same time as Mr Pym was speaking, a report received by REUTERS from Buenos Aires, said that Argentina has turned down an offer by Mr Haig to return to Buenos Aires in a last ditch effort to bring about a peaceful settlement of the Falklands dispute.)

Mr Pym did not amplify the nature of possible further steps Britain might take but he said he received continuing "robust support" from his Common Market partners after outlining the military takeover of South Georgia over lunch today.

There had been fears that the Community's resolve strongly to support Britain in imposing trade sanctions against Argentina would weaken the beginning of military action. Mr Pym, however, told a press conference before returning to London that backing for the UK remained "unanimous and strong." EEC member states were being "just as supportive" as they were from the outset, and he repeated his gratitude for their backing.

According to officials, Mr Pym today simply outlined developments in the crisis, and there was no debate on the issue. There was no demand from Britain for any increase in the trade sanctions, which are due to be reviewed on May 17.

After today's meeting Belgium Foreign Minister Leo Tindemans, currently president in office of the EEC's Council of Ministers, emphatically denied suggestions that military action on South Georgia and the prospect of further armed conflict had weakened Common Market solidarity.

Asked about fears among member states that Britain would take military action, and whether they were prepared to continue to support Britain, he said, "The weather was beautiful, the food was good, and the company was excellent. We listened to the explanation, and there was no comment."

Later he said firmly that the sanctions remained in force, and if there were doubts about British strategy in the South Atlantic, no ministers seem prepared to undermine Community solidarity by voicing them in public.

Tomorrow Mr Pym flies to Strasbourg to address the 21-nation Council of Europe on the Falklands crisis.

PALACE CONFIRMS TELEGRAM RECEIVED FROM POPE

LD271714 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1647 GMT 27 Apr 82

[Text] Buckingham Palace tonight confirmed that the pope had sent a telegram to the Queen appealing for a peaceful solution in the Falkland Islands. A palace spokesman said, "The Queen received the telegram the weekend before last, roughly coinciding with the public appeal made in the same terms. "A reply has not been sent."

Asked why the pope's appeal had not been made public, the spokesman replied, "That is a question for Number 10."

Roman Catholic sources confirmed that the telegram was sent to the Queen on April 17 -- 10 days ago. But Mrs Thatcher stated in the Commons this afternoon that a telegram was sent to the Queen by the pope "yesterday." This was denied by the palace spokesman. "There was only one telegram," he said.

A spokesman for No 10 said later that Mrs Thatcher's reference to the telegram being sent on Monday "may have been a slip of the tongue." "As far as we know there was only one telegram sent. I don't know exactly when it was sent or exactly when it was received because it was between the Holy See and the Queen."

SHIPS ON 'SCRAP LIST' PREPARED FOR SERVICE

[Desmond Wettern report: "Scrap-List Warships Serve Again"]

[Text] Four major warships awaiting scrap or sale in the navy's "standby squadron" at Chatham are now being prepared for operational service. The first was recommissioned and rejoined the fleet at the weekend to replace ships in home waters now earmarked for the South Atlantic.

Although Mr Nott, defence secretary, said in his Commons speech on April 7: "There are no ships in the standby squadron," one of the ships, the 2,800-ton frigate Falmouth, has been made ready for sea in less than three weeks. Preparing the other three, the 2,700-ton frigate Zulu and her sister ships Nubian and Gurkha, will take somewhat longer. As they were listed for scrap or sale over a year ago, spares and bits of their equipment have been taken for use in other ships.

At Devenport naval barracks, some ratings due to leave the navy this week on expiration of their service have been told they will be retained for up to a year. A Ministry of Defence spokesman said yesterday that so far 25 ratings and three Royal Marines other ranks in key jobs were being retained, and that though the government had the power to retain officers and ratings for up to a year, those who were retained would be released as soon as possible.

Civilian workers at the dockyards at Portsmouth and Chatham are also affected by the Falklands crisis. No further redundancy notices are to be issued for the time being to the 7,000-strong workforce at Chatham, where the dockyard is due to be closed by March, 1984, nor at Portsmouth, where the total of 7,500 workers is due to be cut to about 1,200 by the same date.

Initial redundancy notices for 180 workers at Portsmouth and some 70 to 80 at Chatham had already been issued by the time the order to postpone further redundancies was made last week. Considerably greater numbers of workers at both dockyards had already quit voluntarily, with 40 having left Chatham drawing office alone where work for nuclear submarine refits is carried out for both Chatham and Devenport.

At Devenport work on loading the chartered Cunard container ship Atlantic Conveyor, 18,000 tons, in Plymouth Sound, was completed at the weekend with RAF Chinook heavy-lift helicopters being flown on board to join naval Sea Harrier and RAF Harrier fighters. The helicopters had come straight off the production line in America as there had been no time to paint on their distinguishing roundels and squadron insignia.

MORE SHIPS, PARATROOPERS, MARINES JOIN FORCE

[Excerpt] More warships and hundreds of paratroopers and marines sailed from Britain yesterday as a new wave of the South Atlantic task force. The amphibious assault ship Intrepid, 12,120 tons, carrying several hundred marines, military vehicles and earth-moving equipment sailed from Portland.

Four frigates, the 2,800-ton Avenger, with all distinguishing marks painted out; the 3,000-ton Ariadne and the 2,860-ton Leander and her sister ship Aurora sailed from Plymouth. But it was thought that only the Avenger and one of the other three were bound for the South Atlantic.

The Royal Fleet auxiliary tanker Bayleaf, 20,320 tons, and the 15,540-ton chartered tanker British Avor also left Plymouth. Some 900 men of 2nd Bn, the Parachute Regiment battalion group, left Portsmouth aboard the requisitioned P & O North Sea ferry Norland, 12,988-tons. The ship has had a helicopter landing pad fitted but carries no armament.

Trawlers Depart for Falklands

LD280902 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0844 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Text] Four requisitioned Hull trawlers, pressed into service by the Royal Navy as minesweepers, have left Portland for the Falklands. The Northella, Farnella, Junella and Cordella were fitted with minesweeping gear at Rosyth -- in one case as a catch of freshly-caught fish was unloaded.

With RN crews, the trawlers then sailed for Portland for training in their new role.

Meanwhile, Whitehall officials confirmed today that the four frigates which left Devonport earlier this week were NOT destined for the Falklands.

Vulcan Bombers To Be Added

PM271205 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 27 Apr 82 p 4

[Air Cdre G.S. Cooper, air correspondent, report: "Ascension Base Likely for V-Bomber Force"]

[Excerpt] Britain will soon be ready to add long-range Vulcan bombers to balance the scales of air power in the South Atlantic. Argentina's 200 combat aircraft outnumber the British task force's Sea Harriers by 10 to one, but they lack the range to interfere effectively with Britain's hold on South Georgia.

Long before the task force moves into range of the Argentine land-based jet bombers and fighters, which cannot maintain air cover much beyond the 400 miles separating the Falklands from the mainland, the RAF will be prepared to launch heavy attacks at night on mainland air bases.

Conventional bombing exercises to the north of Scotland and in-flight refuelling practices with the RAF's Victor tankers have been going well. Within a few days the retrained Vulcan force will be declared operational.

A Vulcan can carry up to 21 free-fall 1,000 lb bombs. It would be possible for the aircraft to be refuelled in flight all the way to the South Atlantic from RAF Waddington, their Lincolnshire base, but it is more likely that Ascension Island would be used as a forward base.

The long-range bombing capability gives Britain the option of hitting Argentina's aircraft on the ground and disrupting airfield operations. Argentine air defences are not well equipped to deal with the type of threat posed by the Vulcans.

If the Mirage II fighter squadrons are moved south to bring them all into range of the Falklands, Buenos Aires would be left open to attack without air defence cover. Argentina also has in-flight refuelling aircraft, but they can provide only a limited extension of land-based air power. The main long-range attack capability is provided by up to 11 Douglas Skyhawk single-seat attack bombers, operating from the Argentine Navy's sole carrier, Vieticinco de Mayo, 16,000 tons. Skyhawks are slower than Sea Harriers and can only maintain an attack threat for as long as that carrier stays afloat.

Two years ago, Argentina took delivery of two Lockheed KC-130 tanker aircraft. It would be possible for these to be used to refuel four Skyhawks for an attack on Britain's ground forces in South Georgia, but the weapons load would be small and the difficulties of mounting the operation would be considerable.

South Georgia is over 1,000 miles from the mainland, which means that the Skyhawk pilots would find it hard without suitable aids either to find their targets in bad weather or join up again with the tankers. At best the Argentine Air Force could only regard the attacks to be of nuisance value and hardly worth the risks involved.

There is a possibility, however, that the Argentine Navy's new French Super Etendard strike fighters, of which six have been delivered, could be flight-refuelled from a land base to mount stilleto-type attacks on the fleet with Exocet AM-39 anti-ship missiles. The pilots are new to the aircraft, however, and would find it difficult to penetrate the task force's Sea Harrier and Sea Dart defences.

Mirages and Canberras are reported to have been seen in the air over the Falklands, and there have been sightings of Pucaras on the ground at Port Stanley. The runway is too short for the Mirage and the logistic difficulties of supporting jet fighters operations from Port Stanley would be enormous.

HULL OF HMS CANBERRA INSPECTED FOR MINES

[Charles Laurence dispatch: "Canberra's Divers Look for Mines"]

[Text] Aboard HMS Canberra -- Divers were sent to inspect the hull of the Canberra, carrying troops to the Falklands, yesterday after reports that Argentine divers may have placed limpet mines below the waterline. There was a possibility that divers may have come from the Agentine merchant ship, the Rio de la Plata, which has been spying on the assault fleet.

The Canberra took evasive action from what Royal Navy officers described as an "underwater threat" in a dramatic message over the ship's pipe early in the morning. Captain Christopher Burne, the senior naval officer on board, said: "We believe divers could have tried to place mines on the ship, so we will check the hull."

First reports of the threat came from a sonar sentry who heard a slamming noise. The Rio de la Plata was chased away from the fleet by a frigate and anti-submarine helicopter on Sunday after spending two days spying from about seven miles.

U.S. ROLE AS MEDIATOR IN FALKLANDS SUPPORTED

[Editorial: "Washington's Dilemma"]

[Text] President Reagan said yesterday that the United States remained "determined to do all we can to help Britain and Argentina to solve their differences without further conflict." While he acknowledged that the situation was "increasingly difficult and time is surely running out," it is clear that, for the time being at least, Mr Reagan intends to hold American policy to that of being a friend of both parties, willing to do its best in a mediating role. This attitude has caused some indignation in Britain, but it is as well to be clear that, from Washington's point of view, there are respectable reasons for it. It should also be noted that there have been no complaints about the American attitude from British Government quarters.

It has to be conceded that American interests in what goes on in Latin America are incomparably greater than our own. It is not a matter of cosying up to dictatorships but of paying proper regard to the national security requirements of the United States. America has condemned Argentina's invasion of the Falkland Islands and voted in favour of the Security Council resolution calling for her withdrawal. Popular opinion in America, as reflected in press comment and wide sections of Congress, is overwhelmingly in favour of Britain. Yet it seems very likely that the administration is a long way from being willing to take punitive action against Argentina, either economic or, still less, military.

As a global power (which Britain no longer is), the United States keeps its eye firmly fixed all the time on Russia and Moscow's world-wide activities. This is particularly so in the case of Latin America. Britain's row with Argentina presents Russia with potentially rich pickings. Recent Russian statements have come down firmly on the side of Argentina and against Britain and the United States. Argentina exports more to Russia than any other Western country -- 12 million tons of grain alone this year. No scruples about the "fascist dictatorship" are allowed to interfere with Moscow's harmonious relationship with Buenos Aires. Russia has serious designs on the whole Latin American and Caribbean area.

With her world-wide naval fleet and bases in Cuba and on the West African coast, she is a power to be reckoned with in the Western Hemisphere. American action against Argentina would provide Russia with golden opportunities for further penetration and subversion.

S. GEORGIA ACTION 'REINFORCES NEGOTIATIONS'

PM261427 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 26 Apr 82 p 14

[Editorial: "Into Action"]

[Text] The landing on South Georgia marks the first use of force by Britain since the task force sailed. It does not, however, mark the first use of force in the dispute. That came with the Argentine invasion of the Falklands on April 2. Argentina has immediately claimed that the British action in South Georgia is a "flagrant violation" of the Security Council's Resolution 502. This resolution, passed by 10 votes to one, called for a cessation of hostilities, withdrawal of Argentine forces from the Falklands, and negotiations for a peaceful solution. Since, at the time it was passed, the only hostilities in progress were those which had been undertaken by Argentina, the resolution was clearly directed against those hostilities. Subsequent British action, it has been made abundantly clear, comes under Article 51 of the Charter, allowing every nation the right of self-defence against attack.

That is what the British action in South Georgia amounts to. It is indisputably British territory. An Argentine submarine in harbour, let alone Argentine troops ashore, have no right to be there. In taking steps to re-take the island, Britain was acting in defence against the Argentine aggression. But, it may be asked, is not Britain jumping the gun by taking military action while Mr Haig, the American secretary of state, had not yet formally given up his role as go-between in an effort to settle the dispute by diplomatic means? This by no means follows. In the first place, it had become clear that Mr Haig's willingness to act as transmitter of messages and proposals between London and Buenos Aires, while greatly appreciated, was getting nowhere. Secondly, Britain, by using the task force for the purpose it had been sent out to achieve, is not signalling the end of negotiations for a peaceful solution. It is reinforcing them.

It is no use sending out a large task force, of the kind which Britain has organised, with the firm intention of not using it should that become necessary. This is what some segments of the Labour Party have recently seemed to be more and more suggesting. The question really turns on when is "necessary"? The timing of the action to re-take South Georgia is right. It is an earnest of British intentions which cannot possibly be mistaken. If it serves to jolt both Washington and Buenos Aires into a closer appreciation of those intentions, then so much the better. It may make Mr Haig's position at today's meeting in Washington of the Organization of American States more awkward than it might have been, but that is a position he would have had to face sooner or later in any case. Pressure in Congress for the United States Navy to aid Britain in enforcing the Security Council resolution is now strong. The interests of the United States -- and those of the whole of the West -- lie wholly in a speedy end to this distracting dispute. President Reagan has a chance to assist that end.

NOTT DEFENDS GOVERNMENT BUDGET STRATEGY

LD271616 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1524 GMT 27 Apr 82

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] The government's defence strategy remains "valid" -- although it will be examined to see if there should be any adjustments in the wake of the Falklands crisis -- Defence Secretary Mr John Nott declared today.

He acknowledged at Commons question time that his record at the ministry had not been impeccable. "Of course my record is not impeccable. I have lessons to learn from this incident the same as everyone else has," he told Labour MP Mr Willie Mahilton (Fife C).

He said he had learnt three lessons in particular -- the importance of:

-- the readiness of combat stocks and spare parts;

-- the availability of sufficient fuels and;

-- the ability to use civilian assets like ships and aircraft to support military operations.

Mr Nott dismissed claims that navy cuts would preclude any chance of mounting a similar task force in the future. "Nothing in our plans prevent us having such a force in 1985 and 1990," he said, sweeping aside worries of his own backbenchers about the number of aircraft carriers available. Armed Forces Minister Mr Peter Blaker rejected calls to cancel the proposed sale of the Harrier carrier Invincible -- part of the task force -- to Australia. "We cannot cancel it. The sale has already been agreed," he said.

Mr Nott told MP's: "When the Falkland crisis is over we will clearly look to see whether there are any adjustments within the policy already announced that we should take." He said the defence white paper -- due to be published this week -- had already been delayed because of views on both sides of the Commons that the Falklands crisis had intervened. Mr Nott stressed there was nothing in the white paper that the government was ashamed of.

There was nothing, he said, which in any way contradicted or embarrassed the government. But he sidestepped questions about the content of the "addendum" which has been included in the "substantially-completed" document.

SDLP REJECTS PLAN FOR N. IRELAND DEVOLUTION

[Colin Brady dispatch: "Prior Plans 'Unacceptable' Says SDLP"]

[Text] Belfast -- Increased hostility by Northern Ireland's Social Democratic and Labour Party to the government's proposals for revised devolved government in the province is diminishing the prospects of success. Besides dismissing the plans as "unacceptable," the party, which claims to represent most of Ulster's Roman Catholic electors, has not made it precisely clear whether it will contest elections for a new political assembly designed to be introduced in the autumn. All other political groupings, including the Social Democratic and Labour Party's revivals, Provisional Sinn Fein, have said they will participate in the elections, although most are doubtful of its success or are deliberately planning to sabotage it.

Following ten years of failure to get local politicians to agree on a formula for controlling their own affairs, the government now feels that another "push" should be made to break the stalemate. After a long series of talks with Mr Prior, Ulster secretary, and his predecessor, the majority of Ulster's political groupings are ready to fight the elections, if only to test support on the ground. Provisional Sinn Fein, contesting seats for the first time in Ulster elections, say they want Irish Nationalists to have an alternative voice to the SDLP. This seat was first won by a Provisional IRA hunger-striker Robert Sands, and is now represented by his former election agent, Mr Owen Carron, who has refused to take his seat in Parliament -- an example which will be followed by any successful Provisional Sinn Fein candidate.

Leaders of the Social Democratic and Labour Party, after a weekend meeting announced: "The proposals contained in the white paper are unacceptable and do not provide the basis for peace or economic progress for the people of Northern Ireland." The party's stance was condemned at the 12th annual conference of the joint Protestant-Roman Catholic Alliance Party, whose leader, Mr Oliver Napier, accused the SDLP and the Irish prime minister, Mr Haughey, of "working hand in hand" to make the political situation in Northern Ireland unstable.

KIPRIANOU REFUTES IOANNIDHIS' RESIGNATION REASONS

NC271128 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 27 Apr 82

[Text] In a letter to Mr Yeoryios Ioannidhis accepting his resignation from the post of representative of the Greek Cypriot side at the inter-Cypriot talks, President Kiprianou expresses radical disagreement with Mr Ioannidhis's reasons for his resignation. Mr Kiprianou observes that the agreement between the Democratic Party and AKEL, as well as any other partisan development, in no way affects the position of the interlocutor because he represents the Greek Cypriot community and is appointed to represent the president of the republic as leader of the Greek Cypriot community.

President Kiprianou's letter adds: The interlocutor and his task have no relation whatever to agreements between parties or with domestic political developments of any nature, nor does the interlocutor receive instructions from the National Council, which is a consultative body to the president. Mr Kiprianou also says that Mr Ioannidhis chose to resign at a time when the new UN secretary general decided to speed up the dialogue and the discussion of the most basic matters to be able to at least ascertain if there is a possibility for progress or not.

Mr Kiprianou also says the people's unity -- an essential prerequisite for a just, viable and peaceful Cyprus solution -- does not mean that the people should be prevented from organizing themselves in political parties for a smooth political life, as is the case in other democracies. Mr Kiprianou adds that Mr Ioannidhis' decision in no way contributes to unity. At the same time, Mr Kiprianou describes as unacceptable Mr Ioannidhis' reference to the conditions which, according to him, have been created by the president's administration. Mr Kiprianou notes that if this had always been Mr Ioannidhis' view, then he should have resigned long ago.

Ioannidhis: Role Changed

[Text] Mr Yeoryios Ioannidhis this morning released his letter to President Kiprianou in which he submitted his resignation from the post of representative of the Greek Cypriot side at the inter-Cypriot talks. In his letter Mr Ioannidhis says recent developments changed the interlocutor's position and put him in an inferior position, hurting his universality [katholikotis] and downgrading him from representative of the Greek Cypriot side to a bearer and executor of a policy and tactics on the national issue that only one section of the people decided on in advance.

He also says that recent developments and the arrangement for the realization of the agreed preelection program of President Kiprianou not only do not allow a broadening of jurisdictions and representativeness of the National Council but also diminish them, because they make it impossible to conduct objective and free consultations in the National Council.

Mr Ioannidhis says he cannot support Mr Kiprianou's candidacy because he believes President Kiprianou has led the country into a pile of problems and, particularly, because the unity of the people has been dealt a painful blow. In conclusion, Mr Ioannidhis says he remains at the disposal of the president to give all necessary assistance and service until the appointment of a successor, to whom he is prepared to offer all possible help to safeguard the process of the intercommunal dialogue.

Mavrommatis Appointed

PAPAIOANNOU URGES STRONGER BONDS WITH USSR

NC280738 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 28 Apr 82 p 10

[Text] Speaking at a gathering yesterday on the occasion of Lenin's birth anniversary, AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou stated: "We will never allow imperialism and its organs to partition Cyprus and change it into NATO's strongest military bridgehead."

Papaioannou then added: "In our struggle, we are guided by the immortal, indomitable principles of Leninism."

Papaioannou also said: "Cypriots know very well that the Soviet Union has always stood by their side when they were struggling against colonialism, when Cyprus was declared an independent state and when with imperialism's conspiracy the abhorrent double crime was committed against it -- the junta-fascist coup and the Turkish invasion.

"The Soviet Union has been the most faithful, consistent and unselfish supporter of the anti-imperialist, antioccupation liberation struggle of the Cypriot people. The interest of our liberation struggle, the interest of all Cypriot people -- Greek and Turkish Cypriots -- is to tie even stronger our bonds of friendship and cooperation with that great friendly country, the Soviet Union."

FOREIGN CAPTAIN SENTENCED FOR USING FAMAGUSTA

NC271529 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 27 Apr 82

[Text] The Larnaca District Court has sentenced the Netherlands captain of the vessel (Markit) to 3 months' imprisonment for entering Famagusta Port twice in 1981. The captain admitted that he went to the port of Famagusta on 5 May and 28 December 1981 to load citrus.

In his decision, District Judge Eliadhis maintained that the trading of goods that do not belong to their lawful owners is unacceptable and impermissible and constitutes a contribution to the efforts of the occupying forces to consolidate the invasion's faits accomplis.

DEFENSE MINISTER CRITICIZES PAPANDREOU'S POLICIES

[Text] Ankara, 27 Apr (AA) -- Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken said Greek Premier Andreas Papandreu's policy toward Turkey was still "ambiguous", and it was difficult to understand his intentions. Bayulken made the statement to 11 journalists from 7 NATO countries and from would-be member Spain in a question-and-answer session Tuesday morning.

It was because of Mr Papandreou that the December 1981 meeting of NATO defense ministers had ended without a joint communique for the first time in NATO history, he told reporters from Federal Germany, Holland, Denmark, Belgium, Norway, France and Britain, plus Spain.

Bayulken said he had gone to the Colorado Springs session of the NATO Defense Planning Committee after the Greek ambassador to Ankara had brought a message to the Turkish Foreign Ministry from Athens which admitted that the Bern agreement, which provided for settlement of bilateral disputes through negotiations, was still valid. But when he arrived at Colorado Springs, Bayulken added, he had received an entirely contradictory statement from Athens, which dispersed the atmosphere of understanding. Apparently Greece had still not made up its mind, Bayulken supposed, about entering into a dialogue with Turkey.

Bayulken listed the "real problems" existing between Turkey and Greece as follows:

First, Athens' intention to extend its territorial waters from 6 to 12 miles was unacceptable to Turkey, for it would block the Aegean for Turkish vessels, (?who would) have to seek Greek (?permission) to sail to the Mediterranean, something inconceivable.

Second, the "FIR" [Flight Information Region] line, which was an entirely "technical" question in nature, and not an issue of sovereignty as claimed by Greece. If Greece insists on viewing the question from this point, he said, it is of course impossible to reach agreement.

Greece also claimed rights in the continental shelf for the Aegean islands, rejecting all proposals by Turkey, such as joint surveys of the seabed, equal partition of the continental shelf. Greece also rejected the decision of the International Court of Justice, which has ruled that the question was "political," although it was Greece who suggested resorting to the court in the first place. The question of Aegean airspace was also undecided, Bayulken said, for Greek claims of 10 miles of airspace over 6 miles of territorial waters were contrary to all international principles.

Noting relations between Turkey and Greece had gone into a new phase following the Lausanne peace treaty of 1923 due to the efforts of their respective leaders Ataturk and Venizelos. Bayulken added, however, Greece had later violated both the Lausanne treaty and the Paris treaty of 1947 (?by fortifying) the Dodecanese.

Ankara desired goodneighborly relations between the two NATO allies, the defense minister said, but relations had started deteriorating prior to the 1974 Cyprus crisis and had rapidly gone downhill after. It would be too bad if Greece walked out of NATO. Bayulken said, adding Turkey's hand of friendship was still extended. However, "Mr Papandreou should realize that we are determined to protect our rights," the defence minister said. The Rogers plan, which enabled Greece to return to NATO's military wing, was suspended, he noted, and the Larissa headquarters plan provided for was nonexistent.

In addition, it was repeatedly stressed that both countries will always endeavor to work for peace in the world within the scope of their possibilities."

DEAD POLICEMAN AT FRENCH MISSION DEEMED SUICIDE

AU271655 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1600 GMT 27 Apr 82

[Excerpts] According to the investigation, the death of the 22-year old Vienna policeman in the French Trade Mission [in Vienna yesterday] is no longer a puzzle. The officer of the alert [alarm] section is thought to have shot himself. The shooting was originally viewed as a terrorist attack. It is fairly certain that the death of the young policeman does not have a political background. According police, the man had private, family difficulties. The fact that he committed suicide in the French Trade Mission is rather a coincidence and with great certainty had no political motive.

FRENCH PRIME MINISTER VISITS; VIEWS RELATIONS

[Alain Rollat dispatch]

[Text] Toronto -- The government's desire to "normalize" its relations with Ottawa and to step up its cooperation with all Canada's provinces should not be regarded as a change in the policy hitherto pursued toward Quebec. That is what Mr Mauroy reaffirmed during the dinner given in Mr Trudeau's honor at the French Embassy in Ottawa on Friday. He stressed the diversity of the Canadian people in order more effectively to highlight the "natural" character of Paris' preferential relations with Quebec: "We intend not only to pursue but to extend those special relations between France and Quebec," he stated. "Indeed how could we disregard those descendants of the first inhabitants of New France who, despite the ups and downs of history, took and won the gamble of remaining faithful to their original culture? We take a vigilant interest in the development of Canada's French-speaking community."

During the ritual press conference which followed the talks, Mr Mauroy good-humoredly avoided questions on the clashes between French-Canadian and French-Quebec relations which are still delicate. "I do not want to be for Trudeau and against Levesque or for Levesque and against Trudeau. I am here to bring France's greetings and friendship to Canada." His task was made easier by the fact that Mr Trudeau had immediately stated that the improvement in relations between Paris and Ottawa was in no way incompatible with an extension of ties between Paris and Quebec.

Since the exchanges of views between Mr Trudeau and Mr Mauroy -- who had a final private meeting on Friday afternoon -- gave rise to no joint document, the results of the prime minister's visit to Ottawa are difficult to evaluate. His main political objective was to make an approach in reply to Mr Trudeau who readily accuses France of only being interested in Quebec and who thinks that the "normalization" between France and Canada should start by an improvement in the economic sphere. The French Government intends to take the federal prime minister at his word; hence the contacts which Mr Mauroy established with business circles in Ottawa and Toronto. But the French delegation thought that, to assert the coherence of his own argument, Mr Trudeau would make a gesture by announcing Canada's participation in the Airbus 320 construction program. On Friday evening Mr Mauroy's advisers noted that that gesture had not been made.

The exchanges of views were no more conclusive on the other bilateral matters. On the other hand the Hydro-Quebec Company and the French company Pechiney signed an agreement which was announced in Montreal on Thursday and which is to result in the construction of an aluminum factory in Quebec. That agreement, worth 1.2 billion Canadian dollars, was to be officially signed in Mr Mauroy's presence on Sunday.

In addition the talks which External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson had with his Canadian counterpart on the dispute over the limitation of the Saint-Pierre-et-Miquelson archipelago's territorial waters did not bring the respective viewpoints any closer.

Visits Quebec

[Alain Rollat and Bertrand de la Grange dispatch]

[Text] Montreal -- As soon as he entered Quebec on the morning of Sunday, 25 April, Mr Pierre Mauroy was particularly warm in his statements to the inhabitants of this French-speaking province, whose present political leaders are still nostalgic about the famous call of "Long Live Free Quebec!" by General de Gaulle in Montreal in 1967.

In reply to Quebec Prime Minister Rene Levesque, who had just welcomed him to "friendly country," he said he was "overjoyed to meet these people who, in the face of their constant trials, have proved indomitable, courageous and proud; these people who are warm, determined and confident in their future." "It is a future," Mr Mauroy also said, "which is now being prepared and to which France is committed." The prime minister added that last phrase himself at the last minute to give greater force to the few words he was originally to have spoken.

An hour later, at a lunch in his honor attended by more than 600 people in the city of Jonquiere, the prime minister was even warmer about the Quebec "branch," "which grew from our common trunk, the French people.... a branch which was forgotten for 300 years after a royal hand had severed it -- it was separate, abandoned and had become autonomous and has now been found again forever." "There will be no second abandonment," Mr Mauroy solemnly stated to loud applause. "After the time of rediscovery this is the time of serene and active friendship. I bring Quebec France's greetings, its undying friendship, its unswerving presence and its unshakable support."

The prime minister himself said that his visit to Quebec "promises to be positive" and full of "promising prospects." He added: "However, with regard to the people of Quebec and of France, we must ensure that our cooperation is not only between our states but is also cooperation between the French and Quebec peoples."

Mr Mauroy essentially repeated these statements at Chicoutimi, one of the main bastions of the Quebec French-speaking community. Thus in less than 3 hours on that spring Sunday Mr Mauroy gave his first visit to Quebec the committed tone hoped for by his hosts, for whom the annual meetings between the two heads of government, instituted in 1977, are mainly important for the degree of collusion in the exchanges. These statements seem to have reassured those among the Quebec leaders who had interpreted Mr Mauroy's friendly statements to the federal government as the start of a change in French policy to the advantage of Mr Pierre Elliot Trudeau's ideas.

At the end of this first day in Quebec Mr Mauroy noted, moreover, when speaking to representatives of the French community in Montreal that this trip to the other side of the Atlantic, rightly regarded as "difficult" because of the antangonism between Ottawa and Quebec, has so far gone satisfactorily.

So far there has been nothing to contradict that analysis. After initially running the risk of seeming to use double talk, Mr Mauroy could in fact flatter himself that he had succeeded in clarifying the new French Government's position on all sides, or at least the expression of that opinion. And he could flatter himself that he had done so without creating new complications, which is quite a successful performance in view of the degree of sensitivity involved. Moreover, the ground had been prepared by the recent visit made by Foreign Trade Minister Michel Jobert.

Returns to France

LD282028 Montreal International Service in English 1900 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Text] Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy has returned to France after concluding a 6-day visit to Canada with an emotional speech in Quebec's national [as heard] assembly. The French prime minister told the Provincial Assembly that Quebec will never again be alone in the world. He said France would not abandon the largely French-speaking province a second time. Mr Mauroy was alluding to the lack of contacts between France and Quebec after Britain defeated the French and took over the French colony in 1759. Mr Mauroy also offered to increase cooperation between Quebec and France in industry, technology and culture. He also stressed during his visit that France favored closer ties with the federal government as well.

HUNGARY'S KADAR AND DELEGATION ARRIVE IN BONN

LD261652 Hamburg DPA in German 1641 GMT 26 Apr 82

[Text] Bonn, 26 Apr (DPA) -- Hungarian party leader Janos Kadar arrived in Bonn this evening on an official visit. He is starting days of political talks and will meet Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt tomorrow.

Meets With Schmidt

LD270922 Hamburg DPA in German 0843 GMT 27 Apr 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 27 Apr (DPA) -- Hungarian party leader Janos Kadar met Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn this morning at the start of his series of talks. The exchange of views, taking place in the federal chancellor's office, will center on East-West issues. According to government circles, Schmidt will hear, in the main, the Eastern view of Poland's future, while the chancellor will inform the Hungarian guest of the West's stand on the Geneva disarmament talks.

Good Relations Acknowledged

LD271432 Hamburg DPA in German 1401 GMT 27 Apr 82

[Text] Bonn, 27 Apr (DPA) -- It is the wish of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Hungarian party leader Janos Kadar that the already good relations between the Federal Republic and Hungary should be further strengthened. Both politicans agreed on this today in Bonn during a private discussion lasting several hours.

During the intensive exchange of views, the two statesmen also agreed, it was reported, that meetings such as theirs should be cultivated, particularly in times of difficult East-West relations.

Kadar, who is the first leading Eastern bloc politician to visit Bonn since the outbreak of the Polish crisis, was received -- in accordance with what had been jointly agreed -- without attention to protocol in order to stress the working character of the visit. The talks began this morning in the federal chancellor's office with a private discussion lasting 2 and 1/2 hours, which were followed with a luncheon.

Schmidt and Kadar discussed general political and security policy, and economic and bilateral topics. In so doing, Kadar's assessment of the Polish situation is likely to have played a role. Schmidt intends to clarify to the Hungarian guest Western security policy, particularly U.S. disarmament strategy.

Activities Reported

LD281510 Hamburg DPA in German 1325 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Text] Bonn, 28 Apr (DPA) -- The Hungarian party leader, Janos Kadar, who visited the Federal Republic on Tuesday and Wednesday as the first leading Eastern bloc politician to do so since the imposition of martial law in Poland, underlined in Bonn the desire for detente and peaceful trade. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt stressed the friendly atmosphere of the meeting and expressed his respect for Hungary's economic achievements.

The Hungarian delegation expressed satisfaction at the course of the several hours of confidential talks between Kadar and Schmidt. The fact that the talks could be held during a crisis in East-West relations is regarded as proof of Hungary's ability to act, and as an indication of fresh efforts towards detente. It was said in Bonn that Federal Chancellor Schmidt had stressed the Federal Republic's negotiating and defense readiness. The Federal Government had once again demonstrated its interest in continuing the policy of detente.

Kadar, who last visited Bonn 5 years ago, had meetings today with, among others, the president of the German Chamber of Industry and Trade, Otto Wolff von Amerongen, and employers' president, Otto Esser, in the Federal Government's guest residence, Schloss Gymnich, near Bonn. Kadar also met the president of the Federal Bank, Karl Otto Poehl. After a visit to Federal President Karl Carstens and a meeting with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, who is to visit Budapest this year, Kadar held a final discussion with Schmidt.

The chairmen of the CDU, CSU and SPD were received by Kadar on Tuesday. CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl said afterwards there had been agreement on important issues and he had drawn attention to the importance of future developments in Poland.

Schmidt, Kadar 'Satisfied'

LD281732 Hamburg DPA in German 1325 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Text] Bonn, 28 Apr (DPA) -- A summit meeting between the American President and the Soviet general secretary is desirable. That, in the words of FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, is one of the two "very important convictions" on which there is agreement with Hungarian party leader Janos Kadar. The other agreement is on the necessity recognised by both sides for increased security through disarmament.

At the end of Kadar's 2-day visit, both statemen gave a positive assessment to the press. Schmidt said he was "very satisfied" with the exchange of views, which lasted nearly 8 hours, and Kadar also emphasized his "great satisfaction." The Hungarian party leader also mentioned the differences of opinion which surfaced over the question of the reasons for the present "dangerous escalation of the general world situation."

"From these differing positions we listened very attentively to one another," the chancellor said and mentioned the problems of Afghanistan, Poland and medium-range missiles and also in this context. He called Kadar "one of the most intelligent most experienced European statesmen." Both Kadar and Schmidt stressed in their closing press statements the joint positions which have been achieved, among which the desire for a further expansion of the already close Hungarian-German relations on a political as well as an economic and cultural level stand in the foreground.

[Text] Bonn, 28 Apr (DPA) -- After 2 days of talks with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, other leading politicians and industrialists, Hungarian party leader Janos Kadar ended his visit to Bonn on Wednesday evening. Kadar returned directly to Budapest in a special plane. Prior to his departure he met with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher for an exchange of views. The Foreign Office said the good relations between the FRG and the People's Republic of Hungary as well as current international questions were the main topics.

PAJETTA HOSTS GUATEMALAN OPPOSITIONISTS

[Text] Rome -- A delegation of the Guatemalan Committee of Patriotic Unity [CGUP] was received yesterday at PCI Directorate headquarters by the following comrades: Gian Carlo Pajetta, of the PCI Directorate and chief ot the PCI international affairs department; and Renato Sandri and Blaudio Bernabucci of the PCI foreign section. During the cordial conversation the comrades of the CGUP -- a unitary political group recently formed as a result of the unity reached by all the Guatemalan guerrilla forces -- reported on recent events in their country and stressed the persistence of the most brutal repression, as shown by the cililian killings committed a few days ago by the new putschist military junta.

On the Italian Communists' behalf, Comrade Pajetta warmly welcomed the unity achieved by the democratic forces in opposition to the military regime. He reasserted the Italian Communists' broadest solidarity with the Guatemalan people's struggle, so as to help, together with other Italian democratic forces, to create a truly democratic regime in Guatemala that will enable its people to free themselves from their centuries-old oppression and exploitation by the local oligarchy and for an economic and social development based on the values of justice, freedom and independence.

POPE'S TRIP TO POLAND REPORTEDLY TO BE POSTPONED

[Text] Vatican City, 28 Apr (ANSA) -- Pope John Paul II's trip to Poland, scheduled for August for the sixth century of the Black Madonna of Czestochowa, will almost certainly be postponed, according to a statement made to reporters today by Msgr Jozef Glemp, the Polish primate, before the pope's Wednesday general audience. "I think the pope's trip will have to be put off for a little time," the Msgr said. He did not mention any dates but said that the trip depends on "whether the situation settles down."

Asked about the willingness of Poland's leadership to accept the conditions laid down by the pontiff for his trip, Msgr Glemp said, "There are objective conditions also for the government. Not everything is easy..." The prelate concluded his brief remarks by reaffirming the church's desire for dialogue. "We want to create a climate for dialogue," he said.

Msgr Glemp arrived in Rome Monday and conferred with the Polish-born pope that same day and yesterday. He is expected to return to Poland tomorrow.

With reference to John Paul's trip to Great Britain, on the calendar from May 28 to June 2, Vatican sources referred today to the question raised by Msgr John Rawsthorne, the auxiliary bishop of Liverpool, who said that he hoped that the trip could go ahead as planned but that everything would depend on developments in the political situation connected to the Anglo-Argentine crisis over the Falkland Islands.

NICARAGUAN LEADER MEETS GONZALES, LAVILLA

LD281700 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1500 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Text] Sergio Ramirez, president of the Nicaraguan governing junta, had a meeting this morning with Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez. According to Socialist sources, approval was voiced at the meeting for the work the Socialist leader has been doing in relation to Central America and the Caribbean area in his capacity as chairman of the Socialist International committee dealing with these matters. The Nicaraguan leader also had a meeting at the Congress of Deputies with Landelino Lavilla.

The Nicaraguan ministers of finance and economic cooperation had meetings this morning with Juan Antonio Garcia Diez, second vice president and minister of economy, and with Agustin Hidalgo, secretary of state for trade [name and title as heard]. The Nicaraguan ministers made requests at both meetings for Spanish firms to participate in projects in Nicaragua. However, no concrete agreements came out of the meetings.

MINISTER OUTLINES DEFENSE POLICY AT CONGRESS

LD282038 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1730 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Text] Minister of Defense Alberto Oliart gave an account of the general lines of his department's policy and of the arms program to the Congress of Deputies Defense Committee today. Oliart, who was accompanied by several representatives of the armed forces, said first that entry into NATO, the recovery of Gibraltar and the presence in the Mediterranean are among the objectives of the government's external defense policy. With regard to internal policy, he stressed the defense of the constitutional order. After setting out the details of these lines of action, Oliart also made it clear that the need for personnel resources in the armed forces is currently greater than the nation can meet.

With regard to the arms program the minister of defense said that a large part of the army's equipment has become obsolete and that it is necessary to give priority to improving anti-tank and antiaircraft defenses. After Oliart's address, a debate began with speeches by the spokesmen for the different parliamentary groups. In answer to their questions the minister of defense said, among other things, that the friendly relations between Spain and Morocco mean that the threat to Ceuta and Melilla is no more than a potential one. He also said that Spain is technically capable of building nuclear arms, but that this is not an immediate objective of the defense policy.

TWO SOVIETS EXPELLED ON SUSPICION OF ESPIONAGE

[Text] Madrid, 28 Apr (AFP) -- Two Soviet Aeroflot employees ordered out of Spain by Sunday on suspicion of espionage left the country early today, reliable sources said. Vladimir Tiritshnikov and Fedorine Nikolayevich, a captain in the Red Army, were accused last week of attempting to infiltrate Spanish military circles for the Soviet military espionage service (GRU). Captain Nikolayevich managed Aeroflot's Spanish operations.

The captain was suspected of attempting to obtain information on U.S. arms sales to Spain, while Mr Tirtishnikov was accused of seeking information on companies constructing military equipment. The two were also believed to be sounding out the reaction of the Spanish military to Spain's planned membership of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). Both flew to Zurich early today, the source said.

Eight Soviet diplomats and civil servants have been expelled from Spain on spying charges since diplomatic relations between Spain and the Soviet Union were renewed in 1977.

'TOTAL EXCLUSION ZONE' ESTABLISHED AS OF 30 APR

LD281142 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1127 GMT 28 Apr 82

[By Alan Jones and Robert Hutchinson, PA defence staff]

[Text] A 200-mile air and sea "total exclusion zone" is to be set up around the Falkland Islands by the British task force, the Defence Ministry announced today. Any ship or aircraft, military or civil, found within the zone will be regarded as hostile and liable to attack by British forces, said a ministry spokesman in London.

The zone will be set up at 1100 hours GMT on Friday and will be similar to the maritime exclusion zone established by Britain at the start of the Falklands crisis. A statement from the ministry said today: "From the time indicated the exclusion zone will apply not only to Argentine warships and Argentine naval auxiliaries but also to any other ship, whether naval or merchant vessel, operating in support of the illegal occupation of the Falkland Islands by Argentine forces." The exclusion zone will also apply to any aircraft, whether military or civil, which is operating in support of the illegal occupation.

"Any ship and any aircraft, whether military or civil, which is found within this zone without due authority from the Ministry of Defence in London will be regarded as operating in support of the illegal occupation and will therefore be regarded as hostile and will be liable to be attacked by British forces."

The statement also said that the airport at Port Stanley will be closed at the same time as the exclusion zone comes into operation. The statement added: "Any aircraft on the ground in the Falkland Islands will be regarded as being in support of the illegal occupation and accordingly is liable to attack.

"These measures are without prejudice to the right of the United Kingdom to take whatever additional measures might be needed in exercise of its right to self defence under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter." The maritime exclusion zone was set up around the islands on April 12.

The announcement of the new zone came within minutes of the end of an emergency cabinet meeting which produced no fresh optimism of a peaceful solution to the crisis.

Mrs Thatcher chaired a meeting of the inner cabinet, followed immediately by the full cabinet, and both lasted more than an hour. The gloomy mood of officials afterwards matched the clear signals being given by Mrs Thatcher that Argentina has had time to comply with the U.N. Security Council resolution and remove its troops from the Falklands and that the government will not go along with any more of what it considers Argentine delaying tactics.

The gloom -- "There is hope but not optimism" was how one official put it -- was widespread despite a fresh message received overnight from U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig formally setting out proposals he has put to the Argentine Government. There was some mystery surrounding the act status of the proposals and they could be similar to the ideas Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym brought back from Washington last week.

The proposals are reported to have been rejected in Buenos Aires and a quick British reaction appeared unlikely today. There was no sign in Whitehall that they offered a quick way out of what most MPs now believe is imminent military action -- if it has not already started.

At today's meetings ministers were brought up to date on the latest diplomatic and military developments, including a report by Mr Pym about his meeting with Common Market foreign ministers in Luxembourg yesterday. Neither Mrs Thatcher nor her ministers would comment on the outcome of the meetings.

The prime minister appeared to the door of No 10 at noon to great the prime minister of Thailand, Gen Prem Tinsulanon who is in Britain on an official visit. He arrived for lunch with Mrs Thatcher and other guests, including Princess Alexandra and Mr Angus Ogilvy.

Mrs Thatcher ignored questions about today's meetings. Ministers also refused to comment as they left Downing Street. Northern Ireland Secretary Mr James Prior would say only that the cabinet meeting was not devoted entirely to the Falklands crisis. But he declined to say what had been discussed.

In Buenos Aires, there was no immediate official Argentine reaction to the announcement of the new exclusion zone. Spokesman for the presidency, Foreign Ministry and military high command told REUTERS they could not immediately comment.

The Ministry of Defence spokesman in London stressed that the zone applied to all ships, and all aircraft, of whatever country, without ministry permission to be in the area. It also applied to any Soviet spy ships which might be tailing British forces.

The spokesman added: "The aviation and hydrographic authorities are being given points of contact within the Ministry of Defence for ships and aircraft to register their interest in the zone. A system is being set up to speedily process any applications for permission to be in the area. "Anyone who thinks of being in the maritime exclusion zone or the total exclusion zone will, I presume, have thought hard about the possible consequences," the spokesman warned.

Meanwhile, the Argentine fleet is still reported to be inside its own 200-mile operation zone off the mainland coast.

The Foreign Office confirmed that Mr Haig's latest proposals had been received in London. A spokesman said: "The American Government put their proposals to the Argentine Government yesterday. They have given us the text. The proposals are under consideration."

The spokesman refused to answer questions about either the contents of the proposals or Britain's likely reaction to them. He said the government welcomed Mr Haig's "untiring efforts" to seek a possible solution.

But he declined to answer what many MPs regard as the critical question -- is Britain ready to call a halt to military action while there is any hope of success in the negotiations?

Whitehall sources did not encourage optimism over Mr Haig's latest move. It appeared that he has put together in a formal way the outcome of his discussions during his period of shuttle diplomacy and since. As these ideas have not been acceptable to either government, hopes were not particularly high in Whitehall.

MINISTRY ANNOUNCES ARGENTINE PRISONER'S DEATH

[By Alan Jones, PA defence staff]

[Text] An Argentinian prisoner on South Georgia, retaken by British troops, has died, the Defence Ministry announced today. A board of inquiry is being set up to investigate the "serious incident," said a military spokesman.

A statement issued by the Ministry of Defence in London said "We have this morning notified the Brazilian Government so that they can inform the Argentine authorities of a serious incident which took place on the 26th April in South Georgia, and which involved the death of an Argentine prisoner.

"We have only recently learned the name of the man who died, and we do not yet have full details of the incident. Instructions have been given for the convening of a board of inquiry on South Georgia which will complete its deliberations as soon as possible. Both the notification to the Brazilians and the setting up of the board of inquiry are strictly in accordance with the third Geneva Convention."

British troops took almost 200 Argentinians prisoner when they counter-invaded South Georgia on Sunday night. A submarine, the Santa Fe, was attacked in the bay at Grytviken and an Argentinian sailor in the vessel suffered a serious leg injury. He had a leg amputated, but it is not known if this the man who has since died.

The man who died was reported to be at Grytviken, and is a member of the Argentine military. His name is known but the Defence Ministry in London today had few details of the circumstances of the death or how it was caused.

The Brazilian Embassy, which in the present crisis is acting on behalf of Argentina, was notified as soon as the news reached London this morning. A spokesman for the Argentine interest section at Brazilian Embassy said today: "We have heard nothing. Everyone is at a meeting at the moment. We may be able to say something later today.

HURD SPEAKS ON FALKLANDS AT EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT

NC281616 Paris AFP in English 1605 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Text] Strasbourg, eastern France, 28 Apr (AFP) -- Britain's recapture of South Georgia "is not intended to halt the search for a negotiated settlement" in the Falklands crisis, British Minister of State at the Foreign Office Douglas Hurd told the Western Europe Parliament here today.

Diplomatic efforts to settle the crisis are continuing, he added. It was Argentina that had opened hostilities, he said. Britain had exercised its right of self-defence as recognised by the United Nations Charter.

"The principle of self-determination," he said, "is one to which we in Europe are particularly attached, because it is the foundation of our own nation-states. We are simply not going to let this principle be [word indistinct] by Argentina in respect to the Falkland Islands."

The Falklanders themselves, he said, have always pronounced in favor of membership of the British Commonwealth, "but all the indications are that the Argentinians intend to incorporate the Falkland Islands as an integral part of their country."

OPPOSITION DEMANDS RESPONSE TO UN APPEAL

LD281908 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1847 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Excerpt] The Labour Party's ruling national executive today came close to withdrawing opposition support from the government over the crisis. The executive carried unanimously a resolution tabled by Mr Michael Foot calling on the government to respond "immediately and favourably" to the United Nations appeal to both sides not take any fresh action which would broaden the conflict.

Labour is now agreed that the United Nations must be invited to intervene as a last resort to prevent more fighting. Mr Foot's resolution, which has the backing of Mr Tony Benn, also pressed the government to institute immediate discussions with the UN Secretary General Senor Javier Perez de Cuellar to see how his proposals could best be put into effect.

Mr Foot's motion was backed by his deputy, Shadow Foreign Secretary Mr Denis Healey, and left-winger Mr Eric Heffer, opposition front bench spokesman on European affairs.

Afterwards the executive rejected, by 15 votes to eight with two abstentions, a resolution tabled by Mr Benn and supported by Party Chairman Dame Judith Hart calling for the task force to sail back to South Georgia instead of advancing on the Falklands. Mr Benn, conscious of opposition to his move, had struck out a passage that the task force should withdraw altogether.

GOVERNMENT 'EXPECTS' ARGENTINE REPLY TO PLAN

LD290848 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0929 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Text] Whitehall was not making clear today whether a formal deadline exists for a reply from Argentina on the Haig peace plan, but it seems that a reply is expected by this weekend. If there is a sign of movement, another intervention by Mr Haig cannot be ruled out.

American officials have already said that an outbreak of hostilities is not in the interests of the United States. It is now largely accepted that both Britain and Argentina are indulging in "disinformation" as part of the negotiating process. Because of this it is difficult to say just how near they might be to a diplomatic agreement.

ISRAELI ARMS SALES TO ARGENTINA DISPUTED

LD290830 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0820 GMT 29 Apr 82

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] A dispute has developed between Britain and Israel over the alleged sale of Israeli arms to Argentina. Israel today expressed "astonishment" at the way the Foreign Office had handled the allegations.

A statement was issued by the Israeli Embassy in London after the British ambassador in Israel, Mr Patrick Moberly, had been called in to the Israeli Foreign Ministry. Publicity about the matter, the statement said, had enhanced rumours "regarding Israel's position in the British-Argentine dispute and distorted her actual policy completely."

However, in London, officials noted that the Israeli statement did not amount to a denial that Israeli arms had been sold to Argentina. The Israeli ambassador in London was called to the Foreign Office two days ago and at the same time the British ambassador made representations in Israel.

Afterwards the Foreign Office made a brief non-commital statement which said: "We are naturally concerned about the reports which we have seen and we have been in touch with the Israeli Government in London and in Tel Aviv at ambassadorial level."

Foreign Office Minister Mr Douglas Hurd carried the matter further in a Commons answer. In reply to a question by Tory MP for Northhampton North, Mr Tony Marlow, who asked about the provision of Israeli arms to Argentina, he said: "We have discussed this matter with the Israeli Government and asked them to ensure that no further Israeli arms go to Argentina."

LISSARIDHIS ANNOUNCES EDEK'S POLICY PROGRAM

[Text] Speaking at a press conference in Nicosia today, socialist EDEK party Chairman Lissaridhis gave the basic lines of his party's program for the next presidential elections. Mr Lissaridhis said the Cyprus problem is a question of occupation and trampling of human rights and no solution to the problem is acceptable unless it safeguards the unitary status, full independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty of Cyprus as well as its nonaligned policy and equal rights for citizens without discrimination to national descent or religion.

He also said that the solution, which must be based on the UN resolution, cannot be accomplished without the complete withdrawal of the Turkish occupation troops and, finally, the eradication of every foriegn military presence throughout Cyprus. Mr Lissaridhis added that PASOK's assumption of power [in Greece] and Greek Prime Minister Papandreou's position on the Cyprus issue have created highly significant prospects that the Cyprus issue will be turned to the correct course. He also said that it is imperative for the Cyprus issue to be repositioned as a question of occupation and stressed the need for defense shielding and the creation of the necessary militant climate.

Mr Lissaridhis went on to say that, along with the demand for the punishment of the few guilty people, the socialist EDEK party proclaims a popular reconciliation -- a reconciliation that will lead to patriotic unity and the patriotic exercising of power.

Concerning the economic field, Mr Lissaridhis said that the economic situation is being led toward destruction and noted that his party will release an analytical program aiming at the productive revival of the economy.

With regard to the next presidential elections, Mr Lissaridhis said that, for the democratic course of the elections, it is now imperative that ministers of common trust be appointed to those ministries connected with the elections.

Later, Mr Lissaridhis answered questions from newsmen. Asked if proposals had been made to EDEK for cooperation in the elections, he replied in the affirmative. He added, however, that the talks which followed were insincere because, as he put it, while the talks were conducted some sides had already drawn their conclusion. Concerning the National Council, Mr Lissaridhis said that he will attend if invited, but that there is the possibility of his withdrawing if he establishes that a line was drawn up in advance. Answering a question, Mr Lissaridhis said he does not believe in an independent [presidential] candidate. He also said there is no chance of withdrawing his candidacy for the presidential elections.

GREEK SPOKESMAN DENIES PAPANDREOU COMMENT REPORT

NC282202 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Text] Mr Maroudhas, the government spokesman in Athens, deputy minister to the prime minister in charge of press affairs, was asked to comment on a report by Athens newspaper MESIMVRINI in which Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou is alleged to have referred to the recent internal political developments in Cyprus during a speech to navy officers. The spokesman stated the following: If the prime minister included this [issue], he included it within the framework on national defense. Nevertheless, Maroudhas reiterated that the newspaper's entire report is absolutely inaccurate and distorts the truth.

SECURITY MEASURES FOR AL-QADHDHAFI VISIT NOTED

NC281604 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 28 Apr 82 p 7

[Text] The security measures which will be taken for Libyan leader Muammar al-Qadhdhafi, who is coming on an official visit, will be much "tougher" than the measures which had been taken for Yasir 'Arafat. Strict silence is being maintained on Al-Qadhdhafi's arrival and movements. Until last evening not one of the responsible people at the Foreign Ministry knew at which airfield the Libyan leader's plane will land or when he will finally come to Athens.

According to some authoritative newspaper reports Al-Qadhdhafi will not come on Friday but on Thursday afternoon. This is because Friday ia a "day of prayer" for the Libyan leader, who does not intend to violate it.

The only people who should know details of the Libyan leader's arrival are the country's security authorities, and they are not talking. In any case, all anti-Al-Qadhdhafi Libyans residing in Greece are under surveillance, although no arrests have been made.

In addition to the president of the republic and the prime minister, Al-Qadhdhafi will meet with diplomats, Greek technicians and university professors.

Public appearances and official luncheons at which Al-Qadhdhafi was to have made an appearance have been reduced at the request of his personal security personnel who have been in Greece since the day before yesterday. In all, 10 Libyan guards for Al-Qadhdhafi are participating in consecutive conferences that are taking place at the Public Order Ministry. Yesterday, Minister I. Skoularikis visited the president and -- according to some reports -- briefed him on the measures that will be taken. The Libyan leader will give only one speech, while the issue of whether reporters will be able to follow his movements remains "open." Specifically, Greek and foreign reporters have asked to be permitted to follow his arrival from open cars. It appears that the request will not be acceped by the Libyans.

During his stay in Athens Al-Qadhdhafi intends to make a generous donation so that a mosque can be built in Greece, something that is an old Arab demand.

This concerning Al-Qadhdhafi who, as we have said, is expected in Athens tomorrow afternoon....

COUNCIL VOTES FOR ARGENTINE TROOP WITHDRAWAL

LD291150 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1144 GMT 29 Apr 82

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Strasbourg]

[Text] MPs representing the 21-nation Council of Europe today voted overwhelmingly for the withdrawal of Argentine troops from the Falklands and called on both governments to seek a diplomatic solution.

Only one Spanish member of the council's Parliamentary Assembly voted against while other Spanish members abstained in the vote on a resolution expressing "solidarity with the United Kingdom's declared aim of achieving a peaceful and fair solution." Attempts by Spanish members to include in the resolution a call for an immediate withdrawal "of all forces" in order to reach a negotiated solution were defeated.

The final resolution was amended to include a reference to Argentina as "currently a military dictatorship in which human rights are violated and fundamental freedoms non-existent."

It supported the UN Security Council Resolution 502 and recommended the foreign ministers of member governments to appeal to Britian and Argentina to compel with it and to reopen negotiations aimed at a peaceful settlement, "bearing in mind the principles of the United Nations Charter and the international human rights covenants and the legitimate interests of the population."

The latest backing for Britian followed a two-hour debate in which MPs -- who represent their national governments in the council -- condemned Argentina's "violation of international law." There were repeated calls for a peaceful settlement and for every effort to be made to avoid further military conflict.

Sir Frederick Bennett, the MP for Torbay, and the leader of Britain's MPs in the assembly, said it was "wholly inaccurate and unfounded" to refer to the invasion of the Falklands as a question of decolonization on the part of Argentina.

He said the Argentine junta was itself guilty of colonization in its "most abhorrent" form. "The principle thing that we have surely learnt after all the lessons of the 1930s is that the modern integrated world cannot survive in peace and security if unprovoked cases of aggression are allowed."

He said similar threats were posed by dictatorship throughout South America and in Africa. Chile had been "within an ace" of being invaded by Argentina. He added: "We must not confuse an act of aggression with the right to self-defence of those who are invaded."

One Belgian socialist said members should not forget the debt owed to Great Britain for the role it played in the second world war.

Even Spanish members who felt unable to support the resolution were careful not to be seen in total support of Argentina. One referred to the conflict felt by Spaniards who had close links with Latin America but were also Europeans, with applications to join the EEC and NATO.

CLAIMS OF FRG NUCLEAR INVOLVEMENT REJECTED

NC291309 Paris AFP in English 1241 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Text] Brussels, 29 Apr (AFP) -- The vice-president of the Commission of European Communities here today rejected claims that West Germany and Argentina were collaborating to produce nuclear weapons in Argentina.

The Argentina-West German deal does not violate the principle of peaceful use of nuclear power, CEC number two Etienne Davignon said, reacting to a British Broadcasting Corporation report.

He denied that fissionable materials had been misappropriated on West German territory, and said the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in Vienna recently said there were no incidents of misappropriation of nuclear power producing materials in Argentina either.

"Both countries abide by the clauses (of their agreement) pertaining to the peaceful use of nuclear materials and submit to the on-the-spot controls required by the EURATOM Treaty, the London Suppliers Group and the IAEA," he said.

BRITAIN'S BUDGET CLAIM STILL UNRESOLVED

LD271840 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1802 GMT 27 Apr 82

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Luxembourg]

[Text] Hopes of a swift settlement of Britain's Common Market budget complaint faded tonight after a meeting of EEC foreign ministers in Luxembourg.

Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym rejected a cash offer from the UK's Common Market partners as "a long way from what Britain wants." But Mr Pym, attending his first meeting of EEC foreign ministers, said there were signs of progress in efforts to reduce Britain's share of the community bill.

Talks are to be reconvened, probably on May 8, in an effort to settle the amount, duration and method of keeping Britain's net contribution in line with her ability to pay.

Mr Pym said today he was still seeking a deal which lasted for at least five years to prevent the problem recurring and damaging Community solidarity. But he firmly dismissed the current offer, which amounts to a cash rebate of about 400 million pounds a year for the next three years.

The government claims that without a rebate agreement, Britain faces a net contribution to the Community budget of about 1,000 million pounds a year. Mr Pym said Britain was not prepared to agree to farm price of more than 10 percent this year -- as his partners want -- without agreement on the budget.

It is largely because of the high cost of running the EEC's farm policy that Britain has become one of only two net contributors to the budget. Apart from West Germany, all other Common Market members get back more than they pay in.

[Special DIE PRESSE report]

[Summary] Apparently the consequences of the case of [Czechoslovak spy] Hodic have now been finally overcome: After long diplomatic preparations CSSR Foreign Minister Bohuslav Chnoupek will come to Austria on 6 May for a 3-day official visit. Later in May, CSSR Transportation Minister Vladimir Blazek and Foreign Trade Minister Bohumil Urban will pay visits to Vienna.

During Chnoupek's visit two agreements will be signed, including a legal assistance agreementwhich is taking into consideration Austria's special position as a country of asylum as far as extradition commitments are concerned. In addition to measures to facilitate entry for Austrian tourists, Prague is reportedly interested in cooperation with Austria in the energy sector and intends to invite Austria to participate in the Bratislava-Devin nuclear power project as well as in some conventional power projects.

PAHR ATTACKS TURKEY IN COUNCIL OF EUROPE

AU300830 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 30 Apr 82 p 3

[Excerpt] Strasbourg -- On Monday in the Council of Europe Ministers Committee Austrian Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr appealed to the Turkish Government to release political prisoners and to respect human rights. Should there be an essential delay regarding these steps, Austria could not continue to believe the Turkish Government is seriously striving to restore democratic conditions, he said.

Although on the one hand some progress was to be noted regarding respect for human rights, there have been on the other hand new arrests instead of the release of political prisoners, Foreign Minister Pahr declared. He especially criticized the renewed arrest of former Turkish Premier Ecevit.

In view of these actions it is becoming increasingly difficult to believe that the Turkish Government wants to return to a pluralist democracy as conceived by the Council of Europe, Pahr said.

[Text] Bonn, 29 Apr (DPA) -- The leadership of the FDP Parliamentary Group expressly rejected reports on Thursday to the effect that it wants to bring about a break in the coalition with the SPD this summer. SCHMIDT COMMENTS ON INTER-GERMAN RELATIONS

[Excerpts] Bonn, 29 Apr (DPA) -- Against a background of reports of a threat of a hardening of attitudes on relations with the GDR, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today expressed cautious confidence about further developments in inter-German relations. Speaking at the change of top-level posts in the chancellor's office, which is part of the cabinet reshuffle, Schmidt said he hopes that further progress will be possible, even in a difficult international situation. Recalling his meeting with SED chief Erich Honecker at the end of last year, Schmidt noted that personal relations between the political leaderships of the two states have impoved in recent months.

The outgoing Bonn permanent representative in the GDR and new government spokesman, Klaus Boelling, urged at his assumption of office in the presence of the chancellor that "notwithstanding all difficulties, we remain in contact with the leading figures in the other German state." Boelling also warned against people in the Federal Republic forgetting to think about and feel for the Germans in the GDR.

GENSCHER, HAIG DISCUSS FALKLANDS, TALK WITH USSR

[Excerpts] Bonn, 29 Apr (DPA) -- In a lengthy telephone conversation today, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher assured Alexander Haig of the "Federal Government's continuing support" for Haig's mediation efforts in the Falklands conflict.

In the talk with the U.S. secretary of state, Genscher also expressed his "great satisfaction" at Haig's speech to the all-American Chamber of Commerce in which he expressly stressed the U.S. readiness for negotiations with Moscow. The two ministers also exchanged views on the forthcoming NATO conferences in Luxembourg (17-18 May) and in Bonn (10 June).

BECKER: SUPPORT TO UK 'APPLIES' TO 'PEACE' MOVES

LD281442 Hamburg DPA in German 1358 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Text] Bonn, 28 Apr (DPA) -- Europe's unchanged solidarity with Great Britain in the Falklands question apparently only applies as far as the efforts to find a peaceful solution to the conflict are concerned. This was learned from information given by Government Spokesman Kurt Becker today on the cabinet session at which Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher reported on the [European] Council meeting in Luxembourg.

European solidarity applies to the condemnation of the Argentine act of force in occupying the Falkland Islands and to all efforts to settle the conflict peacefully, stressed Becker, "particularly to the efforts by the U.S. secretary of state."

GOVERNMENT AGAIN DENIES NUCLEAR AID TO ARGENTINA

[Text] Bonn, 29 Apr (DPA) -- The Federal Government has again denied most emphatically the alleged German cooperation with Argentina in the construction of nuclear weapons. During question time in the Bundestag, Minister of State at the Foreign Ministry Peter Corterier (SPD) today gave the assurance, in connection with accusations to this effect on British television, that no enriched uranium had been supplied illegally from the Federal Republic to Argentina. Neither was there any cooperation in the construction of a reprocessing plant.

Commenting on information that Argentina was able, with the help of enriched uranium from the USSR and of German nuclear technology, to manufacture nuclear bombs within the country, Corterier said that Bonn had no knowledge indicating that such fears were justified. He pointed to a statement by the EEC Commission in Brussels which he said made it clear that the various agreements between the Federal Republic and Argentina in the field of nuclear cooperation were in full accord with the agreements on the peaceful use of nuclear energy.

IRANIAN ENVOY DENIES INVOLVEMENT IN CLASH

[Excerpts] Bonn, 29 Apr (DPA) -- Following the mass brawl between Iranian students in Mainz, Iranian Ambassador in Bonn Mehdi Navab has made serious accusations against FRG authorities. At a press conference today he said that German authorities have a partisan attitude toward Iranians in the Federal Republic, favoring opponents of the revolution and causing "great difficulties" for Khomeyni supporters. This attitude has been apparent for some time, as for example after the attack on the Islamic Center in Hamburg on 20 July 1981 and the attack on the Bonn embassy by opponents of the revolution on 3 August 1981.

The ambassador again sharply rejected accusations by the Mainz police headquarters that the embassy was the instigator of the brawl between Iranian Khomeyni supporters and opponents of the revolution over the weekend. He said he could guarantee that neither he nor any of the embassy staff were connected with the incident.

Meanwhile, the Iranian Embassy has pressed charges of slander against the Mainz police headquarters, he said. However, the embassy is prepared to respond to any request by the Federal Government for clarification of the accusations.

The ambassador strongly rejected fears expressed in Bonn that the German Embassy in Tehran could be open to reprisals from Khomeyni supporters in the wake of the Mainz events. He also assured the Foreign Ministry in Bonn that the German Embassy in Tehran is well protected and that there need be no fears in this score.

The Bonn Foriegn Ministry has said the Iranian ambassador's accusations are without foundation. Responding to a query, Foreign Ministry spokesman stressed at the same time that the Federal Government accepted the assurances of the Iranian authorities that the Bonn embassy in Tehran is not in any danger. The spokesman added that the Foreign Ministry has no proof of "any kind of participation" by the Iranian Embassy in the Mainz incidents.

MITTERRAND INTERVIEWED ON EVE OF DENMARK VISIT

FM281323 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 25 Apr 82 p 5

[Birgit Rasmussen Paris interview with French President Francois Mitterrand; date not given]

[Excerpt] Paris -- "The Danes are a small people who have always been able to exert a disproportionate influence on the rest of the world -- a sign of quality." Friendly words said to us by French President Francois Mitterrand in an interview on the eve of his official visit to Denmark. In more concrete terms he reminded us that France's proposal for European cooperation not only in the economic but also in the social field -- the fight against unemployment, which is winning growing support, was only given a clearly positive reaction by Denmark when it was first made in Luxembourg. The president said that he could talk for several hours about the Versailles summit and French ideas for stimulating the economy.

"I have written a report for the summit and will make concrete proposals," he said. On the threats to peace and relations with the United States and the Soviet Union: "While the Russians have been proceeding with the deployment of their SS-20 missiles and have therefore been creating serious imbalance in relative strengths in Europe, I have supported the reestablishment of balance. It is true that my predecessor reached no decision about the Pershing missiles, because in his time France seldom reached any clear decision on anything at all. I prefer to speak plainly, to say 'no' to the Russians if I feel like it, and to the Americans, too, of course."

On French arms sales, to Nicaragua, for example: "The peoples in Central America also have a right to self-determination, a right not to live in poverty oppressed by dictators and ruthless men who wield the economic power. If this embarrasses the Americans, it is a pity -- and it does embarrass them. But the United States must understand that it is by opposing the demands of the people that it creates an opening for Cuba and the Soviet Union. Even democrats who have to fight take their weapons where they can get them. We have to be a little intelligent here. The fact that the United States has now begun to negotiate with Nicaragua is an encouraging sign that U.S. diplomacy is able to show sense. France's little arms contract with Nicaragua is mostly a symbolic gesture to show our solidarity. We do not intend to make it into some sort of system of selling arms to countries where there are wars."

Could France be expected to make a similar gesture toward the Afghan resistance movement? "Hardly; we are less directly involved there, and if we did so, we would keep quiet about it. But my prime minister has officially received representatives of the Afghan resistance movement in Paris.

"It is true that in per capita terms France is the world's largest arms exporter. For 20 years we have been producing excellent weapons which sell well. They give hundreds of thousands of French people employment. I want to redirect these industries, but I cannot do so with a wave of a magic wand. Finally, exports allow us to develop and maintain sophisticated weapons for ourselves. In itself the French market would be too small."

On his own anxiety about nuclear war: "Of course, it is impossible for me to take the arms buildup coolly and calmly, but come back to me when Mr Brezhnev and Mr Reagan have renounced their arms race. It is also impossible for me to take a cool and calm view of starvation and poverty. If the world perishes it could also do so through the deepening of the gulf between North and South. These are the two threats hanging over the world."

On peace movements: "It is a good thing that someone is fighting against war mentality, the methods, war in general, if this is being done honestly and not on the basis of an ideological prejudice against one camp or the other.

"I can well understand that the peace movement should be growing in your country too, given the buildup of nuclear arms around it. And I understand what anxiety they can cause in a country like Germany, which does not have a free hand with respect to its own defense but does have a large number of destructive weapons in and around the country. It causes great anxiety to be dependent on other countries in this respect, and I fully understand the reactions."

On a more significant global role for France: "Yes, I think we could have greater influence. And this has already been happening in the last few months in the Third World. In my opinion it is in North-South relations that France could play a decisive role."

'REVOLUTIONARY BRIGADES' MAKE POLITICAL DEMANDS

[Text] Paris, 28 Apr (AFP) -- The "French Revolutionary Brigades," in a message received by AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE here today, claimed they were responsible for the kidnapping Sunday of French author and pamphleteer Jean-Edern Hallier.

In return for his release, the Brigades -- a hitherto unknown group -- called on President Francois Mitterrand to sack the four Communist ministers in the government. They also demanded the resignation of Interior Minister Gaston Defferre, whom they described as "a corrupt and inept politician," the cancellation of agreements with the Soviet Union for the supply of natural gas and for aid to the Afghanistan resistance movement.

They set a deadline of 1900 (1700 GMT) Sunday, May 2, for their demands to be met, but did not say what they would do to Mr Hallier if they were not. The message received by AFP bore the author's signature and a postscript in which he said: "I am fine and well treated."

The Brigades' message said they had kidnapped Mr Hallier, 43, because of his links with the Socialist-Communist government. The French people will never give in to terrorism directed by the Kremlin and carried out by its satellites. "We will respond to terror with terror," the message added.

The four Communist ministers the Brigades want removed are: Charles Fiterman, transport; Jack Ralite, health; Anicet le Pors, civil service and administrative reform; and Marcel Rigout, professional training.

Mr Hallier recently published a new book entitled "Breviaire our une Jeunesse Deracinee" (Breviary For Uprooted Youth).

PCI DIRECTORATE URGES DEMOCRATIC ALTERNATIVE NOW

[Apparent text of undated PCI Directorate document: "Struggle and Unity for Positive Response to Crisis"]

[Text] The PCI Directorate has examined the serious and worrying events that over the past few days have led the five-party government once again to the brink of a crisis and threatened the country with a traumatic break in the legislative term. It is a positive factor that the aims and attempts to press for early elections have been stopped for the time being, thanks to the clear-cut declaration of the president of the republic, the evident alarmed opposition of a large proportion of the public and the action of several political forces, primarily and most clearly the PCI. Nevertheless, the political crisis still persists and has indeed been exacerbated. The laborious and precarious solution of the umpteenth clash within the majority and the government indicates the extreme erosion and the disastrous results of a line and a coalition whose declared pledge was to guarantee governability, with the claim that there was no alternative.

The truth is that our society's needs for regeneration have remained entirely unsatisfied. What is worse, there has been a failure to tackle the most acute socioeconomic problems (unemployment, pensions, housing), to wage a consistent struggle against the criminal activities of the Mafia hierarchy or to begin a serious moralization of public life. There has been a failure to guarantee an autonomous Italian presence in the international field for halting the arms race and for resolving current conflicts, starting with the one in the Middle East. Indeed, the lamentable decision has been taken to build the missile base at Comiso.

The truth is that by accepting anticommunist discrimination and by foregoing building, together with all the leftwing and people's forces, a clear alternative of policies and of alignment to the DC power system, instead of governability there has been a struggle for the redistribution of power within the uneasy alliance with the DC. The result of this policy is now evident to all. The instability has increased. There has been a worrying increase of degenerative phenomena in interparty relations and in the concept and practice of government -- cronyism, blackmail and misuse of delicate state posts and machinery, of which the Cirillo case is a typical example.

This cannot continue. Under such conditions, plans and programs for change, albeit limited and gradual, become entirely unrealistic and illusory. Indeed there is a danger of leading the working classes to defeat, or frustrating the energies and innovative thrusts of the world or production, culture and technology, and of causing a further deterioration of democracy and of the country. The time has come for the leftwing democratic forces to issue a positive response to the Italian crisis, to commit themselves to an open dialogue and a joint endeavor, to assert a policy of regeneration and reform of society and the state. To this end it is necessary to transcend the machinery and order of the DC power structure, to eliminate the discrimination and splittism that have distorted and impeded the democratic system. To this end it is necessary to build a social and political alignment loyal to a policy of progress and transformation and with the ideas and strength to implement it.

The democratic alternative increasingly seems like the necessary and possible political prospect for governing the country. The PCI Directorate, invoking the points of the latest Central Committee meeting, pledges the Communists to advancing this prospect through the struggle to resolve the workers' and peoples masses' most pressing problems, through the development of unitary movements for peace and disarmament and through the quest for every kind of convergence and understanding among the leftwing forces, and primarily with the PSI. It is now essential for the leftwing forces and for democracy to support the workers' and trade unions' struggles to defeat the class attempt at recovery being made by a sector of the employers.

It is also of primary importance in this situation to defend and to impart a new thrust to the role and scope for initiative of the local authorities. The PCI intends to promote and assert its ideas, its role and its strength so that the necessary debate and dialogue throughout the country and in Parliament can produce solutions capable of guaranteeing Parliament the positive and normal fulfillment of its mandate, of improving the political climate and of starting a change in the orientation, programs and methods of government.

EL PAIS INTERVIEWS PEREZ DE CUELLAR ON FALKLANDS

PA301135 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1037 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Madrid, 30 Apr (EFE) -- UN Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar has expressed the need to find "a quick solution to the Falklands (Malvinas Islands) conflict." He made this statement to a special correspondent from the Madrid newspaper EL PAIS.

In an interview published today by the independent morning paper, Perez de Cuellar said that "it is indispensable to find a quick solution, which will put an end to military actions and will be the beginning of talks." The UN secretary general said that "the international situation is, generally speaking, so unstable, and there is so much political tension in the world, that anything might turn into a detonator."

He said, "Unfortunately, this is not just anything. This is a great conflict between England, which is a great power, and a highly developed Latin American country." He added: "Furthermore, because of the geographical circumstances, this conflict could assume a magnitude that no one expects."

Referring to the UN's efforts, Perez de Cuellar told EL PAIS that the organization "has already done its part according to the UN Charter. That is to say, it has approved a resolution on the conflict." The UN secretary general said that the interested parties must be given time to comply with Security Council Resolution 502, urging Argentina and Great Britain to stop all military activities and to start diplomatic talks.

Perez had to admit that "there is really some confusion, but the main thing is that the negotiating process which Secretary of State Alexander Haig has so bravely and conscientiously started, is still alive." Perez de Cuellar said: "Under these circumstances, and until these talks are ended, the UN Secretary General believes in not obstructing the negotiating process. It is not up to the United Nations to tell Mr Haig: Well, you are no good. Here we are."

The UN secretary general told the Spanish newspaper that he doesn't believe that "the UN Security Council will adopt a resolution ordering the secretary general to negotiate. This is very hard to do unless the two parties agree."

He pointed out that as a permanent member of the Security Council, the United Kingdom can veto a mediator proposed by the United Nations. He said that as he is Spanish-American, it might be perhaps hard for the British "to accept a Hispanic, and a South American who comes from so close to the area in conflict, as a mediator."

Perez de Cuellar said: "I have to abstain. They have to ask me. I cannot offer myself, because it is not my personality, but my position, that is involved." He said in conclusion: "If I offer my services and they tell me, well sir, we do not accept you, it will not be I who comes out losing. The post of UN secretary general would be the loser."

FRANCE'S MITTERRAND ARRIVES FOR 3-DAY VISIT

LD281632 Paris Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 28 Apr 82

[Text] Francois Mitterrand has just arrived in Copenhagen for a 3-day official visit to Denmark. He was met at the airport by Queen Margrethe of Denmark and Prime Minister Jorgensen.

Addresses Parliament

LD291440 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Text] Francois Mitterrand met Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen this morning. There are no real disagreements between France and Denmark. The two countries have identical points of view on the crisis shaking the Common Market. The only black spot is France's nuclear armaments policy which displeases the Danes. The president of the republic took this into account a short while ago.

In a speech to the Danish national assembly, five socialist deputies in the chamber put on T-shirts featuring a three-colored atomic mushroom with the word "Mururoa" underneath: Their message was clear but they also gave it further emphasis with another word above the mushroom -- "socialism" followed by a large question mark. The president was quickly induced to justify French nuclear policy, as he had done before the Japanese parliament a fortnight ago.

[Begin Mitterrand recording] I remember the time -- I have not forgotten it -- when I myself developed the idea that France might be able to ensure her defense without recourse to the possession of nuclear armaments. But the choices of my people must be respected and it is now a quarter of a century since these choices were made against my own feelings.

But it is also a quarter of a century since France's defense has depended on this form of armament -- I mean that if it disappeared, nothing would remain of my country's means of defense. One must understand that although I may not have been master of the choice of our arms, I am now responsible for my country's security and I take what I have and see to it that my country's arms remain at level to ensure their survival. One must understand that this is not an ideological choice. In a harsh world, where the two most powerful nations possess formidable atomic armies [as heard] there exists what is called a relationship of the weak to the strong. [end recording]

KOIVISTO RETURNS FROM STATE VISIT TO SWEDEN

LD291700 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1430 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Text] President Mauno Koivisto returned home from a 3-day state visit to Sweden today. President Koivisto said he was satisfied with his visit which fulfilled all expectations. During his first state visit Koivisto had talks on Finnish-Swedish economic relations with Premier Thorbjorn Falldin and the leaders of Swedish Government and opposite parties. Koivisto denied a report published today by the SVENSKA DAGBLADET newspaper to the effect that he proposed to his hosts during the visit that Finland and Sweden conclude a so-called Nordic agreement. Such a cooperation agreement would, according to the Swedish paper, safeguard the economic links between Finland and Sweden in the future. According to President Koivisto, strengthening cooperation was discussed in Finland, but the development of the matter is still at such an early stage that it is not appropriate to adopt a stand on the matter. During his visit President Koivisto invited his hosts, Carl XVI Gustaf and Queen Silvia, to visit Finland.

ARGENTINA'S COSTA MENDEZ INTERVIEWED ON BBC

LD291040 London BBC Domestic Service in English 0919 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Telephone interview with Argentine Foreign Minister Nicanor Costa Mendez in Washington by journalist David Frost in London on 28 April -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Dr Costa Mendez is there in Washington. Dr Costa Mendez, thank you for joining us.

[Answer] I must mention that I have been a listener of the BBC for many, many years and am very happy to speak through the BBC to the London public.

[Question] Well, thank you very much indeed. The BBC's motto is "Nation shall speak peace unto nation," so may that situation soon be restored. What do you think of today's developments, the two developments today, Dr Costa Mendez, the...

[Answer] Well, let me say this: For some time many people thought that our cause was the cause of a military government, of a dictatorship that wanted this in order to save itself [word indistinct]. But now many people can see that this is a cause of the nation, that has assembled many in the streets to greet the government and to support the government in the streets. But now after yesterday's meeting of the OAS we can show the world that this is not only the cause of the government, of the nation, but that Latin America as a whole is supporting our cause, and it's a Latin American cause. Latin America has recognized the essential point -- to my judgment the essential point -- which is sovereignty of the islands.

[Question] But at the same time, Dr Costa Mendez, their support is mainly in words, and I think that you would probably agree that if the United States had to choose between Britain's cause and Argentina's, would you not agree that they would have to choose Britain's?

[Answer] I have strong doubts because I think and I have always thought that for the American Government it is a very difficult choice -- that I acknowledge -- a very difficult choice between a very old ally and a very strong deep interest in Europe the one hand, but also very strong interests and ties with the developing world and specially with Latin America. I don't think that the U.S. Government can risk facing a united Latin America that would criticize if the United States sides with Britain.

[Question] But at the same time the support of the OAS was a little less strong than you must have expected. It was mainly words, wasn't it?

[Answer] No, I'm afraid you have not interpreted the resolution well. It's far more than words. In the first place, the resolution has for the first time inserted the words "The Argentine sovereignty of the islands should be the basis for any agreement," which is far more than words in my view.

[Question] Well, what do you feel about Mr Haig's latest proposal? They're leaking out here in London.

[Answer] Mr Haig has done an excellent work and a gallant effort for the cause of peace. We are studying his latest proposals, as I understand England is studying his latest proposals too.

[Question] Yes, and it's said here that really there are three parts to it: "The withdrawal plans, the interim administration, and then the self-determination of the future of the Falklands people. What do you feel about each of those?

[Answer] Well, I couldn't tell you on the air what I feel. This is something which I should discuss in private with Mr Haig and then after that I could give you my own opinion. But what I would like to see is for Argentina -- this is a problem of peace, I am a man of peace, I came here to fight for the cause of peace, and we are ready to negotiate everything except sovereignty, everything, I underscore this. [sentence as heard] We are the [word indistinct] and we are ready to negotiate the future of the island, the future of the islanders who would like to live on the islands, the future of relations between Britain and Argentina in the area, the interests of Britain in the islands in the future, everything except the fact that this land belongs to Argentina.

[Question] Would you let the islanders of the Falkland Islands vote on that issue as well? Would you let the Falkland Islanders confirm that they want Argentina to have that sovereignty?

[Answer] Well, this is not up to them. This is a problem of Argentina not of the islanders. We cannot leave it up to the judgment of 1,800 people whether this is our land or not.

[Question] No, at the same time, obviously that has also been the position of David Steele in this country. There was news a few hours ago here as I am sure you know of course that Britain is establishing a total exclusion zone around the Falkland Islands starting on Friday at noon to a radious of 200 nautical miles and a warning that any aircraft or ships found within the zone without the Defense Ministry's permission will be liable to attack. What is your reaction to that?

[Answer] Well, our reaction, you will feel it in the air, on the land and in the sea. I am afraid that if Britain insists on this, you know what I feel is that the Malvinas could be Britain's Vietnam.

[Question]...could be Britain's Vietnam?

[Answer] Yes, it is a place 10,000 miles from London, very difficult to defend, against the will of everybody, against every just, modern attitude, sending a fleet to defend two barren and rocky islands, and to defend 1,800 people, most of them employees of a monopolist country; I don't understand that.

[Question] No, but at the same time, it is not against the wishes, most of the world supports Britain's stand, doesn't it? I mean you must have seen the United Nations...

[Answer] Well I'm not sure about that, perhaps the European world yes, but the Third World doesn't.

[Question] Well the Third World didn't make its voice heard at the UN yet, did it?

[Answer] Oh yes it has. On Monday.

[Question] In what way?

[Answer] The meeting of the nonaligned countries.

[Question] Yes, but in general the United Nations still stands foursquare on condemning Argentina's aggression, doesn't it?

[Answer] I'm afraid that they will change.

[Question] They will change. How soon do you think they will change?

[Answer] Well as soon as they know the facts and the realities.

[Question] What do you think would happen if the Falkland Islands dwellers, the people who live there, were given the chance to vote -- if they were given the chance to vote -- on whether they wished to belong to Britain or Argentina, how do you think do think those 1,800 people would vote?

[Answer] If they want to vote and want to belong to Britain, they can go to Britain. If they leave Argentina we will compensate them for that. But we want our land, our sovereignty not to be under discussion, and under the vote of 1,800 Britons.

[Question] But in other words, they are free to leave and you would compensate them.

[Answer] More than free to leave. We will compensate them largely if they want to leave and we will compensate them and keep all their rights, religion, private rights, their municipal rights -- they are entitled to have local [illegible]nment and that sort. We want to give them all they want. Do you know, perhaps you [illegible] know, that for the last 10 or 12 years, those people have lived and depended on Argentina. Argentina has provided their communications, Argentina has provided sea communications. Through Argentina they have received food, through Argentina they have received medical care, in fact Argentina has paid for the welfare state of the island.

[Question] But the Falklands Island, Dr Costa Mendez, are essentially democratic. Argentina is not. How could you give them democratic rights, if you don't...

[Answer] I don't accept that judgment. Argentina is as democratic as islanders. If we have at this moment a military government, our idea, our ideals are fully democratic. And I can tell you this, not only of myself but all my friends, all the people I really know [sentence as heard].

[Question] How is it democratic? Sorry I missed that.

[Answer] I mean that our democratic ideal, perhaps has been interrupted now but we have very deep democratic ideals. That I can assure you.

[Question] Right. But they are suspended for the foreseeable future.

[Answer] For the immediate future in the case of the Malvinas inhabitants but what I would like to tell you is that what we are seeking for is peace but we would like to reach peace as soon as possible. I would like to transmit to the English public that we are ready to negotiate everything but that we are really stunned in face of this absurd fleet composed of 36 vessels to settle this minor problem in the international context.

[Question] But how could we move to peace? Would you suggest direct negotiations, between London and you. I mean what would you suggest to break...

[Answer] Why not either London and us, either through the secretary of state, either through the Security Council, the General Assembly of the United Nations, or any other nation that you choose.

[Question] Would you agree to go to the international court at The Hague, Dr Costa Mendez?

[Answer] No, this is not the sort of case that is submitted to the court of The Hague.

[Question] People here say that is because you think you would lose. Is that true?

[Answer] People may say many things from both sides.

[Question] But you don't think you would lose?

[Answer] We think it is not the case to be submitted to the court.

[Question] But you would be prepared for any form of negotiation.

[Answer] Any form of negotiation and to negotiate everything except sovereignty.

[Question] But the problem is that is one of the crucial issues at each end. How do you resolve the situation?

[Answer] There are no human problems that cannot be solved with good will and bon fide.

[Question] Do you think that in general the British reaction -- you have described it as absurd -- obviously you would, but another way to put it would be strong. Whatever, different people would have different views.

[Answer] Well let's use a more diplomatic word, let's call it overreaction.

[Question] Overreaction. In other words, Britain has acted more firmly or overreacted more firmly than you expected. Was that a miscalculation on your part?

[Answer] That could be, that could be. That is true.

[Question] It could have been a miscalculation.

[Answer] It could be a miscalculation. We could not have foreseen this sort of reaction from this government.

[Question] And do you foresee a peaceful solution or not?

[Answer] Definitely yes. And I am all for that. And you can find me any moment, any place fighting for that peaceful solution. And I think that if two big powers like Britain and America and one little power like Argentina cannot settle a problem that is only the future of 1,800 people, half of which is employees of a company, and part of them employees of the crown, really we are lost.

[Question] Well, Dr Costa Mendez, we hope that there will be such a solution. Obviously all of us....

[Answer] I am sure that we will find it.

[Question] Well, we appreciate your talking with us today and we thank you.

[Answer] I appreciate very much because I really appreciate the services of the BBC.

[Question] Thank you very much indeed.

PRIME MINISTER ADDRESSES COMMONS ON DISPUTE

LD291604 London BBC Domestic Service in English 1442 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Speech by Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher to House of Commons emergency debate on the Falkland Islands dispute -- live]

[Excerpts] Mr Speaker, Sir, from the onset of the Falklands crisis my right honorable friends and I have undertaken to keep the House as closely informed as possible about the situation. Although my last report to honorable members was only 2 days ago, such is the seriousness of this matter that my right honorable friends and I were glad to agree to the suggestion of the right honorable gentleman, the leader of the opposition, that time should be found for a debate today, the fourth since the Argentine invasion of the Falkland Islands 4 weeks ago tomorrow.

Mr Speaker, during that period the government has taken every possible step that had a reasonable prospect of helping us to achieve our objectives, namely, the withdrawal of the Argentine forces and the end of their illegal occupation of the islands, the restoration of British administration, and a long-term solution which is acceptable not only to the House but also to the inhabitants of the Falkland Islands. [cheers]

It is the government's most earnest hope that we can achieve these objectives by a negotiated settlement. We have done everything we can to encourage Mr Haig's attempts to find a solution by diplomatic means, and I shall have something more to say about that in a moment.

But, as the House knows, the government has taken military measures as well to strengthen our diplomatic efforts. Mr Haig's initiative would never have got underway if the British Government had not sent the naval task force to the South Atlantic [loud cheers] within 4 days of Argentina's aggression against the Falkland Islands. What incentive would there have been for the Argentine junta to give Mr Haig's ideas more than the most cursory glance if Britain had not underpinned its search for diplomatic settlement with the dispatch of the task force? Gentle persuasion is not going to make the Argentine Government give up what it has seized by force.

Mr Speaker, our military response to the situation has been measured and controlled. On 12 April we declared a maritime exclusion zone. This has been in eforced against Argentine warships and naval auxiliaries. It has been completely successful, and the Argentine forces on the Falkland Islands have been isolated by sea. Eleven days later we warned the Argentine authorities that any approach by their warships or military aircraft which could amount to a threat to interfere with the mission of the British forces in the South Atlantic would encounter the appropriate response. [cheers]

On 25 April, as I reported to the House on Monday, British forces recaptured South Georgia. This operation was conducted in the exercise of our right of self-defense under Article 51 of the UN Charter. The minimum of force was used consistent with achieving our objective; and no lives, Argentine or British, were lost in the operation although, as was announced yesterday, we deeply regret that an Argentine prisoner lost his life in an incident on 26 April. That incident is now being urgently investigated by a board of inquiery in accordance with the terms of the relevant Geneva Convention.

The latest of our military measures is the imposition of the total exclusion zone round the Falkland Islands, of which we gave 48 hours' notice yesterday. The new zone has the same geographical boundaries as the maritime exclusion zone which took effect on 12 April. It will apply from noon London time tomorrow to all ships and aircraft, whether military or civil, oprating in support of the illegal occupation of the Falkland Islands. A complete blockade will be palced on all traffic supporting the occupation forces of Argentina. Maritime and aviation authorities have been informed of the imposition of the zone in accordance with our international obligations. We shall enforce the total exclusion zone as completely as we have done the maritime exclusion zone. The Argentine occupying forces will then be totally isolated, cut off by sea and by air.

On the diplomatic side, Mr Speaker -- and I turn to the point which the right honorable gentleman raised during question time, and I'm grateful for him to leaving me to deal with it in my speech -- Mr Haig has put formal American proposals to the Argentine Government and requested an early response. I stress the status of these proposals: they are official American proposals. Mr Haig judged it right to ask Argentina to give its decision first as the country to which Security [as heard] Resolution 502 is principally addressed. He saw Mr Costa Mendez last night, but no conclusion was reached. Mr Haig has also communicated to us the text of his proposals.

Mr Speaker, it is difficult both for the House and for the government that we're not able to say more about them publicly, especially as in our democratic system we need the interplay of opinions and ideas, but they are Mr Haig's proposals, and we understand from him that it is his present intention to publish them in full. But, of course, he must judge the appropriate time. The proposals are complex and difficult and inevitably bear all the hallmarks of compromise in both their substance and language.

But, Mr Speaker, they have to be measured against the principles and objectives expressed so strongly in our debates in this House. [cheers] My right honorable friend, the foreign secretary, remains in close touch with Mr Haig. I very much regret that I am not in position to say more today. But I stress that they are Mr Haig's proposals, and he has put them first to the Argentine Government. It was the Argentine invasion which started this crisis and it is Argentine withdrawal which must put an end to it. [loud cheers]

Mr Speaker, although we have no doubt about our sovereignty over the Falkland Islands, South Georgia, South Sandwich or British Antarctic territory, some of my right honorable friends have suggested that we refer the matter to the International Court of Justice.

Since Argentina does not accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the court, the issue cannot be referred for a binding decision without her agreement. We have never sought a ruling on the Falkland Islands themselves from that court but we have raised the question of the dependencies on three separate occasions in 1947, 1949 and 1951. Each time Argentina refused to go to the court.

In 1955 the British Government applied unilaterally to the International Court of Justice against encroachments on British sovereignty and the dependencies by Argentina. Again the court advised that it could not pursue matter since it could only act if there was agreement between the parties recognizing the court's jurisdiction. In 1977, Argentina, having accepted the jurisdiction of an international court of arbitration, on the Beagle Channel dispute with Chile, then refused to accept its results. It is difficult to believe in Argentina's good faith with that very recent example in mind. [loud cheers]

There is no reason, given the past history of this question, for Britain, which has sovereignty and is claiming nothing more, to make the first move. It is Argentina which is making a claim. If she wanted to refer it to the international court, we would consider the possibility very seriously. But in the light of past events, it would be hard to have confidence that Argentina would respect a judgement which she did not like.

Mr Speaker, there can be no doubt where the intransigence lies in this matter. The key to peace is in the hands of the Argentine Government and the responsibility is theirs.

Pym Speaks

LD292208 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2142 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Report on 29 April House of Commons emergency debate on Falklands Islands dispute by PA parliamentary staff]

[Excerpt] The foreign secretary, Mr Francis Pym, said: "While there is still some hope that Argentina may be willing to settle without further use of force I have to say that their current position is not encouraging." Public statements from Argentina showed they still insisted sovereignty of the Falklands belongs to them. "But is doesn't belong to them and that's the heart of the matter," Mr Pym added to Tory cheers.

Argentina had shown no sign of withdrawing but had taken positive steps of increasing her military build-up. The unity in today's debate would help scotch reports in Argentina that politicians in Britain were split over the crisis. Strengthening of the task force was the only way to persuade Argentina Britain was prepared to use force if necessary.

Mr Pym said that after the reoccupation of South Georgia Argentina would now have abandoned any lingering doubts she might have had that Britain would exercise her right to self defence. "We shall certainly do so again if Argentina were to be so reckless as to violate the total exclusion zone."

Not only was it permissible for us to exercise our right to self defence, "it would be irresponsible not to exercise it." It was in the interests of the "whole free world that the rule of law should be upheld and that aggression should not prevail."

Challenged by Mr Foot, Mr Pym said he could not accept the implication of the UN secretary general that Britain was "on the same footing" as the Argentine aggressor. "The resolution is for their withdrawal and they are flouting it," Mr Pym said. "It is in the interests of the whole world that they do the right thing and retire."

Mr Pym disclosed that the government had ruled out a call for United Nations sanctions in the face of the likelihood of a Soviet veto. "We have considered that possibility, but we saw at once that the Soviet Union, in its search for ways of strengthening its influence in Argentina, would certainly veto any such resolution." "We have in our minds that that shadow is over the events in the South Atlantic," added Mr Pym.

In response to Mr Foot's request, first made on Tuesday, that he should go to the United Nations, Mr Pym said that the government was considering a "whole range of possible diplomatic options." "My mind is not closed on this possibility," he said.

Mr Pym went on to praise the way the islanders had responded to the Argentine takeover: "We admire their fortitude. They are under the jackboot of the invader." He said he could not pretend tomorrow's total exclusion zone did not have implications for the islanders, but he was confident they understood it was aimed at getting rid of the Argentinians.

Mr Pym was challenged again by Mr Healey about military co-operation between Chile and Britain. Mr Pym replied: "No, we are not interested in doing anything other than confining this conflict...to removing the Argentines from the islands with our own forces."

MP's had asked what the government would do if Argentina rejected Mr Haig's proposals. "Let me emphasise in reply that I very much hope Argentina will take a reasonable view of her own interests and will not reject a negotiated settlement to the present crisis.

"If she did reject it we would consider very carefully how to try to continue the negotiating process," Mr Pym said. "If Argentina will not accept a negotiated solution, then reluctantly, with the greatest possible restraint, we must use force. But we shall not relax for a moment in our efforts for a peaceful solution."

It was encouraging that the Commons had so staunchly supported the government in the debate. The debate ended without a vote. The House rose at 10.30 pm.

ISRAELI ENVOY CONFIRMS ARMS SALES TO ARGENTINA

LD291124 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1106 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Text] Israel's counsul-general in London confirmed today that Israel had sold arms to the Argentine. But Mr Sinai Rome, speaking in Glasgow, said that his country had friendly relations with both sides in the Falklands dispute, and wanted to keep out of it. "We have enough problems of our own," he added.

A diplomatic row broke out yesterday over claims that Israel had been supplying artillery ammunition to Argentina to assist its emergency arms-buying programme. Mr Rome said he had not been in touch with recent developments in the sales. They were handled by a special department in the Israeli Ministry of Defence.

He said: "We have had arms deals in the past with Argentina. If supplies of arms becomes a problematic issue we would prefer to keep out of it but I don't know what the policy of our government would be We have enough problems in our immediate surroundings."

Mr Rome, who was in Glasgow for independence day celebrations with the Jewish community, said there were as many Jews in Argentina -- 350,000 to 400,000 -- as in the UK and Israel was obviously concerned about the crisis.

Earlier, the Israeli Embassy in London issued a statement expressing "astonishment" at the way the Foreign Office had handled allegations about the sales. It said publicity about the matter had enhanced rumours "regarding Israel's position in the British-Argentine dispute and distorted her actual policy completely."

FALKLANDS RADIO STATION STOPS BROADCASTING

TA300634 London BBC World Service in English 0600 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] On the Falkland Islands themselves, the local radio station taken over by the Argentine forces has announced that it is to stop broadcasting.

This unexpected news comes the day after our correspondent in southern Chile, Michael (Vesty), filed a dispatch to Newsdesk about the new restrictions the Argentines were imposing on the Falklands which they had announced over the radio station. He listened to their last broadcast and send this report:

[Begin recording] The announcer, speaking in English, did not elaborate on why Argentina decided to close down the radio station on the Falklands, nor did he reveal for how long the station would be off the air. All he said was that on the instructions of the military authorities, the radio would be ceasing transmission from 0600 in the evening, because the radio was being monitored in southern Chile. However, the announcer said the station would be moving to different frequencies until the close down and these were obviously of less power because I was unable to hear them in Punta Arenas, about 500 miles away.

The Argentine authorities are clearly irked by having their Falkland Islands propaganda monitored by the BBC here. They also realized that if information announced on the radio can be picked up on the South American mainland it might be of use of British forces in the region. [end recording]

ARGENTINE SEAMAN INJURED IN TAKEOVER NOT DEAD

LD291304 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1254 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Text] A Defence Ministry spokesman today denied reports that an Argentine leading seaman, who had his leg amputated after the weekend attack on the Argentine submarine Sante Fe, had died. "He received good and skillful medical treatment and is as well as can be expected in his condition. I have no other information other than that he is alive," he said.

There was no further information about the board of inquiry into the death three days ago of an Argentine marine, allegedly shot by a Royal Marine.

DISPATCH VESSEL IRIS HEADS FOR SOUTH ATLANTIC

LD300932 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0910 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] The British telecom cable ship Iris left British waters for the South Atlantic today. Equipped with a new flight deck for navy Sea King helicopters, the 3,800 ton vessel slipped out of Devonport last night. Two small guns were visible on her bridge. Dockyard staff had been working on the Iris, requisitioned by the Ministry of Defence, since she arrived at Devonport earlier this week. The Iris will act as a dispatch vessel, ferrying stores around the task force.

PLAN TO DISMANTLE WHALING STATION 4 YEARS OLD

[Nicholas Comfort report: "Four Years' Notice by Scrapmen"]

[Text] The Foreign Office had four years' notice of plans for Argentine scrap metal dealers to dismantle the whaling station on South Georgia, the action which sparked the Falklands crisis.

Mr Cranley Onslow, minister of state, disclosed last night that Christian Salvesen, of Edinburgh, had notified both the Foreign Office and the Falkland Islands Government of its intentions in 1978.

His statement could cause embarrassment on a number of fronts, because it not only raises again the question of whether the Foreign Office acted with foresight, but also takes it back into the time of the previous Labour government.

So far during Commons exchanges on the Falklands, both Mr James Callaghan, the then prime minister, and Dr David Owen, the foreign secretary at the time who has now joined the Social Democrats, have argued that they showed foresight in forestalling Argentine threats.

Ironically, Mr Onslow's disclosure came in a written answer to Labour member for South Ayrshire, Mr George Foulkes, who was one of the first to oppose any step to retake the Falklands by force. "Christian Salvesen Ltd. informed the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Falkland Islands Government in 1978 of their intention to sell their surplus equipment at South Georgia to Mr Davidoff, an Argentine scrap metal dealer," the minister told him.

"The contract was a straight-forward commercial transaction but Salvesen Ltd. and Mr Davidoff were advised at the time that normal immigration procedures would have to be followed."

FALKLANDS JUSTIFIES RESTORING BBC SERVICES

PM291431 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 29 Apr 82 p 18

[Editorial: "Now a Valued Service"]

[Text] "This is London..." As the dense clouds of propaganda and disinformation build up on the world's radio whenever conflict looms, millions are glad to tune in to the calm, indpendent voice of the BBC's external service broadcasts. Not least is this true, remarkably, in Argentina -- where not only do 250,000 citizens turn to the BBC for information, but even the main radio station, Radio Rivadavia in Buenos Aires, does so, telephoning Bush House in London for the latest facts yesterday. With the airwaves dominated by state radio stations pumping out the distortions and rhetoric of the cold war, the BBC is a rare non-government source of news, editorially free, impartial, blessed with a mostly uncontested record of telling the truth, warts and all. Agentines who heard yesterday, no doubt with amazement, of open division in the Commons between Mrs Thatcher and Mr Foot will be able to gauge that.

Yet last year Lord Carrington was pleading with Parliament to "show some sense of reality" and accept 3 million pounds of cuts and indeed 1982 has seen the axing of BBC transmissions to Spain, Italy and Malta, with a piddling saving of 1.5 million pounds. For years now the external services have been vulnerable to money-saving exercises where none was being wasted.

Is there not, however, a clear moral from the Falklands crisis for the BBC's Foreign Office budget controllers? It is that no one can predict where trouble will spring up, and no one can know when the BBC will be most needed. Once closed down, a service is not rapidly reopened. Nor is a reputation for dependability made overnight. The trust which the BBC now receives in an enemy country is based on years of political independence and speaking the uncomfortable truth. With its prime, old-fashioned clarity, with its splendid marches, "Imperial Echoes" and "The Voice of London," it may seem a relic of greater days, a service needing to be trimmed down to size. It should be left alone.

KIPRIANOU 'TORPEDOES' GREECE'S CYPRUS 'CRUSADE'

NC300700 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 0400 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] According to press reports, the Greek ambassador in Nicosia, Zakharakis, yesterday called on Cyprus President Spiros Kiprianou and handed him a letter from Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou. The letter, according to the reports, has three points:

1. Mr Kiprianou's unexpected stand in favor of the intercommunal dialogue virtually torpedoes the crusade the Greek Government has started with the aim of internationalizing the Cyprus issue.

2. The president of Cyprus must be the exponent of all the parties and should not limit his cooperation only to one party.

3. Mr Kiprianou's intention to cooperate with AKEL had not been made known to the Greek prime minister, despite Mr Papandreou's recent visit to Cyprus.

Spokesman on Cyprus

NC291823 Athens Armed Forces in Greek 1800 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Text] In reply to press reports on the Cyprus problem, the government spokesman has stated that the Greek Government has a national duty to support and cooperate with the legitimate president of Cyprus and government in power and to safeguard the authority and prestige of the independent state of Cyprus without any intention of intervening in Cyprus' internal affairs. This of course does not mean that in connection with the handling of the national question, it shares choices as, for example, the recent endorsement of the joint declaration and the joint minimum program preliminary to the coming presidential elections.

In any case, the Greek Government assures the Cypriot people on this occasion that its alignment with their struggle and the solidarity of all the Greek people will be firm and irrevocable.

Papandreou Remarks

NC281546 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 28 Apr 82 p 1

[Text] His thoughts on the Kiprianou decision to cooperate with communist AKEL (it is a mistake), on the country's position toward NATO, the establishment of the Larisa headquarters (it will be established), on economic sacrifices to support armaments and on other issues were expressed yesterday by Prime Minister Papandreou, who spoke to officers at the naval base he visited yesterday and where he was briefed on war preparedness of the Greek Navy by the chief of the Naval General Staff, Vice Admiral Pappas, and the commander of the fleet, Vice Admiral Giongezas.

The prime minister first flew by helicopter to the naval helicopter base, and, after a short inspection tour, visited the school of naval technical training. Later he visited the torpedo boat base and the submarine base. Later he addressed a gathering of senior officers and, after expressing full satisfaction with the high efficiency, high morale and preparedness of the men of the Greek Navy, he referred to the peculiar character of the situation in our area and to the need for the country's armed forces to be in a position, at any given moment, to repulse any imposition and protect the security of Greek territory.

Before Papandreou referred to "delicate issues" such as Cyprus, the Aegean, NATO, our finances and Spain, he expressed hope that nothing of what he was going to say would be leaked. If, he added, this does happen, then I will deny it. MESIMVRINI received these positions of the prime minister from an excellent source and reports them today so that many things may be cleared up -- things on which different views were expressed to date or which remained unexplained.

He expressed his displeasure with the cooperation between President Kiprianou and AKEL. "We agreed on other things, but we do different things," he said. This last development makes solution of the Cyprus issue even more difficult. Apparently he was referring to the movements of Western personalities toward promotion of initiatives. He then referred to the discussions he has had with leaders of various countries on the Greek acceptance of the cost of maintaining a peace force in Cyprus in exchange for the withdrawal of Turkish and Greek troops from the island. I have also stated this, he said, to the British ambassador, who visited me the other day and asked for our support on the Falklands issue, and I reminded him of the case of Cyprus.

The Rogers agreement consists of four proposals. It has a cunning point and, at the same time it is a sequel to the Haig-Davos agreement. This has to do with operational responsibility over the Aegean. After giving certain technical explanations, he added: The NATO headquarters at Larisa will be established, because there is great pressure and there is also the fact that Turkey's recent arming by the United States and the Germans through various channels has disturbed the balance of power in the Aegean.

It must be noted that the official position maintained to date, which was also presented at NATO conferences, was that the Larisa headquarters would not be established -- at least not until the Rogers agreement was revised in accordance with our own viewpoints?

Papandreou admitted that the Greek economy cannot long stand the pressure in the armaments sector. He explained that the solution lies in development of our own war industry, to which we must give greater emphasis. He also spoke about the utilization of Greek as well as other brains.

OZAL QUESTIONED ON ECONOMIC POLICY ASPECTS

TA291628 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1545 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Text] Ankara, 29 Apr (AA) -- Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal said the economic policy currently being followed was governmental policy and there was no such thing as Ozal's policy, as claimed by certain circles. In an interview given to AA, Ozal admitted he was criticized by labor leader Ibrahim Denizcier and some businessmen as well, but he claimed the personal criticism came mostly from "leftist circles." Criticism easily verged on polemics, he believed. Criticism could be useful, Ozal admitted, but added, "No criticism will deviate us from the path we believe is right."

He rejected the [word indistinct] increasing the money supply, for it had been demonstrated in the past, he noted, that easy money supply increased inflation. Social problems [words indistinct], Ozal said, but it was necessary to give priority to economic questions, otherwise "we would run out of petrol." He would be a "good politician" if he had said yes to everyone, but that would be bad for Turkey, he said. Ozal is scheduled to fly to Saudi Arabia Saturday next week, 7 May, to attend a conference of the Islamic Bank. He will return to Turkey 11 May.

Bank Head on Program

[Text] Ankara, 29 Apr (AA) -- President of the Central Bank Osman Siklar said current money and credit policy had played a major role in the positive results of the government's stability program in 1981. The lifting of restrictions on interest rates had increased bank deposits to 1.5 trillion TL, he announced to the shareholders meeting of the bank. Despite an increase of 1 billion dollars in 1981 imports over the previous year, Siklar told the shareholders, Turkey's foreign trade deficit had gone down from 5 to 4.2 billion dollars, mainly from increased exports and foreign exchange earnings. The deficit in current accounts had been reduced from 3.1 billion dollars to 1.9 billion.

Current transfers were being carried on without delay. In short, Turkey had regained her credit-worthiness, he said. Comparing the years 1980 and 1981 more specifically, Siklar announced the increase in the wholesale price index had gone down from 107 percent to 36.8 percent, while a slightly negative growth rate had gone up to 4.3 percent. Exports had increased by 62 percent, remittances from workers abroad by 20 percent, earnings from tourists by 32 percent, credits by 60 percent and deposits by 104 percent.

SCHMIDT KEEPS DISTANCE FROM BRITAIN IN CRISIS

LD011324 Hamburg DPA in German 1208 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] Hamburg, 1 May (DPA) -- According to a report in the news magazine DER SPIEGEL, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has distanced himself from the British Government in the conflict over the Falkland Islands. The magazine quotes a remark made by Schmidt in the Bonn cabinet discussion on Wednesday, in which he said that there could be "no blank cheque for solidarity with Great Britain." Moreover, a person close to the chancellor is supposed to have said: "This is a 19th century-style attempt to impose authority." [eine domestizierungsaktion nach den methoden des 19 Jahrhunderts]

According to the magazine, there is a fear in the chancellor's office that the British claim to the Falkland Islands could exacerbate the already-tense East-West relations. Over and above this the conflict puts at risk the traditionally good relations Europe and the FRG have with Latin America.

Message Sent to UK, Argentina

[Text] Bonn, 1 May (DPA) -- The Federal Government has apparently once again called upon Great Britain and Argentina to settle the Falklands conflict peacefully. In Bonn today a government spokesman said that the German ambassador in Buenos Aires, Paul Verbeek, had put the German view of things to the Argentinian Government. No details were given about the note, which was handed over yesterday. Moreover the Federal Government had been in constant contact over the last few days both with the British and the American Governments.

The government spokesman said that the Federal Government was continuing to follow developments in the situation. It still held the view that the Resolution 502 of the UN Security Council had to be obeyed. This calls upon Argentina to withdraw from the Falkland Islands. In spite of the events which have since taken place, all efforts had to be made for a peaceful settlement of the conflict.

SPD PARLIAMENTARIANS TO VISIT POLAND FOR 1 WEEK

LD302208 Hamburg DPA in German 1530 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Bonn, 30 Apr (DPA) -- Next week the SPD Parliamentary Group will officially reestablish the contacts with the Polish parliament which were broken off after the imposition of martial law in Poland. As Parliamentary Group Spokesman Knut Terjung confirmed on Friday, the head of the working group on human rights of the Parliamentary Group, Volker Neumann, and the chairman of the Parliamentary Group discussion group on Poland, Walter Polkehn, will leave on Monday for a week's visit to Warsaw at the invitation of the PZPR. Their program includes general political discussions and talks on humanitarian problems. It is not yet known who will be taking part in the discussions on the other side.

Parliamentary Group Chairman Herbert Wehner and Lower House Deputy Karsten Voigt have visited the Polish capital since the imposition of martial law on 13 December. These visits were described as unofficial.

MITTERRAND RETURNS FROM DENMARK; SPEAKS TO PRESS

LD302014 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] The president of the republic left Copenhagen this afternoon after a 48-hour official visit to Denmark. The visit confirmed the broad identity of views existing between Paris and the Danish capital. We are on the same wavelength as far as Common Market affairs are concerned, Francois Mitterrand said at a press conference.

In an informal talk with journalists, Mitterrand spoke about his health. The president is well: This is a year in which I have been feeling particularly well. If I had a tendency to doze off before my election, everything is assembled now for me to remain well awake, the head of state said.

Mitterrand also spoke about the problem of terrorism: Terrorism will not make me change my path, and it began well before the assumption to power of a Socialist government, the president of the republic said.

Finally, Mitterrand spoke about the disappearance of Jean-Edern Hallier: We do not make any political distinction regarding the protection of French citizens, every criminal act must be prosecuted.

PRESIDENT COMMENTS ON BRITAIN'S CRISIS, BUDGET

LD301544 Paris Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Excerpt] Francois Mitterrand said in Denmark this morning that he would not take advantage of the Falklands conflict to make Great Britain yield on European questions. He said that the British have been wrong to link the amount of their contribution to the Community budget to farm prices. We are not going to link it to the Falklands crisis. This would be a bad method.

THAI PRIME MINISTER BEGINS PARIS VISIT 30 APR

[Text] Paris, 30 Apr (AFP) -- Thai Prime Minister Prem Tinsulanon flew in here today from London on a 24-hour "working visit" mainly devoted to economic affairs and which brings to an end a four-nation European tour.

General Prem was welcomed at Roissy Airport north of Paris by French External Trade Minister Michel Jobert and the Thai Ambassador Owat Sutthiwat-Naruphut. Gen Prem is accompanied by a delegation of about sixty. Later today, the Thai prime minister is scheduled to meet Premier Pierre Mauroy, External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson and President Francois Mitterrand.

Franco-Thai economic relations and developments in Southeast Asia are expected to dominate the talks. On the economic side, Gen Prem is to press for a Franco-British Government joint loan to finance an 800 million project to expand Thai sugar refining.

Politically, Paris and Bangkok are opposed over a French bid to end Vietnam's diplomatic and economic isolation. The Thais argue that aid to Vietnam is an encouragement to Vietnamese and indirectly to Soviet "expansionism" but the French view is that isolation leaves Hanoi no choice but to turn to the Soviet Union. France recently granted a 200 million franc (about $30 million) loan to Vietnam and extended a warm welcome to Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach during a recent visit.

However France has refused to recognize the pro-Vietnamese government in Cambodia and continues to condemn the Vietnamese military presence in that country.

The Thai prime minister, who is a leading spokesman for the five-nation association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN) disclosed yesterday in London that a coalition would be formed imminently of the three Cambodian resistance movements opposed to Vietnam. He said the leaders of these three movements: former Cambodian head of state Prince Norodom Sihanouk, Khmer Rouge leader Khieu Samphan and Sonn San of the Khmer People's Liberation Front would meet next month in Malaysia.

Meets With Mauroy

NC301339 Paris AFP in English 1334 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Paris, 30 Apr (AFP) -- Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy told his visiting Thai counterpart, Prem Tinsulanon, that he was opposed to any military solution of the Cambodian crisis. General Prem, who is finishing a four-nation European tour, met with Mr Mauroy for an initial discussion of Southeast Asian issues, followed by an official luncheon given by Mr Mauroy. Later today he was to meet with President Francois Mitterrand and External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson.

In remarks following their initial meeting, Mr Mauroy advocated the political solution, but added: "Nobody believes that such a solution is at hand." Without alluding to discussions in Paris between Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach and French officials early this month, Mr Mauroy said a political solution "demanded the efforts of everyone, and especially of all those parties who are directly concerned. In this respect, Thailand and her ASEAN (Association of Southeast Asian Nations) partners have played and have to play a primary role," he added.

This view appeared to observers to be in contrast to the position of the five-member ASEAN (?association) of southeast nations -- Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand -- which has insisted on a withdrawal of Vietnamese forces before any negotiations.

Talks for this afternoon were expected to focus on economic concerns, particularly a projected Franco-British loan of $800 million to expand an oil refinery.

The question of French citizens being held in Thai jails also was expected to be discussed. The French have asked that the prisoners, most of them being held on drug charges, be allowed to serve their terms in French jails. A new appeal for clemency was issued by a Socialist Party human rights leader, Michel de la Fourniere, who asked Thai authorities to "show clemency...to mark the bicentennial of the Thai dynasty."

Minister Sees 'No Differences'

NC011434 Paris AFP in English 1358 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] Paris, 1 May (AFP) -- Thai Prime Minister Prem Tinsulanon's four-nation European tour, which wound up today, was both a political and economic success, Thai Foreign Minister Air Chief Marshal Sitthi Sawetsila said here today.

Marshal Sitthi Sawtsila told reporters before the Thai delegation took off on a regular flight to Bangkok following General Prem Tinsulanon's official 24-hour visit to France that French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson had expressed his "support and comprehension" of Thailand's problems. There were no differences or outstanding issues dividing France and Thailand, he said.

During the four-nation tour through Austria, Belgium, Britain and France, Gen Prem Tinsulanon scored a significant series of successes on both the political and economic scene.

In Brussels, the European Economic Community Commission agreed to maintain Thai tapioca exports to the Common Market for two years.

And in London and Paris, Gen Prem Tinsulanon obtained financial guarantees for the development of an 820-million dollar Thai oil refinery expansion project, the biggest international contract ever signed by Thailand. The contract, won by a Franco-British consortium, was finally validated when Gen Prem Tinsulanon obtained financial guarantees from the two government credit-assurance organisations, COFACE in France and the Export Credit Guarantee Department (ECGB) in Britain.

Reiterating the gist of a statement on Cambodia yesterday by Gen Prem Tinsulanon Marshal Sitthi Sawetsila told newsmen here that Bangkok hoped for a political and not a military solution to the Cambodian crisis. But he added that "a future Cambodia" should be "neutral and independent, and not threaten its neighbours."

This was why Thailand, "like France," maintained its call "for a retreat of the Vietnamese forces which invaded Cambodia three years ago," he said. He added that Cambodia had also called for "self-determination" for the Cambodian people through "free elections supervised by United Nations observers."

Both the Thai prime minister and foreign minister stressed during their visit here that Thailand and its four association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) partners -- Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia and the Philippines -- believed that France "could play a vital role" in the region.

They indicated that, contrary to prevailing opinion, the five ASEAN members "were prepared to dialogue with Vietnam on condition that a meeting could lead to peace and not to a mere propaganda victory for Hanoi."

The French authorities also raised the issue of French nationals currently jailed in Thailand on drug-related charges. France hopes for an agreement allowing detainees to end their prison terms in France and has also set great store on next Wednesday's 200th Thai dynasty anniversary royal pardon. But Gen Prem Tinsulanon and Thai officials refused to comment on the issue.

PICCOLI WITHDRAWS AT CONGRESS AS DC SECRETARY

AU030835 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] Rome, 3 May (ANSA) -- Christian Democrat Party (DC) Secretary Flaminio Piccoli has broken the spell of suspense in which the party's fifteenth national congress opened in Rome Sunday by announcing that he was not going to seek another term in office. By pulling out of the leadership race, the incumbent secretary made way for Party Chairman Arnaldo Forlani, the premier of the last Italian Government, to take over executive command of the nation's biggest political party, most observers agreed this morning.

The congress opened Sunday morning at the heavily guarded indoor sports arena in Rome's Eur suburb in an atmosphere of uncertainty after all pre-congressional efforts to come up with a unified leadership slate had failed.

Piccoli's withdrawal from the race, however, appeared today to have paved the way for a compromise by which former Premier Giulio Andreotti would become party chairman, Forlani secretary and Ciriaco de Mita, the candidate of the liberal factions, deputy secretary once again. The out-going secretary, according to the commentators forecasting this arrangement, will become the DC's candidate for the premiership in the next Italian Government. Delegates at the congress will be electing a new party secretary and a new National Council, a representative decision-making body at the helm of the party, on Thursday.

The 750 delegates elected to the ongoing congress by the party's regional organizations are flanked by 75 non-card-carrying DC sympathizers, 400 DC parliamentarians holding ten percent of congressional votes, one hundred national councilmen and about thirty DC politicians with a right to admission by virtue of their former offices. In all, these 1,400 Christian Democrats who will be picking the party's next leaders are joined at the event by representatives from other Italian political parties, many foreign delegates and more than 1,300 reporters, photographers and television and movie crewmen.

Before Piccoli decided not to go for another term as secretary, the party's centrist and rightist factions, and Piccoli's own faction as well, were split down the middle between the incumbent secretary and Forlani. The split enhanced the odds of the Liberals, loosely grouped together around the figure of the former Secretary Beniamino Zaccagnini, of getting De Mita in with their estimated composite strength of 30 percent of the Congress's vote.

The congress, the first the DC has held in post-war Italy under a government not headed by one of its own men, was opened Sunday morning by Piccoli with a keynote speech summarizing his two-year leadership. The government presently in power is a five-party coalition of Christian Democrats, Socialists (PSI), Social Democrats (PSDI), Republicans (PRI), and Liberals (PLI), run by Premier Giovanni Spadolini, a Republican.

Piccoli acknowledged the role played by the minor parties in the coalition, the PSDI, PRI and PLI, in governing the country and said the DC's support for Spadolini's appointment as premier in June 1981 stemmed from its "tradition... of putting national interests above its own partisan interests." He insisted that the "governability" of the nation was not a matter of political alliances, but "the mediation and political translation of the objective situation stemming from the country's electoral and social reality" and the way the various political parties relate to this reality.

The incumbent DC secretary also said the desire of the PSI and of the minor coalition parties to "play a bigger role and wield more political influence" was legitimate. With that in mind, Piccoli said it was "evident" that the relationship between the five ruling parties necessarily has a "competitive" twist, with the risk of "conflictuality" and what he called "dangerous splits", a risk which must be avoided.

Rejecting the notion that the five-party arrangement was a "state of necessity," Piccoli wound up his speech with a proposal to broaden the ruling agreement between the coalition parties, enabling it to negotiate as a compact entity with the powerful Communist opposition on "a medium-term plan for economic revival."

Initial reactions to Piccoli's speech from Socialist, Social Democrat and Communist spokesmen was that it was weighted down by too heavy a dose of "party patriotism."

PLO DENIES CONNECTION WITH RED BRIGADES

LD302132 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2030 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] The PLO has denied the statements made yesterday by terrorist Antonio Savasta at the trial for the kidnapping and murder of Aldo Moro and has reiterated its total separation from any terrorist group, especially the Italian Red Brigades. The PLO, the communique states, strongly condemns all forms of terrorism and appeals to the Italian public not to believe suspect confessions designed to defame and slander the liberation struggle of the Palestinian people.

Savasta Testimony

[Excerpts] Rome, 30 Apr (ANSA) -- The Red Brigades terrorist organization has no use for humanitarian considerations, according to Antonio Savasta as he continues his testimony at the trial against 63 members of the group's Rome column, involved in the kidnap and assassination of Italian statesman Aldo Moro and 18 other murders. Savasta, a BR member himself and one of the defendants turned state's evidence after his capture.

He began his testimony here Wednesday. Yesterday he spoke of the BR's international links with the Palestinian Liberation Organization and the Bulgarian secret services. He also outlined other terrorist actions for the court.

With regard to the organization's foreign links, Savasta said that it was the PLO that had sought out the BR and that these contacts were made through certain individuals in France interested in developing international solidarity for Italian terrorists. Thanks to these contacts the PLO supplied the BR with huge arms shipments in two batches, both picked up by Mario Moretti who headed the BR's Rome column, Savasta continued.

The first arms shipment was loaded onto a pleasure craft and transported from Cyprus to northern Italy, where the weapons were immediately distributed among the organization's various columns, he said. The second was brought across the Franco-Italian border on foot by Moretti and other brigadists. They carried rifles, machine guns, Kalashnikovs, and calibre-nine Browning handguns, Savasta said.

The repentant terrorist said that despite PLO president Yasir 'Arafat's interest in winning political recognition from the European states, the organization was keen on promoting military attacks in Europe against Israeli embassies and Zionist targets. The BR promised to conduct military actions against these objectives in exchange for large quantities of arms, Savasta said. The contacts with the PLO were broken off, both because Moretti and his cohorts were arrested and because the BR proved incapable of pulling off actions against targets "on a multinational level," he said.

SICILIAN COMMUNIST PARTY CHIEF SHOT DEAD

AU301555 Rome ANSA in English 1520 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Excerpts] Palermo, 30 Apr (ANSA) -- The Italian Communist Party regional secretary for Sicily, 54-year-old Pio la Torre, was shot to death in downtown Palermo this morning in a mafia-style killing which also took the life of La Torre's bodyguard and driver, 30-year-old Rasario di Salvo. Police here have virtually discarded the idea of a terrorist act responsible for this morning's double killing and no terrorist organization has, thus far, claimed paternity for the attack.

ASSEMBLY BACKS GOVERNMENT ON SPAIN'S NATO ENTRY

[Text] Following a 6-hour debate spread over the morning and the afternoon, the Assembly of the Republic's plenum yesterday endorsed the government's agreement to Spain's joining NATO. The vote, as became clear during the debate, was as follows: The Social Democratic Party, The Social Democratic Center Party and the Popular Monarchist Party in favor; the PCP, the Portuguese Democratic Movement, the Union of the Left for Socialist Democracy and the Popular Democratic Union against; the Socialist Party and the Independent Social Democratic Association absention.

The reason for the absention by the Socialists and Association deputies lay in the fact that, "although agreeing with Spain's joining NATO, they did not secure from the government, through the foreign minister, definite replies to the questions put concerning the safeguarding of our interests." In addition, before the debate was closed, the Socialists announced that they will question the government on Portuguese-Spanish relations in their diplomatic, consular, border, military, trade, fisheries, pollution, tourism and cultural aspects.

PRESIDENT EANES VISITS NATO CHIEF IN BELGIUM

LD301628 Brussels in French to Africa 1500 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] At the end of his official visit to Belgium, Portuguese President Eanes today visited NATO Headquarters, where he was met by Secretary General Luns. President Eanes expressed pleasure at Spain's forthcoming entry into NATO, but he stressed that the future structure of the alliance command in this region ought to take into consideration the region's own identity. Thus it will be proper to take into consideration the historic and strategic realities peculiar to Portugal and Spain over the centuries.

In the opinion of the Portuguese president, the Portuguese forces ought to operate from the Atlantic Headquarters at Norfolk while the Spanish forces should operate from the European headquarters at Mons.

Returns From Trip

LD302026 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1800 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Summary] President Ramalho Eanes arrived in Lisbon at 1900 from his 4-day official visit to Belgium. He was met at Lisbon's Portela Airport by Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao, chief of the Armed Forces General Staff Gen Melo Egidio, cabinet members, MP's and members of the Council of the Revolution.

In a brief statement on arrival, General Ramalho Eanes said: "The cordial relations between Portugal and Belgium and the friendship linking the Portuguese and Belgian peoples were strongly in evidence during this trip to Belgium." Referring to this visit to NATO Headquarters "in response to the friendly invitation of its secretary general," General Eanes said: "It was basically a protocol visit during which, however, it was also possible to touch upon issues of great importance to Portugal within the framework of commitments undertaken with the other members of the alliance. We had the opportunity to express our concern over the development of the cooperation programs established a long time ago between Portugal and NATO and their reflection on our country's ability to fulfill effectively the responsibilities connected with its participation in the integrated framework of European defense."

Genral Eanes added: "We reiterated our full support for Spain's entry into NATO insofar as it represents a significant step toward real European cohesion. But we also had the opportunity to underline that this integration ought to take into account the historical realities and strategic features that have distinguished the two peninsular countries for many centuries."

General Eanes concluded his statement by saying: "The major problems facing the European peoples require understanding and the strengthening of relations among European countries. Without such understanding, it will be impossible to secure the harmonious development of our economies and ensure the stability of our democratic governments. For these reasons, I think the objectives of this visit were fully achieved."

CZECHOSLOVAK AMBASSADOR ORDERED TO LEAVE COUNTRY

NC302231 Paris AFP in English 2226 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Lisbon, 30 Apr (AFP) -- The Portuguese Government today ordered Czechoslovak Ambassador Jan Janik and Third Secretary Ladislav Kolachovssky to leave the country within five days for "inadmissible interference in the internal affairs of Portugal," the Portuguese news agency ANOP reported. The government gave no details of the alleged interference and Mr Janik, who arrived in Lisbon as ambassador three years ago, refused to comment on the decision.

But the government recently asked the Soviet Union, East Germany and Poland to cut their embassy staffs here. Observers here linked the request to Portuguese displeasure at the Soviet-inspired imposition of martial law in Poland.

OFFICER BEHIND 1974 COUP RETURNED TO DUTY

NC302018 Paris AFP in English 1818 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Excerpt] Lisbon, 30 Apr (AFP) -- Maj Otelo Saraiva de Carbalho, the military brain behind the Portuguese revolution of April 25, 1974, was returned today to active status in his country's armed forces, military sources said here. "Otelo," as the Portuguese affectionately referred to him after he led the coup against the dictatorial regime of Marcelo Caetano, had been retired from the army on charges of involvement in a November 1975 attempt by extreme-left military men to take over power.

2 DEAD, 85 INJURED IN CLASHES IN OPORTO 1 MAY

NC011141 Paris AFP in English 1135 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] Lisbon, 1 May (AFP) -- Two men were shot dead and 85 people wounded, 10 seriously, in clashes today between Portuguese riot police and members of the pro-Communist Trade Union Confederation (CGTP) in Oporto, northern Portugal, union sources said citing hospital casualty figures.

Earlier reports said the violence broke out when police intervened to stop fighting between the CGTP militants and members of the rival pro-Socialist UGT union holding a variety show in a town square.

The CGTP -- Portugal's biggest union -- was angry at a decision to allow the UGT to stage its May Day parade in a street the CGTP itself wanted to use, the reports said.

CALVO-SOTELO SPEAKS IN CONGRESS ON TERRORISM

PM301611 Madrid YA in Spanish 23 Apr 82 p 3

[Text] The prime minister and the minister of the interior have reported [in the Congress of Deputies] on the latest terrorist actions and on the government measures adopted to combat them. In summary, Calvo-Sotelo said:

Last weekend's terrorist attacks have called attention again to the threat of those who are attempting to prevent by violence the consolidation of the system of freedoms which we have given ourselves. This threat had not reached the point of disappearing, but for many months, since the measures adopted by the government a year ago, its presence was diminished. The government comes to this chamber to report on one of present-day Spain's greatest problems, against which government and opposition should move jointly, united in the same defense of order and freedom.

The government does not deem it advisable to institute emergency measures today. The very appreciable reduction of terrorist activity in the last three quarters of 1981 is clear proof of the effectiveness of the measures in force. The struggle against terrorism in Spain, and in other coutnries which are also suffering it, is lengthy and difficult. However, I believe that, even after the latest attacks, something has changed substantially since the spring of last year. I was able to ascertain on my recent visits to Guipuzcoa and Vizcaya that terrorism has largely lost popular support. It is still operating with considerable material means, but recently isolated from the population. This is a slow but, in my opinion, irreversible, process, in which the key to final success undoubtedly lies.

It must be acknowledged that we remain vulnerable. Any modern society is, and the freer and more advanced that society is, the more exposed it is to terrorist attacks, although it is also correspondingly more vigorous and prepared to resist them. It is regrettable that a key target such as Rios Rosas [telephone exchange] was not protected, but possible targets are very numerous and the advantage lies initially with those who select them. We are confronted with an organization which has lost support and members but which is not yet broken. Everything seems to indicate that "illegal" commandos from the other side of the Pyrenees were mobilized for the latest attacks. Once more the painful issue of the French sanctuary arises. Spain vigorously reiterates its rejection of a conduct which enables terrorists to prepare their criminal incursions in France.

I also wish to express my bitterness at the fact that a friendly, neighboring country appears not to understand our arguments and does not cooperate more closely with us in a struggle which concerns not only Spain and its political system but the whole of democratic West Europe. France is also beginning to suffer terrorism's blows. This morning's attack and the internal controversy over security and freedom make it possible to hope for an evolution of French cooperation more in keeping with international commitments, with its offer of support for Spanish democracy and with the recent statements by Minister Defferre, who said: "Recourse to violence is indefensible," especially when the country it takes as a target is a democracy which offers everybody the right and the real opportunity to express themselves and, above all, the right to vote.

We are confronted, I repeat, with a weakened organization, but one still capable of murdering and destroying -- an organization before which it would be unwise to lower our guard or neglect watchfulness. I do not believe that this was the case. We were not surprised by the toughening of terrorist actions. An action coinciding with the trial concerning the 23 February [1981 attempted coup] events, and with the Andalusian election campaign, even an action perhaps prior to the unacceptable search for a negotiated solution, was expected. The alert was already given to the public order forces from the first day of the month.

We are vulnerable, but we are strong. There will be further attacks but they will not shake the government's resolve or the institution's firmness. I have full confidence in the measures adopted, in the public order forces' efficiency and in increasing public cooperation. I wish to repeat here, before the chamber, the government's firm intention to devise a policy aimed at a single outcome -- the final eradication of terrorism in Spain.

Terrorism is a direct and implacable challenge to the way of life characteristic of free societies. It is a challenge by barbarism to civilization. The struggle against it is therefore a collective undertaking from which no one is exempt. To ensure that the crimes and destructive actions are not repeated, to end the extortion which is presented as a "revolutionary tax," to silence all those who lend their support to Basque Homeland and Liberty's viewpoints, to make the state's presence felt wherever fear or complicity have created conditions favorable to the terrorist organization -- in short, to eradicate terrorism -- I commit before the chamber the government's vigor and determination and seek from the chamber support and cooperation.

May the solidarity of all of us who represent the Spanish people and their desire to live in peace and freedom be evident from this session.

FOREIGN MINISTRY VIEWS FALKLANDS 'CONFLICT'

LD011636 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1600 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] In connection with the conflict over the Falkland Islands which both the United Kingdom and Argentina claim as theirs, the diplomatic information office at the Spanish Foreign Ministry has released a communique which we summarize as follows:

First: The attack by the British forces on the Falklands airstrip constitutes a grave escalation of the conflict.

Second: A more generalized British action would be a grave responsibility and an historic error.

Third: The Spanish Government is of the opinion that the underlying colonial problem -- the origin of the conflict -- on which Spain has always supported the Argentine position, has not been taken into account.

Fourth: The Spanish Government has told the Argentine and British Governments that they should make full use of the mechanisms of the UN Security Council.

MITTERRAND CONCLUDES 2-DAY VISIT TO COPENHAGEN

NC301646 Paris AFP in English 1636 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Copenhagen, 30 Apr (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand today said the European Economic Community (EEC) would not tie its support for Britain in the Falklands' crisis to any British concessions over internal Common Market problems.

Mr Mitterrand, who arrived back in Paris early this evening, made the statement at a press conference in Copenhagen after winding up a 48-hour, largely ceremonial visit to Denmark. He said he had "constantly followed" the Falklands dispute with Argentina during his stay here, and would "make known what I feel in due time."

But in response to questions, he said it would be a "bad method" to link the Falklands issue to internal EEC questions, such as fixing farm prices and Britain's push for a reduced budget contribution.

Yesterday, about 300 anti-nuclear demonstrators held a peaceful protest outside the French Embassy over France's continued nuclear weapons testing in the South Pacific. Earlier that day, Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen raised the issue during talks with French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson. Mr Olesen repeated Denmark's stand that all nuclear weapons testing should be halted.

Today, Mr Mitterrand said France's nuclear option was "not a difficulty" in French-Danish relations. Mr Mitterrand said the testing was "not desirable, but necessary" and would continue "until research or technical developments allow us to stop it".

The French president spent today in political talks with Danish leaders, as did Mr Cheysson and French European Affairs Minister Andre Chandernagor.

His meeting with Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen today spanned bilateral, Common Market and global issues. Mr Mitterrand said at the press conference afterwards that France and Denmark saw eye-to-eye on basic questions, with only minor differences.

Mr Mitterrand yesterday hosted a dinner for Queen Margrethe II and addressed Danish parliamentarians.

Other questions touched on at the press conference included a series of recent terrorist attacks in France, including a booby-trapped car explosion in Paris that left one dead and over 60 injured. Mr Mitterrand said terrorism in France would "not in any way make me change direction," and had begun long before the French Socialists came to power. He added that he did not think his trip to Israel "could have marked the resumption of terrorism in France."

On East-West relations, Mr Mitterrand said there was an imbalance in forces in Europe and negotiations must be given priority. But he said Soviet proposals for a freeze on further deployment could only be of interest if negotiations were begun.

TRADE TALKS WITH SOVIETS END IN HELSINKI

LD291706 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1430 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Text] Finnish-Soviet talks on balancing trade ended in Helsinki today.

It was agreed in the talks to strive to prevent any further growth in the imbalance. According to the Under Secretary of State Aake Wihtol, a balance in trade, which now shows a surplus for Finland, will probably be reached in a few years. This week's talks did not deal in any detail with the possible additional army orders from the Soviet Union which have been discussed recently. Detailed official talks will continue immediately.

Deputy Foreign Trade Minister A.N. Manzhulo, who led the talks on the balancing of trade for the Soviet side, left for home this afternoon.

Because of the fall in oil prices and the great increase in exports, trade between the two countries shows a surplus of over 3 billion markka for Finland. It is hoped that the imbalance of trade will be corrected within a couple of years.

POLITICS, DIPLOMACY CONTINUE AMID GROWING CRISIS

'Inner Cabinet' Meets 30 Apr

LD301216 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1145 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Mrs Thatcher chaired the now-regular morning session of the inner cabinet at Downing Street for 1 hour 40 minutes, ending just over half an hour before Britain's total exclusion zone came into force. She was planning to fulfill a party engagement in Bedfordshire this evening, staying in the area overnight before going to Chequers tomorrow morning for the weekend.

She plans to return to Downing Street on Sunday night, but all her engagements are subject to changes depening on developments around the Falklands. There was no sign in Whitehall that ministers were any less gloomy than they have been about the prospects for a peaceful solution to the crisis.

Officials were taking a strong line on the operation of the exclusion zone, but they were not saying whether this would involve attacking Argentinian aircraft on the runway to Port Stanley. There was some evidence that the planes may not be attacked unless they attempt to fly.

Pym: Negotiating 'Difficult'

LD301734 London BBC Domestic Service in English 1715 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym has been giving a news conference at the Foreign Office. He was asked about the remarks by Mr Costa Mendez suggesting that Argentina was prepared to continue negotiating.

[Begin Pym recording] He showed no sign of doing that at the moment. Of course the carrying out of [UN Resolution] 502 is a basic consideration. One of the problems is that it is very difficult to know who one is dealing with in the Argentine. There's no doubt that Mr Haig found that. There is the junta, there is President Galtieri, Mr Costa Mendez, there are the generals and the admirals -- it's very difficult to know who you're dealing with. But certainly so far they've shown no sign whatsoever wishing to withdraw -- on the contrary. They've spent the last 3 or 4 weeks building up their forces on the islands. [end recording]

U.S. Backing Welcomed

LD301750 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1717 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Mr Pym welcomed U.S. backing for Britain and sanctions against Argentina saying: "I am more confident than ever that justice will prevail against Argentina's totally illegal aggression." "America and Britain have done everything possible from the start to produce a negotiated settlement," Mr Pym told a news conference at the Foreign Office.

He said Argentina must withdraw in accordance with the Security Council resolution. Asked about reports that the Argentine foreign minister had said Argentina would agree to the UN resolution, Mr Pym said: "He has shown no sign of doing that at the moment."

Mr Pym doubted direct negotiations between Britain and Argentina could be fruitful because of fundamental differences. Asked whether he considered prospects for military conflict now higher than before Mr Haig's announcement he said: "It is very difficult to answer that on the attitude so far shown by the Argentines."

"I cannot say it is less likely but it may be that the pressure of the American decision to come behind Britain will cause a change in their attitude which might make it less likely but I could not make it more certain than that."

Mr Pym said he was going to Washington to discuss with Mr Haig the American decision -- "It is a very major change. They are now on our side and they are supporting us." He would be going to New York because he wanted to hear what the UN secretary general had to say, and to put the British position.

Text of Pym Response

LD301836 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1822 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Mr Pym's statement at the Foreign Office press conference tonight said: "Mr Haig has told us that Argentina has rejected his proposals for a negotiated settlement and he has just announced this in Washington.

"This is a major change in the situation. In deciding not to cooperate in negotiations for a peaceful settlement, the Argentines have confirmed their commitment to aggression in defiance of the United Nations. The British people are deeply grateful to the United States and especially to Mr Haig for his remarkable efforts. America and Britain have done everything possible from the start to produce a negotiated settlement.

"We now have a new situation and I am extremely glad that the United States has come down decisively on the side of Britain. To have the world's most powerful state on our side must make Argentina see that aggression cannot pay.

"Mr Haig has not published his proposals so I shall not describe them now. But yesterday I outlined in the Commons the three major elements of a possible agreement -- Argentine withdrawal, an interim administration in the islands, and the framework for negotiations about the future of the islands which must of course respect the wishes of the islanders.

"I also spoke in Parliament on the need for Britain to increase its military pressure and to take military measures, if necessary, in the exercise of our right to self-defence under Article 51 of the UN Charter. I am going to Washington tomorrow or on Sunday to review the new situation with Mr Haig and to discuss the next step. Then I shall go on to New York to see the secretary-general of the United Nations.

"These meetings are timely now and will be very much in accord with the wishes of the House of Commons expressed in yesterday's debate. We shall not abandon our efforts for a peaceful settlement, but Argentina must withdraw as the Security Council resolution demanded four weeks ago tomorrow." Then we shall be entirely ready to move on to the negotiations foreseen in the third point of the same resolution. A conference or any kind of negotiation can be considered.

"It has been our strategy all along to build up the pressure on Argentina -- economic pressure, diplomatic pressure, and military pressure. Now with U.S. backing, I am more confident than ever that justice will prevail against Argentina's totally illegal aggression."

Islanders Warned of War

LD302116 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2105 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] War or an escalation of military activity over the Falkland Islands is probable,' Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym warned tonight. In an interview at 2220 BST being broadcast to the Falkland Islanders, he said: "I mustn't give you too much grounds for optimism. I really musn't, because intransigence has been shown in Buenos Aires and I'm not at all confident that war of some kind or an escalation of military action will not come. And I have to tell you that, however unpleasant it may be, that is, I'm afraid, quite probable."

Mr Pym was interviewed by BBC External Services "Calling the Falklands" presenter Gerry Timmins. Asked if he thought U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig's statement today brought war closer, Mr Pym said: "I don't know. But it might have the effect of bringing a peaceful settlement nearer. But I'm not sure about it.

"The mere fact that they have now come down on Britian's side, and in support of what we are trying to achieve because they believe in all the principles that have caused us to take this action in the first place, is going to have a very powerful effect on everyone.

"You see, the Argentines made the aggression. They invaded your islands. They are making your life pretty miserable for you at the moment and that's entirely wrong. And we've got support in the European Community and in the Commonwealth and now the United States. That is a very powerful degree of pressure.

On reports that Argentine Foreign Secretary [as received] Mr Costa Mendez would be prepared to implement the UN Security Council resolution, Mr Pym said: "I am afraid I can't put too much credence or weight on that. They do change their minds a great deal and you must remember they've been very hard on the sovereignty issue -- the one thing that cannot be negotiated like that.

"We've always been prepared in Britain to talk about the future and the status of the islands, always bearing mind your wishes. This has always been so as you very well know. Well in saying what Mr Costa Mendez did in New York, I believe that at the same time he made the point that they would have to have sovereignty. Well that clearly is not really the fulfillment of the resolution."

Mr Pym added: "We take a firm line. But of course we are striving all the time to find a peaceful way if we can find one."

Thatcher Praises Haig

[Excerpt] The prime minister said last night that Britain's friendship with the United States was "once more in full bloom again." She was speaking to conservatives in Bedfordshire.

She praised American Secretary of State Alexander Haig's attempts to settle the dispute and said: "We are very grateful indeed to Mr Haig for his strenuous efforts to seek peace." But Mrs Thatcher warned that finding peace was "not always easy between a dictatorship which stands for subjegation of the people and a democracy which only flourishes by the wishes of the people."

1 May Raid Sanctioned

LD011350 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1247 GMT 1 May 82

[By Andy Webb, PA political staff]

[Text] The attack on the Port Stanley airfield was described today by senior government officials as a demonstration of Britain's determination. Prime Minister Mrs Thatcher received confirmation of the assault at 9.30 am before she left Bedfordshire, where she attended a party meeting last night, to travel to Chequers. A government statement on the raid is expected in the Commons on Tuesday.

The opposition has made no official request at this stage for an early recall of Parliament over the bank holiday weekend. Mrs Thatcher is expected to remain at her country residence until tomorrow night when she returns to Downing Street.

The prime minister was in contact by phone this morning with senior ministers including Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym, who flies out this evening to Washington. She is likely to continue contact by phone over the weekend, and a meeting of the inner cabinet is not expected until tomorrow night at the earliest. Government officials stressed today that overall military operations are under political control, and the airport raid would have been authorised by ministers.

The U.S. administration has been kept closely in touch with the situation but it is believed that it was not told of the attack until it was under way. The British Government regards the raid as a further development in its overall strategy to build up pressure on Argentina to take her forces off the islands.

Officials insisted that an attack on the airport was always liable to happen under the total exclusion zone which came into force at noon yesterday. Whitehall sources were unable to say at this stage whether the raid was a pre-emptive strike or in response to action by the Argentinians.

Officials continued to put across a luke-warm attitude to United Nations intervention, despite Mr Pym's trip to Washington and New York this weekend. They could not confirm reports that the U.N. secretary general had offered to mediate in the dispute.

It was also announced today that Mr Pym will have a meeting in New York on Monday with the president of the U.N. Security.

Explained to Islanders

LD012152 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2145 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] The attack on the Falklands today showed that Britain was in deadly earnest -- and the Argentinians must withdraw -- said a Foreign Office minister, tonight. In a special BBC World Service broadcast to the Falklands Mr Harvey Onslow, minister of state with special responsibility for the area, told the islanders: "The past 24 hours will have been difficult for many of you -- perhaps the hardest you have had to live through since the invasion. We are all very conscious of that.

"But as the Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym said yesterday there is only one way to get the Argentines out. That is to keep up the pressure on them by all the means open to use while never abandoning our search for a settlement by peaceful means." He said: "Most of you will know now of the successful action we took early this morning in bombing Stanley Airport. This was done to enforce our total exclusion zone round the islands, to deny the Argentines the use of the airport, and prevent any further military build-up.

"But apart from its military purpose, which is clearly justified by Argentine defiance of the United Nations, we hope it will show them that we are in deadly earnest when we say -- with the backing of world opinion -- that they must withdraw. We must now hope that our action will help bring this problem to a swift and peaceful conclusion: that the Argentines will see they have no choice but comply with what we and the United Nations demand."

Pym Arrives in U.S. 2 May

LD020828 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0800 GMT 2 May 82

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent in Washington]

[Text] Mr Francis Pym, the foreign secretary, arrived in Washington early today indicating that despite the military action in the Falklands, Britain was still determined, if possible, to resolve the crisis by negotiations. But as he stepped off Concorde at Dulles Airport he spoke gravely of "recent events" which cleraly added to the importance of his U.S. visit. He warned the Argentinians that Britain was determined to remove them -- by force if necessary.

Later today he will have talks with Mr Alexander Haig, the United States secretary of state followed by a meeting with U.S. Defence Secretary Mr Caspar Weinberger. Then he will fly to New York to see the UN secretary-general, Mr Perez de Cuellar. He expects to return to Britain in Concorde on Monday.

British sources indicated that they were looking for another mediator now that President Reagan has sided with Britain. Britain believes it will be difficult to find another mediator who could succeed where Mr Haig, with all his influence, has failed, but the government has by no means ruled out the idea of a role for the UN.

British sources deny that the foreign secretary has come to Washington with a shopping list of military supplies. Officials rather than ministers are likely to deal with that.

"Britain is very grateful to the President and the United States for coming down clearly on the side of the victim against the aggressor," said Mr Pym.

"We have never had any doubts in Britain but that the greatest democratic nation in the world would take that view. British strategy also has been to apply an inexorable pressure on the Argentine, diplomatic, economic and military, to indicate to her quite clearly that aggression does not pay.

"I would have thought that recent events would have brought this home rather sharply. It is necessary for them to remove their forces from the island and we intend to achieve this objective if possible by peaceful means, if possible by a negotiated settlement. That is what we are all working to achieve." But he said that the objective might have to be achieved "if necessary by force.

"What we are doing at the moment is to secure the total exclusion zone. Our task force is there to back up our diplomatic efforts -- you tend to get a more satisfactory and fair result if you negotiate from strength. Therefore I think my visit here is important, with Mr Haig first and then the U.N. secretary-general and I will explore with him what possibilities there may be for a peaceful settlement and what diplomatic mechanism may be necessary for that purpose."

Talks With Haig

LD021706 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1653 GMT 2 May 82

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent in Washington]

[Text] Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym pledged tonight that Britain would not give up the search for a negotiated solution to the Falklands crisis. He emerged from two hours of talks with Mr Alexander Haig at the U.S. State Department in Washington and said: "I have been exploring with Mr Haig the possibilities for a negotiated settlement. However difficult that may seem, we won't give up the search for it."

Mr Haig, the U.S. secretary of state, said that America remained "very anxious" to have a political settlement in the context of the UN Security Council resolution ordering the removal of the Argentine invaders. Mr Pym told press men: "I came here last week to negotiate with Mr Haig as a mediator and I have come back this week to consult with him as an ally. The British people are extremely grateful to the United States for giving them the support they are now going to give in this struggle over the Falkland Islands. We respect the basis upon which the United States has given that support."

Mr Pym was reluctant to answer questions. All he would say was: "We just discussed the whole area this morning and we will meet later on today." Mr Haig, who stood alongside Mr Pym, was also reluctant to answer questions. But he pointed out: "The United States remains very anxious to have a political settlement in the context of the United Nations resolution.

We are equally concerned that the situation now requires clarification with respect to what the obstacles to a political settlement are."

On what assistance the U.S. would give to Britain Mr Haig would only say: "That remains to be seen." But he did admit that this had been discussed in today's talks.

Mr Pym, the foreign secretary claimed today: "I reckon there are a lot of worried people running around Buenos Aires." He made the remark at a Washington press conference in the British Embassy when he was asked whether he felt there was any softening of the Argentine resolve over the Falklands dispute. Mr Pym, who remained as determined as ever after more than four hours of talks with Mr Haig that the Argentines must get out of the Falklands, said he believed Saturday's events and the recapture of South Georgia had had a great effect on Argentine morale.

Asked whether he was considering the idea of a UN peacekeeping role, Mr Pym bluntly replied: "There ought not to be the need. They should go from the islands and the question of sovereignty should be settled as before."

Questioned about prospective British military action, he said: "No other military action is envisaged at present at present other than making the total exclusion zone secure. There are a lot of options, but we are not taking any decisions about them at the moment. It is the build up of pressure which, I hope, will have the effect of causing the junta to change their minds, come to their senses, get their army away and get back to the negotiating table in a sensible way."

"But, said Mr Pym, "I do not want to suggest there will not be any further fighting -- that would be totally wrong." He said: "We have not asked for any military assistance and nobody has offered any. But it would be welcome were it to be offered."

The foreign secretary said that, despite the fighting, the door was still open for a negotiated settlement -- with the essential precondition that Argentina evacuated its troops from the Falklands. He added: "Mr Haig and I have been taking stock of the situation today -- how we can secure the carrying out of the Security Council resolution and the withdrawal of Argentine forces. We have discussed the military situation and have looked at the economic pressures we have applied to Argentine and have explored all the further diplomatic steps that might be contemplated."

Mr Pym accused Argentina of lying about damage and casualties in the fighting and said the British defence department had given an accurate account. He said that, if Argentine forces stayed out of the 200-mile exclusion zone, there might not be any further clashes.

Mr Pym stressed: "This is a world problem, not just a British problem. It is vital we protect the rights of individuals and parliaments to run their countries in accordance with the wishes of their people. This is not just a minor matter affecting a few thousand people in the South Atlantic. It is an issue that affects every continent all over the world." He went on: "If we were to allow this issue not to be corrected -- this wrong invasion and aggressive action -- there are a lot of other countries around the world which will feel a lot more fearful than they do today. It is an issue of international order."

Mr Pym said he had not come to Washington with a list of what he wanted from the U.S. Government. "There will be a lot of contact between senior officials and the military and when needs become apparent, specific requests will be made," he said. The foreign secretary underlined: "You can count upon the truth and validity of any communique we issue from the Defence Ministry in London. After the retaking of South Georgia, there was a very great deal of mis-information that came out of Buenos Aires about that event. The same occurred yesterday. I wish to give you confidence at the outset that we will tell you the truth."

All-Party Talks Offered

LD021210 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1155 GMT 2 May 82

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher today offered all-party talks with political leaders at Westminster on the latest developments in the Falklands crisis. Liberal leader Mr David Steel and the parliamentary leader of the SDP, Mr David Owen, have already accepted.

Labour leader Mr Michael Foot was still considering the offer. He has always said he would prefer up to now not to be involved in talks with the government on the crisis, so as to be free to criticize the actions of ministers.

News of the offer came in a statement this afternoon from 10 Downing Street, which said: "Following the Argentine rejection of the U.S. proposals, the diplomatic handling of the crisis has moved in a new phase. Hence the foreign secretary's flying to Washington and New York.

"Against the background the prime minister thought it would be helpful, following her remarks in the House of Commons that she was always ready to see leaders of the opposition parties if they asked, if she gave them an opportunity to come in to see her on Mr Pym's return from the U.S. to discuss on Privy Council terms the outcome of his talks. Mr Steel and Dr Owen have accepted, Mr Foot is still considering.

Privy Council terms mean that the party leaders would be informed of what had happened, but that they would be bound to keep the details secret. It is this which has hitherto kept Mr Foot from asking for the talks. Mr Steel, however, asked last weekend for all-party talks.

If Mr Foot does not accept the offer, it is not yet clear if the talks will go ahead. That is still to be decided. If, however, they do go ahead, with or without Mr Foot, it is likely they will take place on Tuesday.

Mr Pym is expected back in London on Monday evening, and his first task will be to report personally to Mrs Thatcher at Downing Street.

Foot Rejects Offer

LD021836 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1830 GMT 2 May 82

[Excerpt] Opposition leader Mr Michael Foot tonight turned down Mrs Thatcher's offer of all-party talks on the Falklands crisis. Liberal leader Mr David Steel and SDP Parliamentary leader David Owen have already accepted. Whether the talks will now go on without the Labour leader was under consideration by Mrs Thatcher and her colleagues tonight. There may be no decision until tomorrow.

The talks offer came from the prime minister after the announcement by U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig that Argentina had rejected his latest peace proposal. The implication of the offer was that the talks would cover only diplomatic developments. But the talks would be on privy council terms, and this would inhibit the party leaders from making use of the information they obtained to attack the government.

Mr Foot's "Thanks but no thanks" message to No 10 tonight made clear that he considers the right place for discussion is in the House of Commons. He is demanding a full government statement in the Commons on Tuesday, when MPs return to Westminster, to cover all the diplomatic and military developments.

Optimistic Cast to Islands

LD022156 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2134 GMT 2 May 82

[Text] Falkland Islanders were given a slightly optimistic message by their deputy governor tonight. On the BBC World Service programme "Calling the Falklands" Mr Richard Baker said: "In spite of the grave implications for you, we hope this latest action will help convince the Argentines that Britain and her supporters are determined that aggression should not succeed and that the wishes of the Falkland Islanders must be respected." The recorded message added: "Today, the news seems somewhat better. I know that there have been no reports of fighting during the day and we are now hearing reports of what seems to be some kind of new peace initiative for discussion in the USA. And we all hope very much that that will come to something."

They said they also knew nothing to confirm the report that the deal based on a seven point plan prepared by U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig working through the president of Peru as an intermediary with Argentina. The report originated in Lima, the Peruvian capital.

Labor Party Divisions Remain

[Nicholas Comfort report: "Support for Foot Despite Party Rift"]

[Text] Divisions within the Labour Party over the Falklands remain despite the endorsement given yesterday by a low-key meeting of MPs to Mr Foot's policy of involving the United Nations as a means of avoiding bloodshed.

The majority of Labour MPs are aligned cautiously behind the party leader. They believe there should be fresh diplomatic initiatives but suspect that further conflict is imminent.

However Mr Wedgwood Benn and some 20 backbench opponents of the threat of force are as resolute as ever that Labour should commit itself solely to a peaceful settlement. A group is emerging on the right of the party critical of Mr Foot's apparent drift away from support for the sending of the naval task force, and clamorous that America should "come off the fence" and back Britain.

Yesterday's special meeting of the parliamentary party largely assisted the leadership's strategy of maintaining unity by seeking United Nations intervention and looking no further ahead.

Mr Foot concentrated on what he saw as the government's "grave error" or spurning avenues of negotiation beyond Mr Haig's initiative which might avert bloodshed. He took it as a reflection on the government that while Mr Denis Healey had been to New York to discuss the crises with the United Nations secretary-general, Senor Perez de Ceullar, Mr Pym, foreign secretary, had not sought to make fresh use of that agency.

While he urged left-wingers led by Mr Norman Atkinson (Haringey, Tottenham) the former party treasurer, not to divide the Commons at the close of last night's debate, he did not rule out a critical vote of Labour at a later date.

Mr Healey echoed the Labour leader's call for further talks. There was broad support for this approach, with Mr Benn joining in to welcome what he saw as a move away from bipartisanship by Mr Foot. A more hawkish approach came from Mr William Hamilton, MP for Central Fife, who said that Britain was dealing with a "bunch of thugs."

Lords Support Government

[Walter Aburn report: "Peers Continue Wide Backing for Crisis Moves"]

[Text] Wide support for government actions over the Falklands crisis continued yesterday in the Lords, where Baroness Young, lord privy seal, gave an outline of events. Lord Shackleton, from the front opposition bench, said that some criticism of the government might not have been given if Parliament had earlier had such clear guidance on what was done in relation to both the United Nations and the international court.

For himself and his colleagues, he pledged support for the course being followed -- both in seeking a peaceful solution and backing this with the inevitable and terrifying threat of force. "Even at this late hour I share the hopes of the government and believe it may well be possible to avoid an all-out conflict."

He welcomed the stress Lady Young had laid on the fact that we were operating strictly within international law and in accord with the United Nations Charter. That had to be borne in mind by those concerned with the rule of law in international matters.

Nothing the British forces had done was contrary to UN Resolution 502 or Article 51 of the UN Charter. This view was endorsed by distinguished international lawyers. Both the Commonwealth and much of the rest of the world endoresed the action Britain was taking.

Welcoming the almost bloodless recovery of South Georgia, he said it should remain in British hands unless the international regime in Antarctica was extended further north. Until then, we had to continue to administer territory which had never been in Argentine or Spanish hands. The peaceful development of resources in the South-West Atlantic and the implications for scientific cooperation were at stake.

It was right and logical for the government to establish an air as well as a sea blockade, said Lord Shackleton, who stressed that there were countless places in the Falklands where an unopposed British landing was possible. At some stage the Falklanders would have to live in friendship with their nearest neighbours. That was where the United Nations might have a role. While he hoped we might hear good news in the next two or three days, we should not count on it.

Lord Gladwyn (Lib) said we ought to preserve national unity at this critical point of time. The bishop of Rochester, Dr Richard Say, told peers that the rector of the Falklands cathedral had reported that morale was high, though action at Port Stanley filled the residents with horror.

However the dispute was resolved, he hoped it would not be long before the government made known its plans on how it would proceed once it had recovered sovereign rights.

He believed that the government and the United Nations would have to have a care not only for the Falkland Islanders but for the people of Argentina. There would be need for a major international effort to help Argentina with its economic difficulties to reduce the possibility of further attempts to distract attention from the country's internal problems.

Lord Kennet (Soc Dem) said there must eventually be a postmortem into how the country got into this mess. Some heads now secure on their shoulders would then roll. Meantime, the government deserved all-party support for so long as it exerted that combination of political and military pressure on Argentina which would restore the right of self-determination, which the Falklands enjoyed until a month ago, at the lowest possible cost in bloodshed.

He regretted the government decision not to accept all-party talks at privy council level, as suggested by the Liberals and Social Democrats. In supporting the current expedition they were "sailing blind." But they had been asked for their trust and they were giving it. He hoped that until the 11th hour and 59th minute the government would use diplomatic effort to persuade and not compel.

Lord Greenhill of Harrow (Ind) said that Mr Haig's diplomatic mission had clearly not ended. It was hopeful that the substance of the proposals he had made to the Argentine Government had occupied them for as long as it had. Until his mission was exhausted it would be premature to involve the United Nations. Lord Greenhill gave a warning that the events of recent weeks could not be wiped off the slate. They had to be reflected in any final settlement.

BLOCKADE BEGINS; MILITARY CLASHES REPORTED

Minister Confirms Blockade

PA301105 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1102 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] London, 30 Apr (EFE) -- The British defense minister has confirmed to EFE in London that the air and maritime exclusionary zone entered into force around the Falklands at 1100 GMT. The official confirmed that there had been no change in this decision.

No Incidents in First Hour

LD301228 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1206 GMT 30 Apr 82

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] In the first hour of Britain's 200-mile blockade around the Falkland Islands, there were no reports of any Argentinian attempt to breach it. A Defence Ministry spokesman said shortly after the total exclusion zone was set up that the Argentinian fleet disposition was still the same -- strung out along the mainland coast.

But it is understood that some of Argentina's major ships are now off Rio Grande, one of the closest points of Argentina to the outer perimeter of the zone.

Port Stanley Raid Reported

LD011234 London BBC Domestic Service in English 1200 GMT 1 May 82

[From the "World at 1" program -- Special Edition devoted to the Falklands crisis, presented by Gordon Clough]

[Text] Britain has taken its first military action against the Falkland Islands. Warplanes flew low over the islands this morning to attack the only airfield there at the capital, Port Stanley. Their aim was to prevent the Argentine invasion forces from using the airstrip. The action came less than 24 hours after Britain's total exclusion zone came into force around the islands, and the Ministry of Defense in London say the raid was carried out to enforce the blockade.

The attack has been confirmed by the government of Buenos Aires. Now, with the latest news from the Ministry of Defense, here is our defense correspondent Christopher Lee:

[Begin recording] [Lee] The Defense Ministry won't say when the attack took place, except that it was this morning. Reports from Buenos Aires suggest that it came shortly before 9 o'clock, London time, and that Harrier jump jets were used. In London there's been but the barest of details from the ministry, but a short time ago a spokesman repeated the original announcement of the action:

[Unidentified ministry spokesman] Early this morning, British aircraft took action to enforce the total exclusion zone and to deny the Argentinians the use of the airstrip at Port Stanley. We are not yet able to give details, but will do so as soon as we have authoritative information.

[Lee] His statement suggests that the action was against the airstrip: If it is badly damaged then it could take some time for Argentine engineers to repair, and that means that until it is, there would be no point in the Argentine Air Force trying to run the blockade with transport aircraft because there would be nowhere for them to land. So far there are no reports of the extent of any damage or casualties. The ministry spokesman made it clear that after an air attack there must be a period of radio silence. Then the aircrews must be what he called scrupulously debriefed. All this means that there aren't [as heard] any more information reaching London for some time, certainly not in any form that could be made public. The debriefing officers will want to know the answers to the following questions: Was the airstrip damaged? Were Argentine aircraft destroyed? Which planes were hit? And, of course, what opposition was there? It is very likely that during the past 24 hours Royal Navy electronic countermeasure teams have been jamming Argentine radar and signals systems. They do that to give the air attack every chance of getting through. Later today we may know how successful they were. [end recording]

'No Casualties'

LD011520 London PRESS ASSOCIATION In English 1516 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] Vulcan and Sea Harrier jets successfully bombed the Port Stanley airstrip in two pre-dawn attacks today -- and there were no casualties, the Ministry of Defence claimed. A short ministry statement this afternoon firmly gave the lie to Argentine claims that two Harriers had been shot down, with one British pilot dead and another taken prisoner.

The statement said the airstrip was successfully bombed with two-pronged attacks. Vulcan aircraft, refuelled by Victor tankers in their long trip from the Ascenscion Island base, went in as a first wave during the night. "Subsequently, at dawn Sea Harriers carried out further attacks." Both operations were successful, said the statement. "The aircraft and personnel involved have now returned and there are no casualties."

The ministry spokesman then said that he would give further details of today's attacks as and when he could. But he cautioned that "accuracy takes time" and could not, at this stage, give details of the damage inflicted on the airstrip and Argentine planes, stores and troops.

AP reported that the Argentine Embassy in Washington alleged one British pilot was killed and another taken prisoner during the raid. The embassy statement also claimed that a third British aircraft "was damaged and possibly also shot down." "The Puerto Argentino (Port Stanley) airstrip has not been affected and is in operation," it added.

Earlier, military sources in Buenos Aires had claimed that two British Harrier jump-jets had been shot down in the second attack and that six Argentine soldiers had been slightly wounded.

Argentine Reports Denied

LD011930 London BBC Television Network in English 1825 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] British planes have made two air raids on airstrips in the Falklands. They caused runway damage before returning safely. Argentine accounts differ. They claim to have hit back, but the Ministry of Defense in London say Vulcan V-bombers attacked during the darkness and Harriers at dawn, hitting the airfield at Port Stanley, severely cratering the runway and damaging some planes on the ground. They also bombed another airstrip at Goose Green, 60 miles away to the west, and all the British aircraft and crews returned safely. Argentine accounts say only some old airport buildings were damaged and they don't admit to the raids by V-bombers. They also speak of three raids and say two Harriers were brought down and that six Argentine fighters went into action over the British task force. None of this is agreed by the Ministry of Defense in its various briefings.

[Begin Defense Ministry spokesman recording] I can now give some further information about the raids carried by our aircraft last night and this morning on military targets on Port Stanley airfield and Goose Green airfield and will subsequently point those out to you. I can now confirm that runways and aircraft on the ground were hit, in particular the runway at Port Stanley was severely cratered. The full damage assessment is still awaited. All our aircraft and personnel returned safely. And now I wonder if I could refer to a statement that I have seen on various tapes that Argentine planes have launched offensive operations against British ships. I think I can only say we have no reports of such an engagement. [end recording]

Details Reported From Hermes

LD012046 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2040 GMT 1 May 82

[From Peter Archer, PA staff reporter on board HMS Hermes]

[Text] British forces today launched a two-pronged dawn attack to knock out Argentine airfields on the occupied Falklands. A long-range Vulcan bomber made the first airstrike, followed by a wave of Sea Harrier jet fighters launched from HMS Hermes leading the Falklands naval task force.

There were no British casualties. All aircraft returned and reconnaissance pictures suggested that the raids were successful. One Harrier was hit by anti-aircraft gun fire but received only minor damage -- one bullet hole in its tail fin. The jet has already been repaired.

Targets were Port Stanley Airfield and the airstrip at Goose Green, Darwin, 120 miles west of the island's capital. Following the British raids the Argentinians launched numerous and intermittent air threats from mainland Argentina. But the enemy turned away from the task force, well short of battle distance.

The Royal Navy Harriers and Argentine jets played "cat and mouse" but did not engage in combat. The task force also took precautions against possible submarine attack.

The British attack began before dawn when an RAF Vulcan bomber zeroed in on Stanley Airfield. The bomber had rendezvoused with tanker aircraft and refuelled three times in flight since leaving its undisclosed base. In its belly were 21 1,000 pound bombs, some delayed action. Its targets -- an airfield, just 2,000 yards long.

The aim was to catch the enemy by surprise and obliterate the runway. In the darkened operations room on board HMS Hermes, radar plotted the Vulcan's progress. The bomber seemed to steer wide of its target but then closed in for the attack.

At 0.40 BST, still under the cover of darkness, the giant aircraft unleashed its awesome load.

The Vulcan's crew maintained radio silence until it was safe. Then the pilot radioed the code word for mission successful. Meanwhile, HMS Hermes had let the task force into the British total exclusion zone at 8.00 BST to establish a sea and air blockade.

Phase two now come into operation. This was a second airstrike on Stanley and Goose Green Airfield by Hermes's Sea Harrier jet fighters. Each of the Harriers was armed with three 1,000 bombs.

The main force was assigned to attack Stanley Airfield, the rest went for Goose Green. The jet fighters were launched at dawn.

One by one, the pilots opened the throttle and their war machines screamed down the flight deck, powering into the sky from the aircraft carrier's ski-jump ramp. The South Atlantic dawn was bleak, but for once the weather was not unkind. The sky was overcast, but the grey seas were calm.

HMS Hermes lay about 90 miles off shore. All around her were ships of the battle group in tight, defensive formation. The force was at action stations: Full alert, all weapon systems manned.

As the victorious pilots returned, each gave the thumbs up sign as they climbed from the cockpit. They confirmed that the Vulcan had hit its target. And they said they had met heavy, but ineffective, anti-aircraft fire.

Senior Pilot Mike Blissett took part in the Stanley Airfield raid. "It was like fireworks night," he said. "They were just hosing the anti-aircraft fire into the sky. But when we got there, the Vulcan had done its work. There were fires and smoke in the air. Argentine morale must be at an all-time low."

Pilots on the Goose Green raid reported knocking out aircraft standing on the runway. There were also unconvincing mock-up aircraft on the airstrip, the pilots said.

At the end of the day, task force commander, Rear Admiral Sandy Woodward, celebrating his 50th birthday, told me "We didn't want this fight. I'd hoped we could have put it off. We've shown our colours and this is our day."

Admiral Woodward, speaking in his cabon on board the flagship Hermes, recalled his words at today's pilots' briefing. He told the pilots: "The best birthday present you can give me is to all come back. But there is no point in going at all if you don't do a decent job."

Earlier, an Argentine fishing vessel, the Narbel, was intercepted by the task force inside the exclusion zone and escorted from it. Meanwhile, in the officers wardroom, the scene was curiously British. It was time for afternoon tea and cakes. The pilots sipped their tea and studied maps of the Falklands.

It could have been a war of nerves -- tension was inescapable -- but the great British stiff upper lip triumphed.

Air Battle Reported

LD012140 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2129 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] Argentine Mirage jet was shot down by British Harrier jets tonight in the exclusion zone over the British task force, said the Ministry of Defence. A brief statement said: "A report has been received from the task force that an air engagement took place within the total exclusion zone between British Sea Harriers and Argentine Mirages. One Mirage was shot down," said the ministry spokesman. "There are no reports of damage to British aircraft."

The PRESS ASSOCIATION reporter aboard HMS Hermes, Peter Archer, reported tonight: "A Mirage, probably a bomber, shot down an hour ago in the exclusion zone. "Second Argentinian plane escaped. Two enemy aircraft were engaged by two Royal Navy Harriers."

Archer reported that his information had come from an announcement broadcast to the ships company of HMS Hermes. But in London no further details were expected tonight.

Two Argentine Planes Downed

LD012212 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2205 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] The Royal Navy tonight went into action bombarding Argentine military positions in the Falklands Islands. Ships of the battle group loosed off their 4.5 inch guns to back up today's earlier airstrikes. Overhead a fierce air battle was being fought between Argentine Mirage jet fighters and the Sea Harrier jets of the aircraft carriers HMS Hermes and HMS Invincible.

At least two enemy aircraft were shot down and others severely damaged. The captain of HMS Hermes, Lynn Middleton, said that none of the task force Sea Harriers had been shot down and that there had been no British air casualties. Task force helicopters were searching for the downed Argentine pilots. It was understood a British ship took a hit during the battle but it was thought damage was not serious.

The Ministry of Defence in London confirmed later that at least two Argentinian planes -- a Mirage and it is believed a Canberra, had been shot down and another bomber damaged. The ministry said further information about their air engagement was coming in. There were no reports of damage to British aircraft.

Damage Details Updated

LD020046 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0139 GMT 2 May 82

[Text] Early today the Defence Ministry said there had been no reports of any serious British casualties although some men were believed to be hurt. A spokesman categorically denied that there had been any serious damage to British ships but said there had been minor splinter damage to some vessels.

He said there were reports that the Argentinians may have shot down one of their own planes, but there had been no losses of British aircraft. The MOD [Ministry of Defense] said: "Throughout the latter part of the day elements of the British task force off the Falklnad Islands and within the total exclusion zone have been subject to fighter and bomber attacks by Argentine aircraft.

"The task force commander took the necessary defensive measures and Royal Navy Sea Harriers engaged Argentine Mirage and Canberra aircraft. We can conform that one Argentine Mirage fighter and one Argentine Canberra bomber have been shot down. A number of Argentine aircraft also sustained serious damage. Reports indicate that the Argentines may have shot down one of their own aircraft.

"We can categorically deny reports that a British ship has been seriously damaged. Her majesty's ships involved only sustained minor splinter damage. There have been no reports of serious casualties among British servicemen."

The Argentine Embassy in Washington admitted losing two aircraft -- a Pucara and Dagger -- in the air clashes. These are the Argentine versions of the Canberra and Mirage. It also insisted that one British frigate had been repulsed "in flames" and two Harriers damaged, "probably destroyed."

Argentine Cruiser Hit

LD020112 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0206 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] The Argentinian cruiser General Belgrano was hit last night by torpedoes fired from a British submarine, said the Ministry of Defence early today. The cruiser is believed to be severely damaged. The British submarine suffered no damage in the engagement and has resumed patrol, said the ministry.

The cruiser posed a significant threat to the British task force, said a ministry spokesman. The action, which was at about 8 pm London time, was fully in accordance with the instructions given to the task force commander based upon the right of self-defence under Article 51 of the UN Charter.

'Argentine Rumors' Ignored

LD020848 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0812 GMT 2 May 82

[Text] The Defence Ministry today refused to comment on Argentine claims that it had downed five British Harrier jets in air and sea battles over the Falklands yesterday.

The claim came in a communique from the Argentine high command, which said six other Harriers were believed to have crashed into the sea. The Argentinians admitted they lost two Israeli-built Dagger aircraft in yesterday's battles.

The communique said Argentine aircraft had seriously damaged a British frigate and hit a British aircraft carrier and several destroyers. The statement also said the British task force had tried to make two landings -- one in the north of East Falkland and the other by helicopters, supported by fire from frigates, near Port Stanley. Both had been repulsed, said the communique. It added the Argentine forces suffered insignificant casualties and material damage.

A Defence Ministry spokesman in London said today: "We are not commenting on Argentine rumours." He referred to the Defence Ministry's statement last night which said all the British Harriers returned safely from their missions. The Defence Ministry has admitted British ships sustained minor splinter damage but denied one had been seriously damaged.

One Sailor Injured Slightly

LD021150 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1146 GMT 2 May 82

[By Alan Jones, PA defence staff]

[Text] Only one British sailor was injured in last night's fierce fighting between the task force and Argentinian planes in the South Atlantic, the Defence Ministry announced today. He is Able Seaman Ian Britnell from Teignmouth, Devon, who only sustained a slight splinter wound. He is able to walk," said a Defence Ministry spokesman in London.

The spokesman told a news conference that the Argentinian raid was "ineffective." "Only one ship was damaged, and that was only superficial splinter damage," he said. "The British fleet is continuing to perform its operational role. I would stress that in the last 24 hours we have lost no aircraft, fixed wing or helicopters."

The spokesman said an Argentinian Mirage jet was shot down as well as a Canberra bomber. Another bomber was "severely damaged."

The spokesman said that yesterday, following the attack by British planes on airfields at Port Stanley and Goose Green, British planes again bombed the Port Stanley airstrip to deter repair work and reinforce the previous raid's effects.

"While this was taking place Argentine fighter and bomber aircraft attacked our ships. They were engaged by Sea Harriers which shot down one Mirage aircraft. Another of the Argentine Mirage aircraft is believed to have been shot down by Argentine gunfire from around the airport."

"During the evening Argentina mounted a bombing raid on our task force. One of their Camberras was shot down by a Sea Harrier and another was severely damaged."

The spokesman said he had no details of any further military engagements between the two sides today. The spokesman said yesterday's dawn raids on the airstrip at Port Stanley caused severe damage to the runway and considerable damage to military installations and storerooms. The airstrip at Goose Green, to the west of Port Stanley, was also damaged, as were a number of Argentinian military aircraft.

The spokesman repeated that all British aircraft and crew returned safely from the mission. There was only minor damage to one British aircraft, which the spokesman said did not affect is capability and which had already been repaired. There were no task force casualties," the spokesman stressed.

Later a Defence Ministry spokesman said that more than one Argentine aircraft had been damaged on the ground by the British bombing raids. "It could be many more, it could be... I just don't know," he said.

The spokesman stressed "This is not (repeat not) war. This is self-defence in accordance with the UN Charter. The Argentine action is contrary to the UN directive." He said that the Ministry of Defence "would find it difficult to believe" that the two airfields are now operable.

It is stressed that Saturday's action -- the bombing raids and the naval bombardment of Port Stanley airfield -- is part of the continuous process of the enforcement of the total exclusion zone around the Falklands.

The spokesman could not comment on reports that U.S. Defence Secretary Caspar Weinberger is to visit London to work out details of American military support for the task force. "I have no knowledge of that," he said.

Hermes 'Not Out of Action'

LD021840 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1835 GMT 2 May 82

[Text] On the military front a day of claim and counterclaim followed Saturday's bombardment by the task force and subsequent aerial dogfights. Tonight a claim by the official Argentine news agency TELAM that the aircraft carrier Hermes had been put out of action was denied by the Ministry of Defense. The ministry also denied earlier Argentine claims that five Harrier jump jets had been shot down and that six other Harriers were believed to have crashed in the sea. According to the ministry there had been only one casualty among the task force servicemen -- Able Seaman Ian Britnell of Teighnmouth, Devon; who suffered a shrapnel wound when his frigate came under bombing attack.

Belgrano Hit Confirmed

TA030610 London BBC World Service in English 0600 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] A British submarine has torpedoed the Argentine cruiser, General Belgrano, in the South Atlantic. The Ministry of Defense in London says more than one torpedo was used and the cruiser is believed to have been severely damaged. A spokesman said the Argentine ship had posed a significant threat to the British task force sent to enforce the total exclusion zone around the Falklands.

The torpedo attack took place just outside the zone at 1900 GMT last night. An Argentine Government communique admitted that the General Belgrano had been hit by a single torpedo, which caused some damage. It gave no further details, apart from saying the attack took place southeast of Tierra del Fuego, the southernmost part of Argentina. It said other naval vessels had been sent to the area in case the cruiser needed help.

The General Belgrano, at nearly 14,000 tons, is the second biggest ship in the Argentine fleet. It was built in the United States more than 40 years ago and is armed with British-made missiles as well as conventional heavy guns.

Argentine Ship Sunk 3 May

LD030902 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0655 GMT 3 May 82

[Excerpts] The Ministry of Defence said today that an Argentine ship had been sunk by task force helicopters. The ministry said in a statement: "At about 4 am London time today two armed Argentine patrol craft-type naval auxilliaries fired on a Royal Navy Sea King from HMS Hermes.

"Two Royal Navy Lynx helicopters from ships of the task force then engaged the ships with missiles. One of the ships was sunk and the other was certainly damaged. The engagement took place north of East Falkland and some 90 miles inside the total exclusion zone.

"Further details will be given as soon as they become available."

In Buenos Aires, Argentine military sources were quoted by AP as saying they did not know anything about the British helicopter attack. The missiles which sank the Argentine ship were Sea Sura -- anti-surface ship missiles -- delivered to the navy this year. They carry high explosive warheads and are designed to be used against fast patrol craft. Each Lynx helicopter carries four Sea Sura.

The Ministry of Defence description of the two Argentine ships attacked -- two patrol craft-type naval auxilliaries -- suggests one of them could have been the Rio Iguazu. This coastguard patrol boat was shown on Argentine television recently in Port Stanley. It has a crew of 15 and is armed with two 22mm Oerlikon rapid fire cannon. The 81-tonnes Rio Iguazu is 91.8 meters long and has a top speed of 22 knots.

Sea King helicopters from the task force have been patrolling the total exclusion zone and keeping a watch for signs of two Argentine submarines, which it is believed might have been sent in to seek out British ships. The Sea King which was attacked today was based on the Hermes but the Lynx helicopters which retaliated would have come from either a frigate or a destroyer. The Hermes carries no Lynx helicopters, but each frigate carries one and the destroyers carry either one or two.

The Sea Kings are used mainly in an anti-submarine role or to carry troops but the twin-engined Lynx aircraft, built by Westland of Somerset, have a stronger strike power and can attack surface ships and submarines. They have a top speed of 160 mph.

Enemy 'Fabrications' Denied

LD031218 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1213 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] The Ministry of Defense today condemned the "fabrications" from Argentine military sources over the recent fierce fighting around the Falkland Islands. A ministry spokesman took the unusual step of issuing a statement to counter the stream of claims about British casualties coming from Argentina. The spokesman said families and relatives of British troops with the task force might be worried by the Argentine reports.

The spokesman said the best way to comment on the reports was by illustration.

He cited the example of HMS Exeter which, according to Argentine reports, had been "bombed, mined and sunk." The spokesman said the Ministry of Defense had confirmed that the ship in fact had not been involved in any military operation.

Following the successful recapture of South Georgia by British troops, military spokesmen in Buenos Aires insisted that resistance was continuing. He said,"It was up to the Ministry of Defense to say that the resistance was over."

The spokesman said that yesterday there were Argentine claims that up to 11 British Harriers had been shot down. The Ministry of Defense denied that any task force aircraft had been shot down. "It was hardly necessary for us to do this since correspondents on board HMS Hermes counted the number of planes flying off and then coming back."

The ministry also countered claims that the airfield at Port Stanley sustained only minor damage during the weekend attack by a Vulcan bomber and Herrier jets. He said a reporter onboard Hermes had seen photographs of the airfield and confirmed it was badly damaged.

The spokesman added: "The Defense Ministry have checked and rechecked all our statements. They are fully authentic. You can be sure that our reports are true and as complete as we can make them."

QE2 REQUISITIONED TO CARRY 5TH INFANTRY BRIGADE

LD031206 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1154 GMT 3 May 82

[By Simon Walters and Alan Jones]

[Text] The liner QE2 was today requisitioned by the Ministry of Defense and will soon be on its way to help the task force in the Falklands. The liner's job will be to help carry 5th Infantry Brigade and keep them fit and ready for action if called upon. The QE2 will be assisted by three other ships requisitioned today -- a container ship and two ferries.

A Ministry of Defense spokesman said 5th Infantry Brigade had just finished a period of training, was stationed in the UK and was already "earmarked for out-of-area duties."

This action is being taken because it is only prudent when contemplating operations of whatever kind so far from the UK to have reserves available nearer the theatre," said the spokesman. He said the QE2, due in Southampton tonight from New York, would require a small number of modifications before it set sail. Details were still to be finalized.

"Of course we greatly regret the inconvenience caused to intending passengers but the QE2's speed, size and facilities make her uniquely suited to carry a substantial number of troops who must be kept fit and ready for operations should they be required."

Also requisitioned are two roll-on roll-off ferries, the Baltic Ferry and Nordic Ferry, and a container ship Atlantic Causeway, which will be used to transport helicopters needed to give the brigade air support. The spokesman said the ferries would both be fitted with helicopter landing pads.

The 3,000 troops who make up 5th Infantry Brigade were last week on a special training exercise in Wales to prepare them for possible action in the South Atlantic. It is believed that the brigade would form a British garrison on the Falklands following any counter-invasion by the task force.

It is understood the troops will be taken to the Falklands on the Cunarder and their military equipment shipped to the South Atlantic on the two ferries.

AKEL DEFENDS ACCORD WITH DEMOCRATIC PARTY

NC010759 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 1 May 82 p 1

[AKEL Central Committee statement released 30 April]

[Text] The statement by the Greek Government spokesman in connection with the AKEL-Democratic Party [DIKO] democratic cooperation based on the agreed minimum program, to the extent that it expresses the real position of the Greek prime minister, constitutes a flagrant intervention in Cyprus' internal affairs.

This statement, which was made 8 full days following the publication of the program, is reminiscent of well-known interventions by other Athens governments that have led Cyprus to the present tragedy. With this action the Greek Government spokesman fully aligns himself with the stance of Western imperialist quarters, of Denktas and of the Cyprus rightwing, which have displayed their hostility to the concluded democratic cooperation.

But even if there was anything in the AKEL-DIKO minimum program of cooperation with which the Papandreou government disagreed, it had no right -- just as we do not recognize the right of any other government -- to intervene in our internal affairs.

But what is the Papandreou government disagreeing with in the handling of the Cyprus problem? Could it be over the stance that we will resolve the internal aspect of the Cyprus problem at the intercommunal talks under the auspices of the UN secretary general, based on the UN resolutions and the summit agreements -- a stance which has been repeatedly declared even by Prime Minister Papandreou? Could it be over the stance included in the minimum program that the Cyprus problem is a question of foreign intervention, invasion and occupation? Could it be over the other stance: That we will resolve the international aspect of the problem at an international conference within the UN framework? Or could it be over the all-sided internationalization of the Cyprus problem, a thing the democratic cooperation is stressing?

Could it be that the Papandreou government wants the internal aspect of the Cyprus problem to be resolved by the Americans or within the NATO framework?

These are merciless questions that every honest patriot puts to the Greek Government following the government spokesman's statement.

AKEL has hailed the victory of the democratic forces in Greece. It has hailed the priority the Greek Government is giving to the Cyprus problem, its support for the international conference and its decision to contribute to the internationalization of the Cyprus problem.

But with yesterday's unacceptable action by the government spokesman the Greek Government shows that it is misled by some irresponsible political circles in Cyprus, it aligns itself with the imperialist quarters in their hostility toward democratic cooperation, and if it does not mend the wrong, the only thing that it will achieve would be the revival of the Cypriot people's mistrust and suspicion as to its true motives.

Because the martyr Cypriot people have paid and are still paying very dearly for the criminal intervention of Greece's junta in the internal affairs of Cyprus, we are obliged to warn that they will not condone any form of intervention in their internal affairs.

As we have repeatedly declared, the Greek Government could really help the betrayed Cypriot people, who are enslaved to the Turkish occupation troops:

A) With its close and sincere cooperation with the Cyprus Government and with President of the Republic of Cyprus Spiros Kiprianou.

B) By strictly abiding by the principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of Cyprus.

C) With Greece's withdrawal from NATO, because the groops occupying 36.4 percent of Cyprus territory are NATO, while the British sovereign bases and the U.S. spy stations are basically NATO tools.

Any policy contrary to the aforesaid principles would cause fresh sufferings and fresh ruins to the martyr Cypriot people.

Being fully conscious of our responsibilities toward the Cypriot people and their liberation cause, we consider it our duty to state that we expect rectification and restoration of a true and sincere climate of cooperation based on Cyprus and Greek principles.

Unions on 'Intervention'

NC011131 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 0900 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] The main speaker at the Nicosia May Day gathering of the PEO was PEO Secretary General Ziartidhis. He said the decision by AKEL to cooperate with the Democratic Party [DIKO] for Mr Kiprianou's reelection as president and PEO's decision to align with the cooperation of the two democratic parties are based on the minimum program been approved by the two parties and whose implementation has been undertaken by the government and these parties.

Mr Ziartidhis said the Greek Government had no right to decide so openly and flagrantly to intervene in Cyprus' internal political affairs. Mr Ziartidhis added that when Mr Papandreou was citing the term "alignment," we had not realized he said, that this term would mean the abandonment of the inter-Cypriot dialogue nor that the method of election of the president of Cyprus should satisfy Greece's political leadership.

A resolution to the president of the republic approved by the gathering expressed full pleasure and satisfaction with the DIKO-AKEL cooperation and unreservedly supports Mr Kiprianou as candidate in the forthcoming presidential elections.

After the gathering, a procession along the main streets of Nicosia was held.

ARCHBISHOP ATTACKS GREEK GOVERNMENT'S CRITICS

[Excerpts] Today an attempt is being made by some to uproot Greece from our soul. Do not accept it! Resist, together with us, with all your powers because the uprooting of Greece from our people's soul will lead our people to annihilation and death. It will lead to our island being Turkicized. Recall the heroic women of our Hellenic history. Make your home a castle of resistence against any enemy of our country, our religion or our Hellenism. At your places of work, your companies, your environment, become courageous heralds of the struggle and resistance against foreign aggression and against the suspicious and disastrous logic of defeatism by anyone among us.

We are no longer alone. All of Hellenism is actually struggling with us now [applause], just as this is confirmed everyday by the alignment of the prime minister of the motherland with us. We hail with gratitude this alignment and the recent statements by which the Greek Government has assured our people of this alignment [applause]. And we strongly denounce the view that with this alignment and these statements the Greek Government is allegedly intervening in Cyprus' internal problems. This view is, for us, inconceivable, antinational and, for this reason, is unacceptable as well.

It is inconceivable because we declare on one hand that Greece is our struggle's mainstay. On the other hand, we reject the view that the repositioning of the question is allegedly an intervention in Cyprus' internal affiars.

But at last what is it that we want of Greece? For a long time we complained bitterly that Greece, the motherland, had abandoned us. And today, probably for the first time in history, while Greece has been so strongly and sincerely supporting us and has been calling us to a crusade to reposition our question on the international stage, we come to entrap the policy of Greece, this support. While Greece is rightly declaring that first of all the invasion troops must leave so that the intercommunal dialogue may be able to lead to solution, we come here to say that the intercommunal dialogue comes first, and then the invasion troops should go. That is, we ourselves destroy, we ourselves block Greece's worldwide crusade for the repositioning of our question. But at last, what is it we would like? Could it be that Greece should rally with us in the course of partitioning this island? Could it be that we would like Greece to assist in the effort that is being exerted to uproot the Hellenic conscience of our people?

Greek men and women: Be aware of the crucial times, aware of the huge dangers facing us. The aggressor -- the Turkish conqueror -- is holding half our country, and he is ready to capture all of it if we do not come to our senses. Thus let us listen to Greece's voice, which is expressing itself today as the real motherland through the voice of a democratic government. And this Greece calls us to rally together so that the Hellenism of Cyprus may be saved. Greece calls us to a crusade, as we said, for the repositioning of our question on its correct basis. Thus let us listen to this voice of Greece, because it would be a mortal mistake if various quarters, because of personal ambition, because of partisan goals, or because of other reasons, fail to listen to this voice and insist on a line that has been proved to be completely fruitless as well as wrong and harmful to our problem.

Thus, by expressing our gratitude for the motherland's alignment, for its genuine concern and for the struggle it has been waging so that the Hellenism of Cyprus may be saved, as well as by furnishing proof of our gratitude through our militant stand, as Greece wants us to be, in order to defend our rights, let all of us, Greek men and women, declare: Long live eternal Greece! [applause, chanting]

SPOKESMAN DENIES DEVIATION ON ATHENS-NICOSIA LINE

NC291117 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 29 Apr 82

[Excerpt] Answering a question today, the government spokesman said President Kiprianou does not intend to form a caretaker government for the presidential elections. The spokesman added: This is neither provided for by the constitution nor does such a need exists. The elections, he went on, will be irreproachable, as always.

Asked to comment on an Athens newspaper article that the Democratic Party-AKEL cooperation deviates from the line agreed on between Greek Prime Minister Papandreou and President Kiprianou concerning the Cyprus issue, the government spokesman said there is no deviation and that the agreed line between Athens and Nicosia is absolutely valid.

The spokesman also said the president accepted Mr Triandafillidhis' resignation from his post as adviser at the [intercommunal] talks when it was submitted a few days ago.

Greece Told of Accord

NC302000 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Commenting on the statement by the Greek Government spokesman that neither the Greek prime minister nor the Greek ambassador in Nicosia were ever briefed on the AKEL-Democratic Party cooperation, the government spokesman has stated that he insists on the correctness of his previous statement.

The Greek Government spokesman in Athens, referring to the new statement by his colleague in Nicosia, stated tonight that the Greek prime minister knew neither about the agreement nor even about the minimum program the two parties have signed. The Greek prime minister had only been informed that AKEL had decided to support the candidacy of Mr Kiprianou as president, but this is completely unrelated to the events that followed and the two parties' agreement.

Referring to the Greek Government spokesman's latest statement in Athens that the Greek prime minister knew neither about the agreement nor the minimum program signed by the two parties, the government spokesman in Nicosia stated: Because our intention is not to throw fuel on the fire, we refrain from commenting on this statement.

DISI Lauds Greek Stand

NC301936 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] A statement issued by the political office of the Democratic Rally [DISI] says it does not consider the Greek Government's stance on the issue of the preelection cooperation between DIKO and AKEL as intervention in Cyprus' affairs. On the contrary, it adds, this is both a right and an obligation for the Greek Government, stemming from alignment, to deter dangerous deviations from alignment.

We greet, the DISI announcement continues, the way the Greek prime minister is handling the issue. His approach confirms in practice that the policy connected with the Cyprus problem concerns all Hellenism. The announcement also says DISI opposed in time the AKEL-Kiprianou union, had diagnosed the dangers and had invited all the people to general mobilization and salvation. The correctness of the DISI position, it adds, is confirmed by the statement of the Greek Government's representative in connection with the AKEL-Kiprianou minimum program.

The announcement describes as provocative and ruthless the accusation against the Greek Government that it is allegedly interfering in our internal affairs because it refuses to accept the charting of policy by only two parties.

Allegations on Letter Denied

NC301805 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] The following official announcement was issued this evening in Nicosia:

Greek Radio-Television today broadcast press reports that the following three points are noted in Greek Prime Minister Papandreou's letter to President Kiprianou:

1. Mr Kiprianou's unexpected stand in favor of the intercommunal dialogue virtually torpedoes the crusade the Greek Government has started with the aim of internationalizing the Cyprus issue.

2. The president of Cyprus must be the representative of all the parties and should not limit his cooperation only to one party.

3. Mr Kiprianou's intention to cooperate with AKEL had not been made known to the Greek prime minister despite Mr Papandreou's recent visit to Cyprus.

Asked to comment on this report, the government spokesman stated: Such things are not included in Papandreou's letter. Asked whether the Greek prime minister was aware of the DIKO [Democratic Party]-AKEL cooperation, the government spokesman said: Papandreou knew of it long ago.

In Athens, commenting on the statement by his Cyprus that the Greek prime minister was long ago briefed on the DIKO-AKEL cooperation, the government spokesman said this is absolutely untrue. Never, he said, was the prime minister or the Greek ambassador in Nicosia briefed on it.

KIPRIANOU QUESTIONED ON CYPRUS TALKS, AKEL TIES

NC021641 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1530 GMT 2 May 82

["Text" of interview with President Kiprianou by ATHENS NEWS AGENCY 2 May -- read by announcer]

[Text] Question: In view of your speech today [to party cadres] in which you analyzed in detail the Cyprus problem, how do you summarize the common Athens-Nicosia line on the national issue, and what are the guidelines that define the pursuit for the solution of the Cyprus problem on the basis of this common line?

Answer: First the Cyprus problem is an issue of invasion and occupation of Cyprus territory by Turkey and, consequently, the immediate issue is the withdrawal of the Turkish occupation troops. To facilitate such a development, Greece has accepted that ELDIK [Greek force in Cyprus] should withdraw simultaneously, which has been favorably received.

Second, despite the fact that occupation troops are present on Cyprus territory -- something that, in fact, changes the dialogue into one between Nicosia and Ankara and not between Greek and Turkish Cypriots, with the result that a guarantee for progress in the talks has been impeded -- nevertheless, the intercommunal dialogue must continue and all margins must be exhausted so that it may be ascertained whether there can or cannot be progress. This should be done within a reasonable time on the basis of the recent instructions of the UN secretary general for the acceleration of the discussion of the basic issues. Of course, the intercommunal dialogue only refers to the Cyprus problem's internal aspect.

Third, Greece and Cyprus have undertaken a number of initiatives, generally on an international level and recently on the European level, with Greece among the EEC countries, to guarantee international mobility and to convince the various countries of the need for the occupation troops to withdraw and the UN resolutions to be implemented. The Greek and Cyprus Governments attach significance to the initiative of Brandt, whom both Prime Minister Papandreou and I have asked to act as a catalyst so that Europe may undertake its obligations, along with other countries, for the immediate withdrawal of the occupation troops.

Fourth, to strengthen efforts for the withdrawal of the occupation troops and correctly promote the Cyprus problem, the Greek prime minister proposed an increase in the UN peace force in Cyprus, offering to undertake the additional expense.

Fifth, the joint line between Athens and Nicosia which has been repeatedly confirmed seeks: A) The immediate withdrawal of the occupation troops. B) The parallel continuation of the intercommunal dialogue which, in case the withdrawal of the occupation troops has meanwhile been achieved, will be a dialogue between the representatives of the two communities and not between Nicosia and Ankara. In any case, regardless of developments, the margins of the intercommunal dialogue currently in progress must be exhausted so that it may be ascertained whether there are or are not possibilities for progress on the basis of the recent instructions of the UN secretary general. C) Parallel to the dialogue, the exercise of specific and European initiatives and activities for the creation of international mobility through the help of friendly personalities, like Brandt. Of course, the Cyprus problem always remains within the UN framework. And, of course, there are other points in the Athens-Nicosia common line, like the international aspect of the problem, on which our positions have been repeatedly clarified. However, the above points are the most important.

Incidentally, it should be stated that the issue of a revision of the common line between Athens and Nicosia does not arise, and if the state of affiars makes it necessary for any revision this will be done jointly as usual.

On this occasion I would like to stress that the joint DIKO [Democratic Party] - AKEL program in no way and in no case runs contrary to the Athens-Nicosia line, nor does it in any way conflict with it. For instance, in this program the first two paragraphs stress both that the Cyprus problem is an issue of invasion and occupation and the need for putting an end to the results of the invasion, and, most certainly, the most important of these results is the withdrawal of the occupation forces and the return of the refugees to their homes.

Address to Party Cadres

NC021825 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1730 GMT 2 May 82

[Text] A pan-Cypriot conference of Democratic Party [DIKO] cadres was held in Nicosia today. In a speech the chairman of the Democratic Party, the president of the Cyprus republic, mentioned that today a much greater percentage of the people is included in the ranks of DIKO that it was some time ago. Kiprianou added that the program agreed upon between DIKO and AKEL basically is a program for the country's salvation, something that has always been our first goal, a program for our people's economic progress and social justice. Kiprianou analyzed the program's main points and added that at no point does the program unfavorably affect the Athens-Nicosia line.

The program, he continued, is a framework. It does not contain specific elements like certain specific activities, regarding which, however, we have repeatedly spoken and declared our positions. The Athens-Nicosia line, he added, as charted during the repeated meetings with the Greek prime minister, is absolutely in force, as is the cooperation program.

Kiprianou criticized the other parties for their stance on the issue of relations between Athens and Nicosia as soon as the possibility for some misunderstanding, as he said, was perceived. He also said he neither resigns nor does he buckle under difficulties and that he will do everything in his power for the complete restoration of relations between Athens and Nicosia. I firmly believe, he said, that this will be achieved. Kiprianou also mentioned that the Greek Government has in no case expressed an intention to intervene in our internal affairs.

Rejects 'Directorate' Charges

NC030821 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 3 May 82 p 10

[Text] In reply to accusations by parties and other people that a "directorate" exists for implementation of the Democratic Party-AKEL program, President Kiprianou said:

"There has been a lot of criticism about the committee envisaged in the program. It seems that despite the explanations we have given, people who want to create problems refuse to understand the significance of this committee and call it a 'directorate,' a 'supergovernment' or a 'superauthority.' It is nothing of the sort. It is a committee composed of party representatives for the joint submission of recommendations to the president of the republic; the committee neither submits viewpoints to him nor makes him its instrument.

"Furthermore, the president himself and the government will be the ones who will implement the program. Recommendations will be submitted, and this should be fully understood, and you should explain this wherever you go because it seems this is something that 'bothers' many people. It is quite natural for two parties cooperating on a program to have a link, some cooperation, concerning a program which is, of course, the government's task to implement."

Accuses Archbishop

NC030802 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 3 May 82 p 10

[Text] President Kiprianou yesterday accused Archbishop Khrisostomos of demagogy. Kiprianou's accusation, made at yesterday's pan-Cypriot conference of Democratic Party cadres, was caused by the things the archbishop said from the pulpit yesterday during a sermon which he changed into a political speech. President Kiprianou's reply to the archbishop is as follows:

"Again today from the pulpit the archbishop called us defeatists. Responsibility is not defeatism. Demagogy is dangerous. We have the intention and the determination for a militant line. We have had this militant line and determination for the last 32 years. We have a responsibility toward the country, the people, and history; and we are handling the entire issue with responsibility and in the manner dictated by national interest."

No Athens Visit Scheduled

NC301113 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Answering a question as to whether the government considers last night's statement by Mr Maroudhas, deputy minister to the prime minister in charge of press affairs, as intervention in Cyprus' internal affairs, the government spokesman said he was not going to make a statement at present. He added: Clarifications will be asked in connection with Mr Maroudhas' statement.

Asked whether a letter from Mr Papandreou was handed to President Kiprianou last night and, if so, why this wasn't announced, the government spokesman said: Last night letters were exchanged between the president and the Greek prime minister. I am not authorized to disclose their contents. The spokesman added: Mr Papandreou was the first to send a letter; and Mr Kiprianou reciprocated. The reply by the president was conveyed through Greek Ambassador Zakharakis.

Answering another question, the government spokesman stated there is no scheduled visit by the president to Athens.

PARTIES COMMENT ON ATHENS-NICOSIA RELATIONS

New Democratic Stand

NC011122 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 1 May 82

[Text] A statement released today by the New Democratic Front [NEDIPA] maintains that the government in power in Greece had and continues to have not only the right but also the duty to most clearly state its stance, particularly toward the national question, when it is hit and degraded by minimum programs and joint declarations which aim solely at serving partisan interests.

The NEDIPA statement adds that the Greek Government's reaction to the Democratic Party-AKEL agreement was necessary and imperative, and it is to its credit because it has publicly briefed all the Greek Cypriots and voiced its disagreement in a constructive spirit with sincere intentions. The NEDIPA statement maintains that following the statements by the government spokesmen in Nicosia and Athens, the Kiprianou government has been caught lying.

PAME on Greek Position

NC301952 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] The Pan-Cypriot Revitalization Front [PAME] says in a statement that the Cypriot people must welcome the Greek Government statement to safeguard the stature and prestige of the independent state of Cyprus without any intention of interfering in the domestic affairs of Cyprus.

PAME adds that this principle means that the Government of Cyprus must adopt options in the handling of the national issue with the understanding and in coordination with the Greek Government, particularly today, when the fate of Greece is in the hands of the government of change, which has assigned the Cyprus issue to the highest point on the scale of national priorities and decisively aligns itself with the Cypriot people.

The PAME announcement says it is to the Greek Government's credit that it has publicly put forth its positions responsibly and courageously.

EDEK Agrees

NC301850 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] A socialist EDEK party statement says that the people welcome the Greek Government's statement on the Democratic Party-AKEL joint declaration and joint program. The statement adds: If the Greek Government had remained silent, particulary after Mr Kiprianou's repeated statements that there allegedly has been an identity of views, it would have left the Greek Government exposed and would have undermined the favorable climate created by PASOK's ascent to power and the Greek prime minister's correct stance.

The statement says: EDEK has ascertained that the joint program constitutes an undermining of the repositioning of the Cyprus issue and harms its internationalization. In addition, it aims indirectly at depriving the Greek Government of the legal mainstay for aid and alignment.

EDEK rejects the stand that the Greek Government is interfering in the domestic affairs of Cyprus and considers it inconceivable that the Greek Government should not have the right to express views on the course of the Cyprus issue.

Kliridhis Backs Athens' Stance

NC300916 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 30 Apr 82 p 1

[Excerpts] The Greek Government and Greece's Prime Minister Papandreou do not share the recent options in Cyprus in connection with the handling of the national question -- that is, the Kiprianou-AKEL accord and the minimum program for the presidential elections. This was stated in Athens yesterday by government spokesman Maroudhas in answer to a pertinent question. In the meantime, last night Democratic Rally Chairman Kliridhis made the following exclusive statement to I SIMERINI:

"I fully agree with the stance adopted by Greece's Prime Minister Papandreou in connection with the Kiprianou-AKEL accord and the announced minimum program."

Center Union Fears Rift

NC011542 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] The Center Union says in a statement that the difference of opinions between the governments of Greece and Cyprus over our national issue and its handling must cause sorrow and agony to every patriot. A rift in relations between Cyprus and Greece will be catastrophic to our cause and will undermine the effort for internationalization before it even begins. The statement adds that the basis and foundation for the continuation and the hopeful carrying out of Cyprus' struggle is the admirable and sincere cooperation and the absolute coordination of policy, handling and tactics with the Greek Government.

The statement says: Those who are responsible for undermining and disturbing this cooperation bear a very great responsibility. No price, no sacrifice of personal ambitions or party incentives, must be judged too great for the immediate restoration of unity and total cooperation with Greece. The Center Union statement conlcudes: We cannot ask for alignment and sacrifices from Greece when Cyprus is not a sincere, honorable and responsible collaborator.

CBC DENIES PARTIALITY IN PARTY REPORTING

NC021853 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 2 May 82

[Text] A statement issued by the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation [CBC] in connection with announcements by parties or newspaper reports alleging partiality by the corporation says it is completely inaccurate that announcements or activities by parties receive different treatment in CBC newscasts.

The corporation deals with announcements or activities of the parties represented in the House of Representatives and with the activities and statements by parties not represented in the House of Representatives in exactly the same way. CBC's newscasts are a sure witness to the fact the corporation always deals with statements by parties within the framework of the day's news.

CBC reiterates that it deals with activities of parties on the basis of a code and that it fastidiously implements this code. This code is well known to the parties and to the newspapers, and, among other things, it includes the manner for dealing with the pan-Cypriot and provincial conferences of the parties. With regard to the upcoming presidential elections, the CBC is studying the issue of drafting a special code.

AKEL ISSUES MAY DAY PROCLAMATION FOR 1982

[Excerpts] The AKEL Central Committee addresses the following patriotic, militant proclamation on the occasion of May Day:

Workers and employees, farmers and working people of Cyprus; men, women, youth, democrats, patriots, Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot:

On the occasion of May Day, the great world day of workers and working people, the AKEL Central Committee addresses warm militant greetings to you. We greet the thousands of uprooted refugees, the mourning relatives of those who died in vain and the missing persons, as well as the enclaved people. We address to all victims of the treacherous coup and of the Turkish invasion greetings of support and struggle, confidence and optimism for a better future for Cyprus and all its citizens.

Democratic, patriotic people of Cyprus! This year, May Day finds our people in a preelection battle for the 1983 presidential election. This election is a battle of tremendous political significance for the future of our people and country. In these elections main confrontation will be between the patriotic, democratic forces of the AKEL-Democratic Party cooperation and the forces of the extreme rightwing oligarchy, wealth, pro-NATO reactionaries of the Democratic Rally party which houses the coupists.

Workers, farmers, artisans and craftsmen, working men, women, democratic youth of Cyprus: Turn the May Day manifestations into a referendum in favor of the democratic cooperation based on the joint minimum program for the salvation of Cyrpus and its people.

All patriots must rally around the forces of democratic cooperation and wage, with faith and enthusiasm, the battle to block the road to power for the extreme rightwing reactionaries and all those who split the unity of the patriotic democratic forces so that the candidate of the cooperating parties, Mr Spiros Kiprianou, may overwhelmingly and triumphantly be elected.

With your mass participation in the May Day manifestations, declare your faith in the rapprochement and fraternity between Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots, which is an essential prerequisite for the peaceful and happy future of the common homeland of Greeks, Turks, Armenians, Maronites and Latins. Struggle for the ideals of May Day, the rights of workers and working people, freedom and peace in our country and the whole world. Let us all struggle together against the success of imperialism and its stooges. Let us struggle for the triumph of democratic cooperation.

All men and women to the May Day manifestations! Long live May Day, the world day of workers and working people!

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS RESUME IN SESSION 30 APR

NC302024 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Excerpts] Another session of the intercommunal talks has been held at the Ledra Palace Hotel. The Greek Cypriot side was represented by the new interlocutor, Mr Mavrommatis.

In a statement before the meeting, Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, expressed his appreciation of the work of the former interlocutor, Mr Ioannidhis, and added that the same climate that has been created will also continue with Mr Mavrommatis, who, he said, he knows very well. In reply to question, Mr Gobbi said there is no intention to change the essence of the dialogue with the assumption of duties by Mr Mavromatis, the Greek Cypriot side's representative, because he said the essence of the dialogue reflects the expectations of all the community and not that of one man. He also said there is no intent to delay the talks by making this change, because Mr Mavrommatis is an experienced diplomat and knows the Cyprus issue very well.

Mr Gobbi said the discussion on the three basic freedoms is being continued, and said that the refugee problem is a serious concern for the United Nations. He stressed that Secretary General Perez de Cuellar has asked him to follow this issue very closely. Mr Gobbi further said that at first there was an agreement between the two sides on a common national anthem and common flag but, he said, both sides have not entered into details on these questions. He also said that effective next week there will be two meetings a week, as was agreed upon.

In answer to questions, the new interlocutor, Mr Mavrommatis, said he represents the entire Greek Cypriot community and that he will continue the talks on the basis of the line that has thus far been followed and the very well-known policy of the Greek Cypriot side.

The representative of the Turkish Cypriot side, Mr Onan, said that the discussion on the three basic freedoms is being continued and that the discussion on these issues will be continued exhaustively. In response to a question, Mr Onan said the Turkish Cypriot side has not submitted any written ideas or proposals at the negotiating table.

Mavrommatis Statement

[Excerpt] In a statement on the occasion of taking up his duties, Mr Mavrommatis stressed that he will do whatever possible to respond to the expectations of the president of the republic and the Greek Cypriot community. He added:

I hope the friendly atmosphere that has prevailed thus far at the talks will continue and that the other side will respond to our spirit of good will and reconciliation so that given the political will, which constitutes a necessary rerequisite for the achievement of progress, we will proceed, with the aid of the UN organization, to arrive at an auspicious end that will be to the benefit of all Cypriot people. Mr Mavrommatis thanked the previous interlocutor, Mr Ioannidhis, for his offer to help in the difficult work he is taking over.

TURKISH CYPRIOTS APPROVE 1982 FISCAL BUDGET

[Text] The legislative assembly today approved in the early hours of the morning by a majority vote the government budget proposal for the 1982 fiscal year. DENKTAS CONDEMNS ATHENS' ROLE IN CYPRUS ISSUE

TA030929 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has reiterated that the Turkish Cypriot people will reject every proposal and view that does not include an effective guarantee by Turkey. Denktas replied to allegations by Greek Cypriot administration leader Kiprianou in an interview with the ATHENS NEWS AGENCY. Kiprianou had claimed that the Cyprus problem is an issue of invasion of Cyprus territory by Turkey. This statment by Kiprianou, who stated further that the joint program between DIKO and AKEL does not contradict the common line between Athens and the Greek Cypriot administration, was welcomed by the Greek government spokesman.

Replying to reporters' questions on the subject today, Denktas said Kiprianou's statement reveals that Greece, the real creator of the Cyprus problem, is opposed to solution of the problem through the current talks being held between the two communities. Denktas recalled that the problem cannot be resolved by presenting it, through Greek pressure, as a Turkish invasion or deceiving the world.

Hits Resolution on Armenians

TA301228 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Excerpt] President Denktas has said that the Greek Cypriot intransigent attitude in efforts to solve the Cyprus problem had once again been confirmed yesterday when the Greek Cypriot House of Representatives adopted a resolution in support of the Armenian terrorists, who are literally murdering Turkish diplomats abroad.

In a statement, President Denktas condemned the Greek Cypriot action, which was expressing support for international terrorism against Turkey, who had saved the Turkish Cypriot community from mass murders and complete annihilation through the peace operation in 1974, which had also saved the independence of Cyprus. President Denktas pointed out that the United Nations resolution and the summit agreements provided for action in good faith by both communities for a safe continuation of the Cyprus intercommuncal talks. He stated that this resolution of the Greek Cypriot House of Representatives and their efforts to further the inhuman economic embargo against the Turkish Cypriot community by imprisoning people who had entered Turkish Federated State ports in their private yachts were clear evidence of the Greek Cypriot intentions against the Turkish Cypriot community.

President Denktas said that in their communique, Mr Kiprianou's Democratic Party and AKEL had said that they would refrain from actions which would hurt the feelings of the Turkish Cypriots, but these latest actions had clarified the true intentions of Greek Cypriot propagandists. He stated that the Greek Cypriots, hiding under the guise of a legal government, and the Cyprus House of Representatives were attacking the Turkish nation and the Turkish Cypriot community.

PASSENGER SHIP HIT BY TURKISH NAVAL GUNFIRE

NC301510 Paris AFP in English 1453 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Rhodes, Greece, 30 Apr (AFP) -- A Greek passenger ship, the Stella Solaris, was hit by artillery fire yesterday when it erred into naval maneuvers 15 miles off the Turkish coast, port officials here said today. None of the 497 tourists on board the ship -- mostly French, West Germans and Americans -- were hurt by the three shots fired just off Zimar, western Turkey, they said.

Turkish officials replied to a protest by the captain of the Stella Solaris by saying that the director of the Zimar port authority had forgotten to inform the ship of the military maneuvers in Turkish waters. The Greek vessel was heading from the Turkish city of Istanbul to this southern Aegean island when the incident occurred, officials said.

NO PARTICIPATION PLANNED IN NATO EXERCISES

NC301242 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1100 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Announcement by Ministry of National Defense 30 Apr]

[Text] According to the annual NATO schedule of exercises, our country was to participate in the southern wing's exercise, code-named Distant Drum 82, to take place from 3-15 May. Because questions of command, control and procedure regarding flight security have come up, the government has decided that the Greek forces should not participate in the exercise and that our national territory should not be used by the NATO forces.

Averof Denounces Decision

NC302014 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] The chairman of New Democracy has made the following statement:

The government's decision not to participate in the NATO exercise and not to allow the use of Greece's national airspace is most significant and raises many questions. On such a serious issue, the government should have briefed the official opposition. The policy of one step forward and one step backward may have painful effects. In view of the issue's delicacy and the lack of information, I refrain from further comment.

On the other hand, I believe the government reacted correctly when after [words indistinct] and the Greek Cypriot side charted a course without at least briefing Athens. Such sudden 180-degrees turns do not serve the advancement of the national issue.

KKE RAPS ATHENS' INTERVENTION IN CYPRUS AFFAIRS

NC301008 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 0400 GMT 30 Apr 82

[Text] Even before Nicosia reacted to the statement by the Greek Government spokesman, the KKE issued a statement yesterday evening describing the Athens government spokesman's statement as intervention in the internal affairs of Cyprus. The KKE statement further says that the only ones who are displeased with the Democratic Party-AKEL agreement are the rightwing in Greece and in Cyprus and the imperialists. The KKE maintains that the government's statement reflects pressures from the imperialists and constitutes an expression of anticommunism.

Daily on AKEL-DIKO Agreement

NC301514 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 30 Apr 82 pp 1, 15

[Excerpts] The government yesterday disapproved of the preelectoral agreement between Kiprianou and AKEL with regard to the handling of the Cyprus problem.

This resulted in a strong KKE reaction, accusing the government of flagrant intervention in the internal affairs of an independent state, conceding to pressure from the Americans, the imperialists and the anticommunists. According to authoritative reports, the Greek Government's viewpoint was conveyed by Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou to the Cyprus Government during Papandreou's meeting with Cyprus' Minister of Defense and Interior Veniamin yesterday.

Credible sources mentioned that:

The Greek Government's disapproval is mainly due to the fact that the agreement between Kiprianou and AKEL accepts the procedure of the intercommunal talks as the basic way for settlement of the Cyprus problem, which is contrary to the recent Papandreou-Kiprianou agreement for internationalization of the Cyprus problem.

The acceptance [by the Kiprianou government] of the idea for an international conference -- as proposed by Moscow -- undermines Willy Brandt's efforts at mediation and the campaign the Greek Government has undertaken in all directions.

Kiprianou Assurances 'Satisfactory'

[Government spokesman's statement 2 May]

[Text] The Greek Government notes with satisfaction President Kiprianou's statement reaffirming the common line between Athens and Nicosia as agreed on during Greek Prime Minister Papandreou's visit to Nicosia and the recent meeting in Athens. Kiprianou's assurance that not even the slightest change can possibly be made unless it is jointly agreed on is especially noted, because policy on this major issue should be for the long term and firm.

TURKMEN RETURNS FROM COUNCIL OF EUROPE MEETING

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that Turkey is following with concern the tendency in European countries which have Turkish workers to send foreign workers back to their homeland.

Turkmen, who participated in the Council of Europe ministerial meeting in Strasbourg, has returned to Turkey. In a statement at Yesilkoy Airport, Turkmen said he told the foreign ministers of the council's member countries that Turkish workers should not be sent back against their will. Turkmen added that the issue involving returning workers who are benefitting from social security rights was also discussed at the meeting.

Noting that the visa requirement goes against the understanding of cooperation among the Council of Europe member countries, Turkmen added that the issue of rescinding this requirement as soon as possible was also discussed at the committee.

Turkmen said he briefed the ministerial committee on the completion of the democratic process in Turkey. He also noted that the criticism made by some of the council's member countries was intended to disrupt the relations between Turkey and the Council of Europe. Turkmen said Turkey attaches importance to its relations with the Council of Europe but that the council should take Turkey seriously and that it should be known that a negative attitude will bring a harsh reaction by Turkey.

GOVERNMENT JOINS ARAB BOYCOTT AGAINST ISRAEL

TA301337 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 30 Apr 82 p 2

[Text] Washington -- The Turkish Government has recently joined the Arab boycott against Israel, which has been implemented against U.S. firms.

In a tender for building a network of signal lights issued in the United States last month by the Turkish national railways, it was explicitly requested that only companies "that do not fall under the category of the Saudi Arabia monarchy and the Arab League boycott resolutions" submit bids. The tender noted that financing of the project was to come from Saudi Arabia. Similar limitations have been imposed on a tender issued by the Turkish electric company. These are the first details pointing to Turkey's joining the Arab boycott. This Turkish measure constitutes a violation of U.S. law.

OZAL SAYS INFLATION TO BE LESS THAN PREDICTED

TA011603 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1505 GMT 1 May 82

[Excerpt] Ankara, 1 May (AA) -- In an exclusive interview with ANATOLIA news agency, Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal said the best news he had to offer to the wage earners would be the fact that the rate of inflation in 1982 would be less than what was predicted early in the year. He said the economic recovery did not mean that this or that person would make more money, but that the masses would be satisfied with their living standards and the (?general way of) life. He said economic recovery meant more employment, more job opportunities and more happiness to the masses.

He noted that any wage increases with the stroke of a hand would boomerang and would rekindle the flames of inflation. He asserted that real wages would be above the rate of inflation this year, which would be the most welcoming news to the working people as they were the main strata of the society who suffered most from runaway inflation in the past.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES NEW ARMS EXPORT GUIDELINES

LD031526 Hamburg DPA in German 1338 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] Bonn, 3 May (DPA) -- Details of the Federal Government's new arms export guidelines, which were adopted by the Federal Security Council on 28 April, were released in Bonn today. While retaining the same restrictions for arms supplies outside the Western alliance, the guidelines allow exceptions when this serves the political interests of the Federal Republic. Whereas formerly there was an overall ban on arms exports to so-called "areas of tension," the Federal Government can now make decisions on a case-by-case basis. Here the concept of "area of tension" has been relaxed.

Section 13 of the guidelines adopted on 28 April by the Federal Security Council, which is a secret cabinet body, says in this connection: "The supplying of military weapons and of other equipment of a military nature must not contribute to the raising of existing tensions. Therefore, as a matter of principle, supplies to countries where the danger of outbreak of armed conflict exists are excluded."

Government circles stressed today that the practice of severely restricting arms exports will be retained. However, the new guidelines will make it possible to look after the Federal Republic's political interests better and in a manner more appropriate to individual cases.

Also new is the fact that while in the joint production of arms equipment with a NATO partner "cooperation interests are to have priority," the Federal Government does not want to renounce "possibilities for influence." In this way Bonn wants to guarantee itself a right to a veto in the event that the NATO partner in production wishes to export the armaments.

For this a process of consultation is envisaged, the introduction of which is to be determined jointly by the Foreign Ministry, the Federal Economic Ministry, the Federal Defense Ministry and the head of the federal chancellor's office. Here the Federal Government will raise objections if the following four criteria are present:

-- "Exports to countries that are involved in armed conflicts;

-- Exports to countries in which an outbreak of armed conflict is imminent;

-- Exports that threaten the indispensible security interests of the Federal Republic;

-- Exports that would place such a considerable strain on foreign relations with third countries that even one's own interests in the cooperation and maintenance of good relations with the cooperation partner must take second place."

In Bonn it is said that while the first two criteria rest on indisputable facts, there is room for discretion with regard to the second two points. Exports to NATO partners are not affected because they serve joint security.

GENSCHER INTERVIEWED ON FALKLANDS, GDR RELATIONS

DW011023 Frankfurt Hessischer Rundfunk Network in German 0930 GMT 2 May 82

["Excerpts" from interview by reporters Middeldorf and Purwin with FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in the program "Frankfurt Talk;" date and place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpts] [Middeldorf] The first casualties have occurred in the Falkland conflict. Does that mean war, and are we just spectators?

[Answer] The Federal Government has tried from the very beginning to help achieve a peaceful solution. It has strongly supported all mediation efforts by the U.S. secretary of state. The Federal Government has made some efforts itself through contacts with the British and the Argentine Governments because we have maintained from the very beginning that no military conflict should take place. We will continue doing everything to facilitate a peaceful solution. I don't believe there is anywhere in the world where people feel unconcerned if they see people losing their lives. It is, therefore, necessary to intensify all efforts aimed at a peaceful solution. The UN secretary general has become engaged in the conflict with efforts aimed at mediation and a peaceful solution. That must be thoroughly supported and welcomed. I hope that the talks which the British foreign secretary will hold with the secretary general will help achieve some progress toward a peaceful solution.

[Furwin] The position of the United States in Latin America has become very bad. Is there a possibility for the Europeans to fill that gap?

[Answer] If we consider avoiding a military conflict as the main thing, you must also realize at the same time that we do not want our and the European Community's traditionally good relations to be harmed by the Falklands conflict. I very much share the concern voiced in your question, namely concern about relations between the United States and Latin American countries. We have no interest in seeing the deterioration of the position of this important ally -- the United States -- in America as a whole. We hope, therefore, that the efforts which are under way now will help bring about normalization in Latin America so as to overcome the current situation.

[Middeldorf] The question is raised in all such conflicts about their importance with regard to East-West relations.

[Answer] I believe you must realize that the Soviet Union considers Latin America an area of considerable political interest, not only Central America but all of Latin America. It is obvious that the Soviet Union is trying to gain advantages from the conflict between Argentina and Great Britain. Against this background it is important to correctly assess the long-term significance of our relations with Latin America and to act accordingly. The European Community has made it clear that as soon as there are signs of a political solution, that is a peaceful solution, it will cancel the decisions it made on economic relations. I ask you not to underrate the fact that there are a number of European Community members such as us who have very close relations with Latin America. Relations between Italy and Argentina are very close, for example, and the latter has been strongly influenced by Italy. Some 4 million Italians live in Argentina. We must use all these long-standing ties to help avoid damage to European-Latin American relations.

[Middeldorf] There is a new coordinator for German policy, there are new responsibilities in the chancellor's office. What can we realistically expect to happen in this field in the coming months?

[Answer] We must aim at keeping German-German relations free of problems resulting from the general international situation. This means being careful on both sides with regard to German-German relations. This does not mean promoting special positions but keeping in mind what we can achieve in the interests of the people in divided Germany. This also means remembering not to let German-German relations become the starting point for additional problems. Rather these relations should have a stabilizing effect. The Federal Government has therefore indicated that joint concepts could very well be developed, for example, with regard to arms control and disarmament problems -- concepts such as the verification of disarmament measures and the achievement of greater openness. Nobody will have to abandon his position in the respective alliance, but we can very well contribute to successful disarmament negotiations. I believe that both German states should realize their responsibility for peace and stability in Europe and that they should live up to this responsibility and be aware in all their decisions of the interplay of all political fields in the overall context of politics.

CUBAN VICE-PRESIDENT RODRIGUEZ TO VISIT PARIS

HC301136 Paris AFP in English 0712 GMT 30 Apr 82

[By Pierre Cayrol]

[Text] Havana, 30 Apr (AFP) -- Cuba's deputy premier, Carlos Rafael Rodriguez, is to visit Paris next week, following an invitation by Paris that has been seen as a gesture illustrating the French Socialist Government's growing involvement in Latin America and the Caribbean. Topics expected to be discussed during the visit include Central America where Cuba supported a Franco-Mexican joint statement last November (?advocating) negotiations with leftist guerrillas in El Salvador, Cuban military presence in Angola and Ethiopia, (?East)-West relations, the North-South dialogue and bilateral trade.

The invitation appears to be part of a French diplomatic initiative in this [word indistinct] was launched last August. Chronologically, it comes shortly after a tour of Mexico, Panama and Nicaragua made by French presidential adviser Regis Debray. It is also one of a several invitations reliably reported to have been sent to regional leaders, including Panamanian President Aristides Royo, Nicaraguan Junta Coordinator Daniel Ortega and Grenada Prime Minister Maurice Bishop.

[Word indistinct] Mr Rodriguez will be the guest of External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson. (Reliable sources here said his trip was decided after President Fidel Castro received a personal message from his French counterpart, Francois Mitterrand.) In his message, Mr Mitterrand asked Mr Castro to send one of his close aides to discuss the situation in Central America. The message was reportedly received warmly by Cuban officials, who had high hopes for (?improving relations) with France after the French left's electoral victory last year.

Although privileged relations have not so far materialised, the Cuban officials now say they understand France's caution because of its long-standing friendly links with the United States. Over the past 10 months there have been regular exchanges of visits at a lower level. Socialist Deputy Claude Estier came to Havana for an interparliamentary meeting, and met Mr Castro.

During that visit and contrary to his [words indistinct] a lunch party at the French Embassy. In September, France played host to Cuba's culture minister, Armando Hart, who had talks with the prime minister Pierre Mauroy and other Socialist and Communist ministers.

Begins Visit

PA031739 Paris AFP in English 1727 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] Paris, 3 May (AFP) -- Cuban Vice President Carlos Rafael Rodriguez denied here today reports that Cuba has supplied weapons to Argentina. Mr Rodriguez, starting a three-day official visit to France, issued the denial after a meeting with Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson.

Mr Rodriguez said Cuba's support for Argentina over the Falklands is governed by the aid that Latin American countries as a whole will give to Argentina, adding that it was up to the Latin American countries to decide on the type of aid.

He reiterated that Cuba recognises Argentine sovereignty over the Falklands and supports the Argentine people in their determination to recover the islands. That does not mean support for the junta, he added.

MITTERRAND DISCUSSES ECONOMIC ISSUES, TERRORISM

LD031334 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 3 May 82

[Excerpts] Francois Mitterrand is in Limousin. At Gueret this morning, the president delivered a speech on various subjects and called on the French people to respect the nation's unity. The head of the state spoke on several topical subjects. In this first speech in this rather backward region whose inhabitants may feel they are at the tail end of progress, the president raised questions of general policy. On the central subject of solidarity, he referred to the major options of the left, pointing out that the left must not follow the policy of the right, nor vice versa.

He then spoke of many problems of the present and the future: Social injustice -- particularly obvious in Limousin; unemployment -- which he intends to reduce by boosting consumption and restructuring industry; inflation -- which is still considerable; and the necessity to decentralize and plan. Mitterrand discussed violence and terrorism, an imported commodity, he said. And of course, he spoke in particular to farmers, assuring them that the government pays great attention to improving their conditions. He said that 1982 will be the year in which events in the rural world will change direction.

In short, in this very political speech, much more political than economic, Mitterrand wanted to show that he did not at any moment abandon the promises and the program of his candidacy, especially in this part of the country where he lived during the war and the past is presented by him as a guarantee that nothing is forgotten.

However, as president of the republic he spoke to all French people at Gueret. Although he was referring to his political options, he did not address himself only to the people of the left and thus he appealed for union, solidarity, and recalled the measures which concern all French people.

Terrorism was a key subject of the president's speech. Here is an excerpt of this theme: [Begin recording] As I have assumed the responsibility of personally conducting the fight, the fight against all forms of terrorism will be conducted in an implacable manner without ever ceasing surveillance and without relaxing the means to justly deal with these harsh attacks on the fundamental freedoms of the government which has been our government policy from the first days of the administration. [end recording]

EXPLOSION DESTROYS MUSLIM MEETING HALL IN ROMANS

NC031324 Paris AFP in English 1105 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] Romans, Central France, 3 May (AFP) -- An explosion during the night completely destroyed a Muslim meeting hall, known here as the "mosque," for a local community of 200 North African and Turkish families. There were no casualties. Police said the explosion was a criminal act.

The "mosque" was in fact to be opened later this month by Communications Minister Georges Fillioud, who is also the mayor of Romans. Communist Deputy Mayor Elie Belle said later that the attack on the "mosque" was predictable. "An underground campaign against a prayer meeting-place has been going on for the past three months." He said that a number of Arabs had told him they had been warned that "if we go to the mosque, we will be blown up with it."

"I am not saying that the RPR (the Gaullist Rally for the Republic) party has a political responsibility for this attack, but it does have a moral responsibility by having led a racist-type of campaign against this prayer room in the recent cantonal elections." The RPR is led by former Premier Jacques Chirac. Mr Belle, who is a member of the French Communist Party, added: "The RPR has reproached us in particular for wasting tax-payers' money and saying that it was inadmissible for us to build a mosque for Arabs." Several local people said that recently an anonymous poster campaign had started several weeks ago against the "mosque."

COMMUNISTS BLAME GOVERNMENT FOR OPORTO DEATHS

LD020334 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0000 GMT 2 May 82

[Text] The PCP Political Committee has indignantly condemned the quote, savage behavior of the riot police in Oporto, unquote. A PCP communique holds the government and the minister of internal administration responsible for the display of police violence that caused two deaths and scores of wounded.

After describing the incidents as a provocation by the Balsemao government, the PCP accuses the government and the Democratic Alliance of being the true perpetrators of the two killings in Oporto on 1 May.

The communique states: The display of violence put on by the riot police in Oporto cannot be dissociated from the type of training they receive or from the glorification of authoritarianism and police repression in which members of the government have been engaging.

The PCP greets the hundreds of thousands of workers who took part in the 1 May celebrations throughout the country and stresses that, by virtue of the scale of the celebrations, the militance displayed and the confidence shown in the continuation of the struggle, they have made an important contribution towards solving the crisis through the dismissal of the government, the dissolution of the Assembly of the Republic, the setting up of an independent and democratic caretaker government and the holding of legislative elections within the constitutionally-stipulated deadline.

Inquiry Ordered

LD021030 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0600 GMT 2 May 82

["Communique" issued by the Ministry of Internal Administration on 1 May]

[Text] In view of the events that took place in Oporto which caused serious disruption of law and order and two deaths and many wounded among civilians and police, the minister of internal administration has ordered an inquiry into the matter and asked the attorney general's office to appoint a magistrate to this effect.

In order to secure a true picture of what really happened and to ascertain full responsibility for the incidents, this inquiry will take into account all the events which preceded the occurrences, namely the stands adopted by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers [CGTP] and the General Workers' Federation [UGT] toward the directive issued by the Oporto civil governor allowing the UGT to hold its May Day celebrations in Humberto Delgado square, as well as all actions deliberately carried out in breach of this directive.

Government Communique

LD021400 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1300 GMT 2 May 82

[Text] Here is a communique from the Portuguese Government, issued by the presidency of the Council of Ministers, in connection with the serious events which took place in Oporto early yesterday: The Portuguese Government has decided:

1. To emphasize that at the root of such events was the disrespect of the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers-National Inersindical [CGTP-IN] for decisions made in accordance with the law by the legitimate authorities, which had been duly conveyed to the CGTP-IN;

2. Accordingly, to bring legal proceedings against each member of the national secretariat of the CGTP-IN and of the executive of the Oporto Federation of Trade Unions in view of their illegal behavior which is at the root of the serious incidents which took place;

3. To set an imperative 30 days' deadline for the completion of the inquiry already ordered into those events which is to be carried out by the attorney general's office in order to ascertain all responsibilities;

4. Deeply to regret the loss of human lives and the injuries sustained by some people, resulting from a violent attempt at disrupting public order in manifest disrespect for the appropriate rules of any democratic state of law.

BALSEMAO SPEAKS TO PRESS BEFORE LEAVING FOR FRG

LD031448 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] Prime Minister Francisco Pinto Balsemao left Lisbon at 0920 this morning on a 3-day official visit to the FRG. There he will have talks with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and the president of the federal republic. The prime minister is accompanied by Foreign Minister Andre Goncalves Pereira and Minister of Finance and Planning Joao Salgueiro, among others.

Outlining the purpose of the visit, the prime minister said it naturally involves the concern [as heard] aroused by our forthcoming entry into the EEC. Prompted by the reporters present, he elaborated on a recent statement to the effect that Portugal's Western allies must render the necessary help to prevent it from becoming another Poland.

[Begin Balsemao recording] What I have stated in our country on a number of occasions and have repeated to foreign news agencies is that democracy can hardly survive below a certain level of development and that in those circumstances, there may easily occur a change from a democratic government to situations similar to those in Poland or in other countries ruled by dictatorships.

This is not what we are aiming for. Obviously what we seek is the consolidation of our democratic government. We believe that the effort the economic recovery depends first and foremost upon the Portuguese. But we also believe that our Western allies must understand the difficulties faced by Portugal, must realize that, even with regard to this goal of joining the Common Market, our development must be assisted so as to help us catch up with the other Western countries. [end recording]

Questioned in connection with the 1 May incidents, Balsemao said: [Begin recording] [Balsemao] I believe that the communique issued yesterday by the government sums up our position adequately. Of course, we all profoundly regret that deaths occurred, and the inquiry already underway will ascertain responsibility. However, it is equally obvious that the whole problem arose basically because Intersindical refused to heed decisions made by the legitimate authorities in accordance with the law of the land.

[Unidentified correspondent] The government's communique says a legal inquiry is to be made. What are the legal grounds for this step?

[Balsemao] The disrespect and disobedience to clear directives legitimately issued by the authorities, and also all the incidents that unfortunately ensued in Oporto. This inquiry will be conducted by a magistrate to be appointed by the attorney general's office -- which will be a further guarantee of independence -- and on the basis of its conclusions the government will adopt the necessary measures. [end recording]

FINANCE MINISTER ANNOUNCES PLANS, TARGETS

[Excerpt] "To discourage excessive recourse to credit and to promote investment through tax incentives" -- these are the basic aims of the financial measures announced yesterday by [Finance and Planning] Minister Joao Salgueiro. They include an increase in general interest rates -- up by 2 percent -- and in the Bank of Portugal's discount rate, which will rise from 18 to 19 percent. In addition, Joao Salgueiro disclosed that the government is maintaining the "ambitious" 17-percent target for inflation in 1982.

Salgueiro disappointed all the expectations concerning the announcement of increases in the prices of essential commodities, which was regarded as certain by the news media. But if in fact he announced no increases, nor did he discount the likelihood of their being announced soon. In addition, he revealed that the government has been discussing the need to make "some readjustments" over the next 3 years in the fields of cereals and fuels policies. If any increases in these areas are decided on for the present, they will be announced, Salgueiro stated, by the ministers responsible for the relevant ministries. However, the finance minister said that only increases which have "structural effects on our economy" are justified.

Salgueiro deemed it possible to maintain the 17-percent limit for inflation, although he stated that the government has always viewed it as a "deliberately ambitious" aim. Explaining its maintenance, the finance minister said that the only negative influence ascertained so far is the high dollar exchange rate, since the average level achieved domestically in public wage bargaining is "encouraging." The minister also believes that the rise in international interest rates is one of the "worrying" signs for our current account balance, along with the absence of signs of recovery in the European economies. Among the "encouraging" signs for the national economy, Salgueiro mentioned, in addition to the end of the drought, the correct implementation of the overall state budget and the movement of credit in the manner planned -- at a rate of 22 or 23 percent, as against 30 percent in 1981.

The minister denied that a devaluation of the escudo is envisaged, maintaining that if it occurred, it would mean a deterioration in the Portuguese people's living conditions. "I do not believe," Salgueiro stated, "that a devaluation of the escudo is imminent. These reports, which come from will identified newspapers, fall within a campaign similar to those launched in other European countries." The minister recalled that the government has already made two readjustments in its exchange rate policy. It accelerated the creeping devaluation of our currency from 0.5 percent to 0.75 percent per month, and changed the method of calculating the actual exchange rate of the escudo so as to reduce the importance of the dollar in determining it.

In addition, Salgueiro said that Portugal will continue to resort to foreign loans this year, a $300-million transaction being under negotiation with a consortium of Euromarket banks. Also within the framework of foreign credits, the minister disclosed that our country will resort for the first time since 25 April [presumably 1974] to the Japanese and FRG securities markets. As regards negotiations with the IMF, Salgueiro said that normal contacts with this and other international financial institutions are continuing, and that Portugal will only negotiate an agreement with the IMF if that body's perspective on the Portuguese economy is convergent with that of the Lisbon government.

In addition, the minister of finance and planning disclosed that a medium-term program for agriculture, the first version of which already exists and in which support machinery for the sector is envisaged, is to be announced in June. Similar programs will be put forward for other sectors. These programs will now meet the needs of European integration and the economic development priorities of Angola and Mozambique if, as everything indicates, the optimistic prospects now existing as regards relations between Portugal and those African countries are realized.

PYM RETURNS FROM U.S.; HEADS FOR FOREIGN OFFICE

LD031946 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1929 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] Mr F. Pym arrived back in London tonight and drove straight to the Foreign Office. He said at Heathrow that he had nothing to add to his press conference in New York.

"I haven't heard anything fresh in the last three or four hours. It is very nice to be back. My talks were important and useful. They were very useful and very important." On the short walk from Concorde to his car, Mr Pym was asked several times if he anticipated any more immediate military activity but did not reply.

He said: "I'm going to the Foreign Office and what I do then remains to be seen. But I will be seeing the prime minister in the morning."

NOTT AFFIRMS SEARCH FOR PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT

LD032052 London BBC Domestic Service in English 2030 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] The Defense Secretary, John Nott, has said that Britain's overriding aim will always remain a peaceful and lasting settlement guaranteeing the future of the Falkland Islands. Mr Nott, who was speaking to newsmen at the Ministry of Defense in London, said Britain's forces in the South Atlantic would continue to exercise their skill with restraint:

[Begin recording] Military pressure is not and must never be an end in itself. It will remain merely one part of our search for a peaceful solution. We mustn't forget that the islands are British and are settled by people of British descent and they have been invaded by an aggressor who must now withdraw. But there is also a wider purpose in our endeavors. It is to ensure that armed aggression does not pay. [end recording]

Defends Belgrano Attack

LD032110 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2058 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] Defence Secretary John Nott tonight defended the torpedoing of the Argentine cruiser General Belgrano -- according to Argentina chiefs of staff presumed sunk with no word of the fate of its 1,200 crew. And amid reports that the government had not ruled out an immediate invasion he insisted that Britain "most certainly" had the right to retake the Falklands in its right to self-defence under the United Nations Charter.

In his first major statement since the British storming of South Georgia more than a week ago, Mr Nott said Britain had no possible option but to attack the Belgrano even though it was outside the 200-mile exclusion zone. "Our first duty is to protect our own men. The General Belgrano was a threat to our men and therefore it was quite correct that it was attacked by our submarine."

He said he had no information about the Buenos Aires statement that the Belgrano -- Argentina's second largest warship -- was now presumed sunk, but pledged that Britain would give assistance and medical aid to the survivors of any Argentine ships that were attacked. He said every action by British forces would remain under the "strictest political direction" although decisions on the ground must be taken by the task force commanders. Britain was using the minimum of force and aiming for the minimum loss of life on both sides. But he went on: "We will continue to tighten the screw. We will use military means in parallel with our genuine aim to achieve a diplomatic solution to this problem."

At a Defence Ministry briefing he described British military achievements as "notable" but said he did not pretend British forces faced an easy task.

"Early success is certainly encouraging and we are confident that our action will be successful, but we will never be over-confident, nor we will be boast of our success." Quoting Nelson he said: "Magnanimity in victory will be the main aim of the British fleet."

His message to Argentina was that there was "one quick and simple way" to alleviate the casualties of their personnel, their ships and aircraft -- "It is to keep out of the zone set up by us and to stop threatening our forces in the South Atlantic."

And the junta could stop the fighting by withdrawing its garrison from the Falklands in compliance with United Nations Resolution 502. "Then negotiations for a peaceful long-term solution can be resumed," Mr Nott said.

British action was intended to bring home to those who apparently believed in force the fact that force would not triumph. The successes of the task force had shown the skill of our men and the quality of their equipment. He said it was clear that many of the Argentine claims of military success were simply inaccurate. Britain would do its utmost to give the facts. "We are not interested in propaganda. We will try to clear up any misinformation which comes from the Argentines," he said.

Patrol Craft Fired First

LD041158 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1143 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Argentinian naval auxiliary patrol craft accompanying cruiser Belgrano fired first at British Sea King helicopters before the cruiser was sunk, the Ministry of Defence said today. He said he had no knowledge of any Argentinian casualties.

British forces were involved in further action in the South Atlantic, the Defence Ministry spokesman disclosed. "There has been action which I do not have full details of. It may be that the defence secretary may give details this afternoon," said the spokesman.

"I have no knowledge of any further British casualties," he said. "If Argentine ships were engaged in picking up survivors we would not interfere with them," said the spokesman.

BBC CARRIES GOVERNOR HUNT ADDRESS TO ISLANDERS

PY032322 London BBC World Service in English 2120 GMT 3 May 82

[From "Calling the Falklands"]

[Text] The world of the keiper is a closer affair, altogether more private. And to discuss that with you, your governor, Rex Hunt:

[Hunt] Dear Islanders and Colleagues, I hope that you're still receiving "Calling the Falklands" loud and clear. I last spoke to you 5 days ago and a lot has happened since then. Those of you remaining in Stanley now know the sound of 1,000-lb bombs, and Darwin and Goose Green learned from firsthand the awesome noise of a ground attack by Harriers. I understand from the Ministry of Defense that the pilots were carefully briefed to avoid any risk to civilians and that all the bombs landed in the target areas. I've not yet seen the reconnaissance flight's photographs, but it is my fervent hope that no damage to civilian life or property was caused.

Reports from the Argentine indicate that our 5F Islander and my and Bill (Luftin's) ("Shacklers") were destroyed at Stanley Airport. I naturally hope that this is as false as all the other reports coming out of Argentina at the present time, but even if it happens to be true it is a small price to pay for putting Stanley Airport out of action and isolating the Argentine forces from their mainland supply bases.

I realize the hardship that the shutting off of all air communications cause you. I don't know whether the Argentines are trying to fly the Beavers, but I suspect that our declaration of a total exclusion zone, which carries with it the right to destroy any aircraft, either flying or on the ground within the zone, means that you in the camp have no longer any air communications with Stanley, even for medical cases.

The declaration of the total exclusion zone with the ensuing knocking out of Stanley Airport also means that nobody can be evacuated to the mainland and that all air mail for and from you will have ceased. These are serious deprivations, I know, and the British Government have only taken such severe measures in the hope that they will more quickly bring the Argentines to the conference table. You know as well as I do that as long as the Argentines insist upon the transfer of sovereignty as a prerequisite for the withdrawal of their troops, we have no alternative but to carry on, increasing the diplomatic, economic and military pressures so that, before too long, the Argentines will realise that they must withdraw their troops or have them forceably removed.

Diplomatic and economic pressures on the Argentines have increased since I last spoke to you. We now have the full support of the United States of America, in addition to the Common Market and a large proportion of the Commonwealth and the Third World. As you will have heard, Japan is the latest country to join in the economic sanctions against Argentina, and there is now an enormous amount of pressure on President Galtieri to settle for a peaceful solution. As Mr Pym said in Washington yesterday, the Argentines have just as great an interest as we and the rest of the world in trying to find a peaceful settlement if at all possible.

I know that you agree with me that the Argentines have no right to be on the Falkland Islands. They started this invasion, and they must now withdraw their forces. If they do not, then I'm afraid that we shall have to kick them out. But I still hope that common sense will prevail and that President Galtieri will withdraw before we have to make him.

You've all doubtless heard the conflicting claims in the recent fighting between the Argentine and the British forces. After the way the Argentine Government has misinformed their people about the Falklands Islands for so many years, I know I do not have to tell you that their ridiculous claims of losses and damage to our task force on Saturday are completely false and that the statements you've heard on the BBC Overseas Service are completely accurate. We have not yet lost a single aircraft or ship and I put this down to one thing: Professionalism.

If we do have to invade the Falkland Islands -- and I still hope that this will not be necessary -- I have every confidence that our forces will carry out the operation in an equally professional way. After our recapture of South Georgia and our attacks on Stanley Airport and Goose Green Airfield, without sustaining a single fatality, I'm sure that our task force will be able to free you from the Argey aggressor with the minimum of force and the minimum of risk to yourselves.

I hope to be back with you soon. Good night and God bless you all.

LISSARIDHIS RAPS KIPRIANOU ON 'REPENTANCE'

NC031651 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 3 May 82 p 16

[Text] Socialist EDEK Party Chairman Dr Vasos Lissaridhis arrived suddenly in Athens yesterday. In an exclusive statement to ELEVTHEROTIPIA, the Cypriot politician pointed out that: Mr Kiprianou's statement made yesterday to the ATHENS NEWS AGENCY expressed a "rhetorical repentance," while the joint program of the Cypriot president and AKEL remains.

Mr Lissaridhis asked, what is going to happen with the joint program? And, in particular, what is going to happen with the government that has already been formed and is already implementing this program? Will there be a new reshuffle in Cyprus? In rejecting the description given to the Greek Government's statement as a cruel intervention in Cyprus' domestic affairs -- as AKEL and KKE had stated -- the Cypriot politician described AKEL's equating the Greek prime minister with Denktas as an unacceptable abuse against the Greek people and the Greek Cypriots.

Dr Lissaridhis arrived at Ellinikon Airport yesterday at noon and remained in Athens until this morning when he left for Algiers, where he will attend the conference of the socialist and progressive parties. In his interview with ELEVTHEROTIPIA, Mr Lissaridhis stated the following:

"There were clear indications of deviations in the joint Democratic Party-AKEL program. The insistence to resort to any form of dialogue -- even a travesty -- the distillation of the problem's basis as merely an issue of occupation; the undermining of the legal mainstay for assistance by the Greek Government by raising the issue to a top priority at a possible international conference; and the denunciation of the 'treaty of guarantee' before a final solution are some of the positions of the joint program that undermine the national course.

"Mr Kiprianou tried to convince the Cypriot people that he was following up the agreement with Mr Andreas Papandreou for the repositioning of the Cyprus issue. Had the Greek Government not expressed its views, it would have been equally responsible for a line that it did not approve.

"It is strange to describe the Greek Government's statement as an interference in Cyprus' domestic affairs when this right is extended to all other foreign countries, some of which have already praised the joint program. The uncomplimentary description of the Greek prime minister by the governing party of Cyprus is an abuse against the Greek people and the Greek Cypriots.

"With his recent statements, Kiprianou expressed repentance. However, what is happening concerning the joint program? What is happening concerning the government that has been appointed to implement the program? Will there be a fresh reshuffle with the joint program being denounced by Kiprianou, a program that he countersigned? Will the people be asked to decide on yesterday's statements or the joint program that is already being implemented?"

TRADE PROTOCOL SIGNED WITH CSSR; MISSION RETURNS

During the delegation's visit in Prague, a review of Cypriot-Czechoslovak trade relations was conducted and ways of further strengthening trade exchanges were discussed. A trade protocol was also signed. Czechoslovakia has assured the delegation that it will continue to import wine products and other products from Cyprus.

AREAS OF CYPRUS-GREECE DISAGREEMENT REMAIN

NC040916 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 3 May 82 pp 1, 15

[Text] Monumental differences over the Cyprus issue remain between the Greek and Cypriot Governments despite yesterday's assurances by Cypriot President Kiprianou that he has not deviated from the joint line he laid down with Greek Prime Minister Papandreou.

In yesterday's interview with the ATHENS NEWS AGENCY, Kiprianou argued that the joint program he signed with AKEL is not at variance with the joint Athens-Nicosia line. He added that he continues to consider the withdrawal of the Turkish occupation troops from Cyprus as an "immediate question" and that he looks toward international movement concerning the Cyprus issue with the help of friendly personalities, such as former FRG Chancellor Willy Brandt.

The Greek Government noted this Kiprianou statement "with satisfaction" and particularly stressed his assurance that "no change -- not even the slightest -- could take place unless it is jointly agreed upon."

This was stated by the government spokesman yesterday while authoritative sources in Athens simultaneously stressed that the Greek Government insists on the internationalization of the Cyprus issue and that it does not intervene in Cyprus' domestic affairs.

The same sources stressed that -- contrary to what Kiprianou maintained -- the context of his agreement with AEKL does cancel out the joint Athens-Nicosia line and makes the effort toward a Cyprus solution even more difficult. The difference between the Cypriot president and the line he laid down with Prime Minister Papandreou centers on four points:

1. The Greek Government considers the withdrawal of the Turkish occupation troops as a prerequisite for the solution of the Cyprus issue while the joint DIKO (Democratic Party)-AKEL program speaks about the withdrawal of "all foreign troops." This generalization, according to Greek viewpoints, is not beneficial at the current phase of the Cyprus issue.

2. The Greek Government opposes the DIKO-AKEL agreement's position that "the process of inter-Cypriot negotiations is, under current developments, the most appropriate one." If the inter-Cypriot dialogue is to produce results, it sets the withdrawal of the Turkish occupation troops as a prerequisite.

3. The Greek Government looks toward international support for the Cyprus issue from every possible direction and primarily through the initiatives undertaken by Brandt. According to existing reports there have been positive responses from certain European governments toward certain moves by Prime Minister Papandreou. By contrast, the joint DIKO-AKEL program has a unilateral orientation with the convocation of "a special international conference" on the basis of the well-known Soviet proposal.

4. The Greek Government is against the legal establishment of new "guarantor powers" of the Cyprus issue. This would complicate things within the conflict between the great powers (U.S. and USSR). By contrast, the DIKO-AKEL agreement speaks about "making sure of authoritative international guarantees."

It was revealed that during the period between the signing of the joint DIKO-AKEL program (21 April) and the disapproval of the Greek Government (30 April), there was an unsuccessful attempt by the Greek side to have Kiprianou explain the controversial points which are in total variance with the joint Athens-Nicosia line in force at that time.

IRISH REPUBLIC

GOVERNMENT READY TO HOST REAGAN-BREZHNEV TALKS

LD031346 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1315 GMT 3 May 82

[By Chris Atkin, PA staff reporter]

[Text] The Irish Government reacted positively today to the prospect of providing the venue for summit talks between Presidents Reagan and Brezhnev. An official spokesman in Dublin stressed that no arrangements had been made for such a meeting in Ireland.

But, responding to a report in the Washington POST newspaper that the republic was among venues being considered for a Reagan-Brezhnev summit next October, the spokesman underlined an Irish desire to help where possible. The spokesman said: "The government wish to make it clear that they are willing at any time to make any contribution they can and to be of every assistance possible towards the promotion and maintenance of world peace." A summit stated in Ireland would amount to a double boost for the Dublin administration. Apart from the political kudos to be gained from hosting the discussions the Irish would succeed at the same time in securing a visit by President Reagan to the country of his roots. Genealogists have traced his family origins to a village in County Tipperary, and he has a standing invitation to make a trip to Ireland.

SPAIN

PEREZ-LLORCA DEPARTS FOR U.S., UN VISIT

LD031338 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1300 GMT 3 May 82

[Excerpts] The Spanish Government views with extraordinary concern the armed escalation between Britain and Argentina, according to Spanish Foreign Minister Perez-Llorca in remarks made at the airport before leaving for New York and the United Nations to finalize details of the new treaty with the United States. However, the minister explained that Spain is not going to mediate directly in the Falklands conflict, but will contribute ideas for a peaceful settlement.

The foreign minister said in connection with the military treaty with the United States that he is going to try to clear up the remaining question marks. He said the clause on nuclear defense is not one of them, since it is not a serious problem in the negotiation.

SWEDEN

WITHDRAWN INVITATION UPSETS ISRAELI SOCIALISTS

FMO31249 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 29 Apr 82 p 8

[Text] Stockholm, 28 Apr -- An embarrassing misunderstanding has arisen between the Social Democrats in Sweden and the Labor Party in Israel. The reason for the misunderstanding is that a Swedish invitation to party colleagues in Israel to celebrate May Day in Stockholm was suddenly withdrawn.

Reaction from the Israeli Labor Party has been strong. In a telex to Olof Palme Israeli party leader Shimon Peres writes that "our party and the state of Israel have been insulted." Only 2 days before the Israeli delegation was to leave for Stockholm there came a message from Swedish Party Secretary Sten Andersson that the visit should be postponed. The last few days' developments in the Middle East are behind the Swedish Social Democrats' new view of the desirability of an Israeli party visit.

Andersson also referred to the debate in Sweden, meaning the dissatisfaction with what has happended on the West Bank and the recent Israeli bombing of southern Lebanon. The Israeli withdrawal from the occupied areas in Sinai was not mentioned however.

In the Swedish view the safety of the Israelis in Sweden could be threatened during the 1 May celebrations. The demonstrations will inlcude PLO representatives from states to which -- according to Party Secretary Sten Andersson -- Israel sends arms.

Shimon Peres has been an admirer of Sweden for many years and has a close friendship with Olof Palme. But now he is deeply hurt. "Of course we will not come if we are not welcome," Peres said. He also reminded his Swedish party colleagues that Israel is a democracy where there is freedom of speech, "unlike within the PLO."

Israeli sources have also said that the Swedish Social Democrats seem to have forgotten that Menachem Begin, and not the Labor Party, is in power in Israel.

[Summary] -- On 3 May, Cyprus Foreign Minister Nikolaos Rolandhis met with Austrian Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr for a working talk on bilateral and international subjects. Rolandhis, who had arrived on Sunday for a 3-day official visit in Austria, expressed the wish of his country for more balanced trade with Austria, and interest in increasing the number of Cypriots who want to study or get training in Austria. The international subjects focused on possibilities of strengthening the role of the Council of Europe, the Middle East problem and the CSCE process. Rolandhis also discussed the Cyprus issue from his government's point of view.

Foreign Minister Pahr gave a luncheon for his guest, and in the afternoon Rolandhis was received by President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger.

CHANCELLOR KREISKY COMMENTS ON FALKLANDS CONFLICT

AU041230 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1038 GMT 4 May 82

[Hans Langsteiner report on Chancellor Kreisky conference in Vienna on 4 May following the cabinet meeting -- with recorded portions]

[Excerpt] Chancellor Kreisky -- according to his own words, too old to go into all details of Latin American affairs -- at present still believes in the possibility of a peaceful settlement of the Falklands conflict. Asked after the cabinet meeting to comment on the latest escalation the chancellor declared initially:

[Begin recording] I continue to be of the opinion that with the exception of a few isolated military actions a war, a full war, can be avoided, because I cannot imagine what should be the benefit of such a war. Nor can I imagine that leading statesmen in the world today would set such a thing in motion, because after all they must taken into consideration the fact that once wars are unleashed one cannot choose where they will lead, how things will develop. [end recording]

Which side is chiefly blamed by Kreisky in this conflict? [Begin recording] Surely and unequivocally that state which launched a military aggression. For, if any state that has any claims somewhere orders its troops to march and does not even attempt to enter into serious negotiations, that is a disaster. You need only think of all the unsatisfactory solutions since World War II -- and if everyone sets himself up as judge in his own cause, the international order which exists in large parts of the world will be lost. [end recording]

While Kreisky here seemed to blame Argentina as the main culprit of the crisis, he made it clear a little later that he also pins a substantial part of the blame of England: [Begin recording] What is involved here is a decision which emerges from a certain basic mentality: Great Britain is at present ruled by a Conservative government which is still thinking in terms of the empire. Personally, I am convinced that a Labor government -- as it proved over and over again in the past -- would probably not have handled such a conflict in this manner. [end recording]

Kreisky assessed the prospects for a United Nations' mediation in the conflict as dim, but added that even the best mediation would be useless if both sides to the conflict did not want it.

POSSIBILITY OF U.S.-USSR VIENNA SUMMIT VIEWED

AU041142 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1040 GMT 4 May 82

[Report on Chancellor Kreisky Vienna press conference on 4 May following the cabinet meeting, with recorded portions]

[Excerpt] In reply to the question of whether he believed that there is a chance of a Reagan-Brezhnev meeting in Vienna, as is rumored, Kreisky referred to earlier talks with the deceased U.S. ambassador to Austria, Cummings, and went on to say: [Begin recording] Thus there is on the part of President Reagan -- so it seemed to me -- a certain readiness to participate in such a meeting even if it were held in Austria. We have to wait to see what attitude will be taken by the Soviet Union. In the past, General Secretary Brezhnev has proven his sympathy for Austria, also as far as meetings in Austria are concerned. The same goes for the Soviet Government altogether, and I have no reason to belive that the Soviet side would have any objections. [end recording]

KREISKY 'MISQUOTED' IN NEWSWEEK INTERVIEW

AU041000 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 4 May 82 p 3

[AZ report: "NEWSWEEK Misquotes Kreisky"]

[Text] Vienna -- The U.S. news magazine NEWSWEEK has published an interview with Chancellor Kreisky in which he is quoted as saying, among other things -- in reply to the question "Are you in favor of a nuclear weapons freeze?" -- "To believe that the Soviet Union is a pacifist power is absurd. The Soviet Union cannot be trusted at all."

The chancellor has declared that he never said the second sentence. Instead, he had added to the first-quoted sentence in the interview: "One should think of the submarine off the Swedish coast which certainly was only part of a whole fleet, and also of the SS-20 (intermediate-range missiles) and of Afghanistan."

In the next few days ARBEITER-ZEITUNG is going to carry the full text of the interview which was only bridged in NEWSWEEK and -- as regards the quoted passage -- distorted.

BRIEFS

JAPANESE DELEGATION -- In talks with State Secretary Adolf Nussbaumer and Oskar Gruenwald, director general of the Nationalized Industry Holding Company, in the federal chancellory this weekend, a delegation of high-ranking economic experts from Japan stressed fundamental interest in investments in Austria. In the talks the Japanese guests expressed their wish for detailed information on investment projects and the Austrian economic policy in general and stated that the Japanese economy is considering investment prospects for purely Japanese projects and cooperation between Japanese and Austrian enterprises. According to State Secretary Nussbaumer Austria would in principle be intersted in all branches, but the main interest is in electronics and special machinery of all kinds. FOREIGN MINISTER CITED ON CURRENT ISSUES

[J.V.H. and C.B. report]

[Excerpts] Although fully spent, the 1981 budget gave the Chamber the opportunity for 2 days of debate on the government's foreign policy. The opposition cross-examined the five ministers concerned: Mr Tindemans (foreign affairs), Willy de Clerq and Andre Kempinaire (foreign trade), Mrs Jacqueline Mayence-Coossens (cooperation) and Mr Paul de Keersmaeker (agriculture). All major current issues were raised by around 20 speakers.

When Mr Tindemans took the floor he might have been expected to reply to the vigorous speeches by Mrs de Meester and Mr Tobback on Zairian policy and more especially on military cooperation with Kinshasa. (Moreover, on the eve of the Belgian parliamentary debate the Zairian agency AZAP had published a communique announcing an increase in French military aid which had been strongly criticized by Mr Mungul Diaka speaking on behalf of Zairian oppositionists in Belgium who are disappointed by "the lack of change" in Paris.)

Mr Tindemans preferred to recall the main principles of the African policy he intends to pursue, opposing the presence of foreign troops on the continent and condemning the extension of East-West divisions to Africa. With regard to the IMF, he said that Belgium advocates flexibility toward Zaire but that it was nonetheless necessary to respect financial orthodoxy.

Mr Tindemans was fairly brief in what he said about Africa and the Third World in general. He spoke much more willingly about a few major issues which are dear to him: The need for a European foreign policy, but also the importance of cooperation with the United States in Both the defense and economic spheres. "Belgium will not overcome the crisis without Europe but Europe will not overcome it without the United States," he said, expressing the hope that contacts between the United States and the European Ten might be institutionalized.

After mentioning the danger which the Soviet SS-20 missiles represent and NATO's inferiority at that level, he recalled that, in view of the decision taken 12 December 1979, the government must make an initial evaluation of the situation at the end of June 1982. It is not unthinkable that a decision might be taken at that time, he said; the small countries must shoulder their responsibilities within the alliance on pain of being pushed out of the decisionmaking centers. Mr Tindemans expressed regret at Lord Carrington's departure and also recalled the support which Europe is giving Britain in the Falkland affair.

PORTUGAL'S PRIME MINISTER ARRIVES FOR 3-DAY VISIT

LD041016 Hamburg DPA in German 0948 GMT 4 May 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 4 May (DPA) -- Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Pinto Balsemao was received with military honors in Bonn today. He is on a 3-day visit to the Federal Republic. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt welcomed the guest; they then began an exchange of views on European and international questions. At the forefront of the talks are efforts to speed up Portugal's entry in the European Community.

Talks Begin

LD042032 Hamburg DPA in German 1502 GMT 4 May 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 4 May (DAP) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Pinto Balsemao began the Portuguese visitor's 3 days of talks with a 4-hour meeting in Bonn today. They discussed Portugal's entry into the EEC. Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and his Portuguese counterpart, Andre Goncalves Pereira, took part in the talk in the federal chancellor's office. Pinto Balsemao supported the chancellor's view on the alliance. The chancellor stressed "the cohesion of the Western alliance including its solidarity with the United States." He also emphasized the "maintenance and strengthening of Western defensive capability vis-a-vis the Warsaw Pact." The third basic proposition the chancellor put forward was "the capacity on this basis for frank dialogue, negotiations, agreements and a treaty with the East" in the arms control field.

ITALIAN PRIME MINISTER ARRIVING ON 7 MAY

LD042040 Hamburg DPA in German 1529 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Bonn, 4 May (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has invited Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini to Hamburg on 7 May for political talks. The two foreign ministers, Emilio Colombo and Hans-Dietrich Genscher, will attend the meeting, one in a series of periodic German-Italian Government consultations. The two allies' political exchanges and close coordination prior to the major upcoming NATO and EEC conferences will start on Friday. The Falklands conflict and its consequences are likely to be a major topic.

Schmidt and Spadolini will hold a press conference in Hamburg on Friday afternoon. Spadolini will fly to Berlin on Saturday for a brief visit.

SAUDI ARABIA HAS NOT APPLIED FOR LEOPARD TANKS

LD041218 Hamburg DPA in German 1029 GMT 4 May 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 4 May (DPA) -- The Federal Government has as yet no formal applications from armaments firms for the export of tanks to Saudi Arabia. This was stated by an Economics Ministry spokesman today in Bonn -- 1 day after the publication of Bonn's new arms export guidelines. The Saudi Arabian charge d'affaires in Bonn, Yusuf al-Mutabikani told DPA that his country's embassy is not concerned with this matter.

Over 1 year ago Saudi Arabia said it wanted the delivery of German 'Leopard' tanks. During his visit to Riyadh in April 1981 Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt kept open an answer with reference to the reformulation of arms export policy. Government circles in Bonn felt on Tuesday that the new guidelines do not make individual decisions which are necessary in each case any easier.

Apart from Saudi Arabia, last year Malaysia also expressed interest in German tanks. In addition the government already has definite applications from German delivery firms. Bonn has so far never sanctioned deliveries of tanks to countries outside the Western world.

GOVERNMENT EXPRESSES 'SORROW' OVER BELGRANO

LD041454 Hamburg DPA in German 1246 GMT 4 May 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 4 May (DPA) -- The Federal Government has urgently appealed to both sides in the British-Argentine conflict for a cease-fire in order to prevent further loss of human life. Deputy Government Spokesman Lothar Ruehl stressed in a Federal Government statement this evening that the government notes with consternation reports of the sinking of the Argentinian cruiser General Belgrano with apparently heavy loss of life.

"The Federal Government feels that this incident confirms its deep concern," Ruehl said. It reiterates its appeal to the parties in the conflict to use all possibilities for a peaceful solution. This applies to both the efforts of the American and Peruvian Governments and of the UN secretary general. The Bonn statement says that "In order to facilitate these efforts and to avoid further loss of life, a cease-fire ought to be in the interests of both sides."

Following the sinking of the Argentine cruiser, the SPD Lower House Parliamentary Group expressed its "sorrow at the death of these people" and urged that the war be settled peacefully. Deputy SPD Parliamentary Group Chairman Horst Ehmke posed the question in a DPA interview of whether the risks of the conflict and its victims still bear a relation to the aim. The impression was "that the two sides are losing control of the affair."

The Bonn government spokesman said that the escalation shows how urgently needed success in the American mediation efforts to find a peaceful solution had been. He recalled that Helmut Schmidt's government has backed these efforts from the start and stated, "The Federal Government only regrets that this was not achieved."

Competent circles in Bonn underlined that German solidarity with Great Britain is "not in question." This solidarity requires close examination of all events discussed within the framework of the permanent exchange of views with London. For Bonn, loss of human life is a "very important element."

Bruno Friedrich (SPD) vice president of the European Parliament, said in a radio interview (Saarbruecken) that it is inconceivable for Europe to enter into a lasting conflict with South America over the Falklands crisis. The EC's further solidarity with London demands that Great Britain orient its policy to international law. The European politician described British diplomacy as rigid and urged that London apply only appropriate means against Argentina.

Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt appeared "very dismayed" today at the tragic developments in the Falklands conflict. The federal chancellor was speaking at a news conference with Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Pinto Balsemao in the federal chancellor's office. Schmidt announced that there would be a fuller statement from the Federal Government this evening, because there is still not sufficient information at present.

Like the SPD, the Free Democrats have also expressed great sorrow at the death of hundreds of seamen following the sinking of the Argentine cruiser. FDP Spokesman Herbert Schmuelling said that the FDP hopes every effort will be made to obtain an immediate cease-fire in order to prevent the sacrifice of even more human lives. The Free Democrats backed the federal chancellor's and foreign minister's efforts to influence those involved in the conflict in this spirit.

BOELLING MEETS WITH STOPH; DEPARTS BERLIN

LD042032 Hamburg DPA in German 1526 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Berlin, 4 May (DPA) -- State Secretary Klaus Boelling paid a farewell call on GDR Premier Willi Stoph today and told him the Federal Republic is interested in a gradual improvement of bilateral relations. According to a release by the Permanent Mission, he told Stoph the Federal Government seeks, even in difficult phases of international politics, to gradually implement, for the benefit of the people in the GDR and FRG, what was proposed at the meeting of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and State Council Chairman Erich Honecker at Lake Webellinsee.

This morning Boelling paid his farewell call on Soviet Ambassador to the GDR Petr Abrasimov.

IRANIAN ENVOY'S REMARKS ON CLASHES CRITICIZED

LD041308 Hamburg DPA in German 1134 GMT 4 May 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 4 May (DPA) -- The Foreign Ministry has reacted sharply to the accusations made by the Iranian ambassador to Bonn in connection with the bloody clashes between Iranians in Mainz. A spokesman said today that Ambassador Mehdi Navab was called to the Foreign Office on Monday. He was told of the "displeasure" at his "sweeping and unjustified charges against German authorities," and his accusations were rejected. Navab had maintained to journalists that the German authorities had sided with Khomeyni opponents during the clashes between Iranians.

It was futher stated that the Foreign Ministry again expressed the Federal Government's concern at the increasing (?acts of violence) between Iranians on German soil. Action would be taken in accordance with current law against criminal offenses without respect of those involved and without regard to their membership in one group or another.

TWO BUNDESWEHR EMPLOYEES ARRESTED AS SPIES

LD031406 Hamburg DPA in German 1330 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] Traunstein, 3 May (DPA) -- A married couple from Traunstein, said to be a 41-year-old civilian employee of the Bundeswehr and his 45-year-old wife, have been taken into custody on grave suspicion of intelligence activity. The Federal Prosecutor's Office in Karlsruhe, which has taken up the investigation, gave no information today on the extent to which secrets had been betrayed.

In Traunstein it was learned that the 41-year-old former regular soldier had been employed for several years as an employee at the Prinz-Eugen Barracks in the communications field. His wife had taken up a similar post with the Bundeswehr a year ago in Bad Aibling. They were taken into custody directly from their places of work.

OFFICIAL SUPPORT FOR UK ON FALKLANDS CONTINUES

NC041327 Paris AFP in English 1317 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Paris, 4 May (AFP) -- The French Government expressed "consternation" today over the sinking of the Argentine cruiser General Belgrano, but quickly added that its concern did not reflect a change in French support for Britain in the Falklands dispute. A French Foreign Ministry spokesman said the "consternation" expressed was merely over the possibility that lives had been lost after a British submarine sank the General Belgrano.

The French statement came as Argentina announced that 400 crew members had been rescued in the area where the ship went down.

Mitterrand Breaks Silence

LD042342 Paris Domestic Service in French 2300 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Francois Mitterrand, who is visiting the Limousin Department, has spoken for the first time about the Falklands conflict, reserving the possibility of intervening with others, on condition that there is a chance of influencing events.

Without denying Argentina's claims on the archipelago, the president of the republic criticized the methods used by Buenos Aires, which he says are contrary to international law.

Cabinet Urges End to Fighting

NC051204 Paris AFP in English 1158 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] Paris, 5 May (AFP) -- The French cabinet called today on Britain and Argentina to end their fighting in the South Atlantic and for "disengagement" of the two countries' forces.

At a regular weekly cabinet session chaired by President Francois Mitterrand, the French Government "deplored the death of hundreds of combatants" and called for strict application of the Security Council Resolution 502 on the Falklands Islands.

The French statement said: "The cabinet has been informed of developments that brought the invasion of the Falkland Islands to a veritable war between Britain and Argentina. The Cabinet deplores the deaths of hundreds of combatants, and believes it imperative to return to a strict application of the Security Council Resolution 502, with the immediate halt of hostilities and the separation of the forces in presence," the statement said.

"The French Government hopes that the secretary general of the United Nations will quickly show the way that will permit the resumption of peaceful negotiations following a halt in the fighting," the statement said. "The government remains in close liaison with its partners in the European Community."

RODRIGUEZ TALKS WITH MARCHAIS, FITERMAN

FL050030 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 0000 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] Carlos Rafael Rodriguez, vice president of Cuba's Council of State today met in Paris with Georges Marchais, secretary general of the French Communist Party [PFC] and Charles Fiterman, minister of state for transportation and member of the PFC.

Rodriguez, who is on a 3-day official visit in France, will meet tomorrow with Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy in the course of an official luncheon and will later hold talks with the secretary general of the French Socialist Party, Lionel Jospin.

Now that the second day of Rodriguez' visit is almost over, observers agree that the main subjects of French-Cuban talks are the conflict over the Falklands and the Central American status quo.

PS GROUP CHAIRMAN DENIES CRITICIZING MAUROY

PM031441 [Editorial Report] Paris LE FIGARO magazine in French 24-29 April 1982 carries on pages 128-131 a 2,000-word Christine Clerc interview with PS National Assembly Group Chairman Pierre Joxe on 15 April. Joxe discusses the government's progress to date, stressing the need to concentrate on the unemployment problem. Questioned by various ministers Joxe replied:

"It is not so much a question of statements. It is more a question of the way the work is organized. Although the president of the republic has to manage his time over a period of several years the government has to place its action within the framework of the parliamentary sessions. Now it has so far held numerous extraordinary sessions without managing to produce the texts at the appropriate time. The deputies will not be able to examine the social bills before the end of April. They should have been adopted by the government in January for work on them to be started from the beginning of the session. There really is delay in getting things started: In November Pierre Mauroy asked Parliament to vote on the so-called enabling law, making it possible for him to decree the 39-hour week and retirement at 60 by statute. The avowed aim was to speed things up. However the last statute has only just appeared. Pierre Mauroy has failed to use the decree method properly." Joxe reportedly went on to say that "the deputies must be better informed."

Paris LE MONDE in French 26 April 1982 carries on page 16 an 800-word Jean-Marie Colombani report on statements made by Pierre Moxe repudiating the interview attributed to him in LE FIGARO magazine: "First I did not grant an interview to Mrs Christine Clerc of LE FIGARO magazine; second, I did meet with her on 15 April but she did not submit to me the text of the remarks which she attributes to me and I cannot therefore authenticate them." Colombani also cites Christine Clerc as saying: "I maintain that the statements published by LE FIGARO magazine were made by Mr Pierre Joxe.... That interview was granted to me on Thursday, 15 April. It was only 1 week later, on Thursday 22 April, that Mr Joxe telephoned me after breakfasting with the president of the republic to ask me not to publish his remarks."

CHRISTIAN DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONGRESS CONTINUES

AU040915 Rome ANSA in English 0850 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Rome, 4 May (ANSA) -- The Christian Democratic National Congress continues today with the party split between two candidates for the post of political secretary, Ciriaco de Mita and Arnaldo Forlani. The forces backing one or the other appear to be more or less equal with a mass of undecided delegates who might prove crucial in making the ultimate decision on who is to replace outgoing Secretary Flaminio Piccoli who on the opening day of the congress Sunday announced that he would not seek another term. It was not possible to tell from the congress documents so far, what the substantial political differences were between the two candidates, and as yet neither man has taken the floor.

Their respective supporters have circulated a number of "platforms" in the corridors outside the congress hall. Last night a large body of delegates asked that De Mita and Forlani address the congress as soon as possible to make their position perfectly clear. Meanwhile, both camps are seeking to gather the widest possible consensus behind their favorite. De Mita has the backing of the party's historic lifers: Amintore Fanfani, Giulio Andreotti and Flaminio Piccoli, while men like Emilio Colombo, Carlo Donat Cattin and Mariano Rumor are supporting Forlani's candidacy.

Traditional factions within the DC are split between the two candidates in an intricate web of alignments difficult for outsiders to keep track of. All of the political leaders following the session agree that the backdrop to the congress is the relationship the party is to have with the Socialist Party (PCI). Liberal M.P. Aldo Bozzi said that the congress was developing along two different and even opposing lines: The Forlani line which was inspired by the outlook of Alcide de Gasperi who led many centrist coalition governments in the postwar period -- and that of De Mita which harked back to integralism and inclinations towards opening to the Communists.

The choice the congress makes will decide whether Italy's governing class will be solidly anchored to a centrality in which the Socialists and the laic forces are indispensble poles, or inclined towards a new edition of the historic compromise (some form, of national power sharing arrangement between the DC and the Communists), Bozzi claimed.

For their part, the Socialists today said in their paper "AVANTI" that they backed De Mita's candidacy. The daily said that if the DC, or part of it, should push things to the brink of rupture with the PSI and even with the Social Democrats (PSDI), it would mean either a miscalculation of the consequences or plans for a policy of changeover which threatened to end in an electoral challenge. Both the PSI and the PSDI are partners in Giovanni Spadolini's five-way coalition government which also includes the DC, the Liberals and the Republicans.

PSP'S MARIO SOARES URGES EARLY ELECTIONS

[Excerpt] [Portuguese Socialist Party Secretary General] Mario Soares yesterday asserted the need for an early general election as a means of finding a solution to the current government crisis, and charged the Democratic Alliance and the government with inability to exercise power in the country. Speaking at a dinner commemorating 25 April [1974] which brought together several hundred Socialist Party [PS] members and leaders, Soares, after paying tribute to the captains of April and expressing his party's loyalty to the 1974 revolution, said that the Democratic Alliance was embarked on a plan to bipolarize Portuguese society and has helped to promote a revanchism and conservatism out of keeping with the Portugal which emerged from 1974. In the Socialist leader's opinion, the Democratic Alliance's language, pace and image are increasingly identfied with spent ideals of the past, the Social Democratic Center Party's ideological dominance and actual leadership being well-known. According to Soares, the current government beats all records for "unpopularity and incompetence," finding no convinced support, even at the level of the parties supporting it, and it should therefore be replaced as quickly as possible.

Maintaining a keynote of severe criticism of the government, the Socialist leader also asserted that it does not even have the ability to engage in dialogue with the social partners and with the country's social forces and is exacerbating and complicating the nation's problems -- specifically, economic problems. Referring later to the revision of the constitution, he said that the Democratic Alliance is seeking to draw out the proceedings as an excuse to keep Balsemao in power. Stating that the PS does not accept being a prisoner of the revision of the constitution, he said that a deadline must be set for the text of the revision to be submitted to a plenum.

In his speech Soares also strongly criticized the latest economic measures advocated by the government, such as increasing the price of bread; compared the financial situation before and after the Democratic Alliance government took power; expressed his solidarity with the civil service workers; and concluded by asserting that it is necessary to "change policy and the government."

LABOR UNION CALLS GENERAL STRIKE 11 MAY

LD042354 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 4 May 82

[Excerpts] A general meeting of the trade unions affiliated to the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers [CGTP] in Oporto tonight approved the CGTP Secretariat's proposal to call a 24-hour general strike on 11 May in protest at the incidents that took place in Oporto early on May Day. [Begin recording of unnamed CGTP spokesman] The general strike to be staged on 11 May has the following objectives: In defence of democratic liberties against fascist repression; the immediate dismissal of the Democratic Alliance government; the dissolution of the riot police squad; in defence of the April gains; to protest against the rising cost of living; and to demand the implementation with effect from 1 June of the claims approved by the 7 April general meeting of the CGTP-affiliated trade unions. [end recording]

The Oporto meeting also approved a series of protests concerning the May Day incidents, and expressed its support to and solidarity with the families of the victims of the police action. [Begin recording of unnamed CGTP spokesman] The general meeting also endorsed the CGTP Secretariat's decision to seek audiences with the apostolic nuncio and his eminence cardinal patriarch of Lisbon with the aim of furnishing them with a first-hand description of the feelings and living conditions of the Portuguese workers and explaining why the 11 May 24-hour general strike has been called. DEFENSE MINISTER COMMENTS ON NUCLEAR ARMS POLICY

[Einar Solvoll report]

[Text] "Nuclear arms on Norwegian soil during wartime cannot be used without the approval of the Norwegian Government, no matter what people are saying -- including people who have been at the armed forces' college," Defence Minister Anders C. Sjaastad said in reply to a question in the Storting yesterday. Arent M. Henriksen (Socialist Left Party) had asked whether the regulations for the use of nuclear arms on Norwegian soil would be changed.

Minister Sjaastad said that Norwegian nuclear policy is fixed and that there is no intention at present to change it. But because Norwegian nuclear policy has first and foremost been seen as a confidence-building measure, there is every reason to ask whether the Soviet Union has for its part helped to make this confidence two sided. The fact that the Soviet Union has stationed nuclear forces on the Kola Peninsula which could only be used against Norwegian territory does not inspire confidence, he stressed.

The defence minister said that initially NATO would seek to meet an attack with conventional defenses. But a potential attacker must weigh up the possibility of being met with nuclear arms. This strategy also applies to the defense of Norway, Sjaastad said, adding that if Norway is to be able receive and possibly use nuclear warheads in a crisis or war situation, it would be necessary to implement a number of preparatory measures in peacetime. Such preparations would mean that stockpiles of nuclear warheads would have to be made ready.

In response to a direct question on the presence of nuclear arms on ships in Norwegian harbors, Sjaastad replied that the Norwegian authorities have never taken the view that visits by allied or Soviet vessels with nuclear arms on board are a violation of our base policy. However, this would be the case if the vessels were to remain for longer than an ordinary visit.

Sissel Ronbeck (Labor Party) inquired about the study on nuclear-free zones, and the minister announced that it would be published shortly. It will form part of the report on disarmament to the Storting due in May.

Stein Ornhoi (Socialist Left Party) asked if Norwegian officers are trained in the use of nuclear arms, and the defense minister replied that there is no such training. However, it is possible that at various military schools abroad Norwegian officers could be briefed on the procedure for and the effects of the use of nuclear arms.

Conservative Grethe Varno pointed out that the Danes have called the idea of a nuclear-free zone a "dead letter." Even the architects of such a zone have admitted that it would be of little significance in a war. They should say this a little more audibly, so that it can be heard by all local authorities to whom the Socialist Left Party and the leftwing of the Labor Party are at present attempting to sell the idea with golden promises of being able to avoid a nuclear attack, she said.

ULLSTEN 'REGRETS' UK ESCALATION IN FALKLANDS

LD042106 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1600 GMT 4 May 82

[Interview with Swedish Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten in Stockholm on 4 May -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Ola Ullsten, you have said before that the Swedish Government has no objections to Britain's recapturing British territory. Do you adhere to that attitude?

[Answer] I said we have no objection to the way in which they recaptured South Georgia but have always warned against the escalation that may follow if there were an attempt to recapture the Falkland Island by force.

[Question] If we keep to the actual substance, does the Swedish Government believe that Great Britain has every right to resort to military means to recapture the Falkland Islands?

[Answer] Purely formally, Great Britain has that right, but it is not a question of formalities here but a question of human lives. It is our opinion that this escalation which has now taken place through the sinking of the cruiser General Belgrano is very regrettable.

[Question] Where do you draw the line between permitted means and not permitted means to recapture the Falkland Islands?

[Answer] That is a question of political assessment which must be made, and I am afraid that this escalation may hamper the possibilities of finding a political solution. After what has now happened, I believe the United Nations must work more actively for an implementation of the Security Council's demands for a political solution.

[Question] Today several West European governments have protested at what has happened. Are any Swedish protests in the offing?

[Answer] We have not done that in any formal sense, but on behalf of the Swedish Government I deeply regret the escalation that has now taken place.

[Question] In a Riksdag question to you Olof Palme wondered why you rejected a mediation contribution by the United Nations in this conflict. Have you done that?

[Answer] No, that is wrong. I have never rejected mediation help by the United Nations; on the contrary I have called for it. On the other hand, I noted on one occasion that the American mediation attempt was in progress and that at that stage there was maybe not such a big reason for the United Nations mediation; but the United Nations has a constant duty to intervene when there is an obvious threat to peace anywhere in the world.

[Question] But you have said that the United Nations is weak and lacks the authority needed to mediate.

[Answer] No, on the question of the UN role in general I have said that the United Nations is no stronger than its member countries want it to be. Regrettably, often the big countries above all do not want to use the United Nations for mediation tasks of various kinds.

[Question] Today the Falklands crisis was discussed in the Swedish Foreign Ministry. Is it true that you were criticized for previous statements?

[Answer] No, that is not true. We assumed a fairly reasonable attitude in reply to a question when South Georgia was recaptured, to the effect that we had no objections to the method, but we have always warned against an escalation of the conflict. And now escalation is a fact and we deeply regret that.

THATCHER MEETS WITH CABINET, OPPOSITION LEADERS

LD041232 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1112 GMT 4 May 82

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher chaired a 90-minute meeting of the so-called "war cabinet" this morning followed immediately by a meeting of the full cabinet at 10 Downing Street to discuss the latest developments in the Falklands crisis. There is a keen awareness that the situation is rapidly escalating with the sinking of the cruiser General Belgrano and the probable loss of up to 1,000 Argentinian sailors.

It was being stressed in Whitehall however that the 1939-built cruiser did constitute a threat to the British task force and that Argentina -- as well as world and British public opinion -- had ample warning that this kind of action was likely if Argentina's forces came near the British fleet. But no details were being given of how close the stricken ship was to British forces when it was torpedoed.

Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym and Defence Secretary Mr John Nott were each making separate statements in the Commons this afternoon.

Mrs Thatcher today saw Liberal leader Mr David Steel and the SDP Parliamentary leader Dr David Owen in private to brief them on latest developments, though without going into military operational details. Mr Pym was also at the meeting, in the prime minister's room in the Commons.

The meeting follows the prime minister's offer to opposition party leaders of talks on privy council terms, an offer turned down at the weekend by Labour leader Mr Michael Foot, who said he preferred to have open discussions on the crisis in the Commons.

Mr Pym will be reporting to the House -- as he did to the inner cabinet and the full cabinet this morning -- on his latest meetings over the weekend with the U.S. administration in Washington and the United Nations in New York. But although he did come back with "some ideas" there are no firm proposals, and little optimism in Whitehall over any immediate diplomatic moves.

Also in the Commons today Mrs Thatcher is to be asked for details of the inquiry she promised to set up into the crisis. She is likely to repeat that it is the government's intention to hold such an investigation, without going into the details of what form it will take.

She is also to be asked about reports that West Germany has been supplying nuclear weapons "know-how" to Argentina, and is expected to discount them.

DEFENSE SPOKESMAN DISCUSSES BELGRANO ATTACK

LD041300 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1249 GMT 4 May 82

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] Further military action has taken place in the South Atlantic, the Defence Ministry in London disclosed today. Spokesman Ian McDonald had no full details about the incident apart from saying that he had no knowledge of any British casualties.

Defence Secretary Mr John Nott might give details in a Commons statement this afternoon. It is understood, however, that a British submarine was yesterday shadowing the Argentine aircraft carrier "25 of May." The latest incident could refer to a new bombing attack, it is understood.

Mr McDonald was asked about American reports that a British submarine had fired a torpedo at an Argentine vessel but had missed. He replied: "That is not what I was referring to."

Today, he was at pains to explain why the Argentine cruiser General Belgrano was attacked by a British submarine. It was later reported to have sunk. "It was very obvious to everyone, including the Argentinians in the light of the warning and the position they were in, that they were there with hostile intent," he said. "If you waited for a threat to become actual you could be at the bottom of the sea."

The warning he referred to was the defensive "no go" zone declared on April 23 which warned Argentine ships and aircraft that if they came close to British warships or planes they would be treated as hostile and liable to attack. The Belgrano's 15 six-inch guns, with a range of 13 miles, and its British-made Sea Cat missiles posed a major threat to British warships and aircraft -- "That is the reason why we attacked," said Mr McDonald.

But he pledged: "If Argentine ships are engaged in picking up survivors we would not interfere with them."

The ministry also gave a graphic description of the separate action early yesterday between two Argentinian patrol craft and British Lynx helicopters. The patrol craft were described as ocean-going naval auxiliaries and one of them provisionally identified as the Al Ferez Sobral. The spokesman said: "If this is so, she would, according to all the references, be armed with 40mm and 20mm guns.

"One of these vessels fired first on a Sea King which was attempting to locate Argentinian vessels within the total exclusion zone. I am not able to say which of the two vessels fired first or which, in fact, was sunk. Neither am I able to say whether there are any survivors. As I announced to you subsequently, we did drop life-saving equipment close to the damaged vessel. But the night was described as inky black with intermittent rain and strong winds."

He then turned to the action involving the cruiser General Belgrano. "She, for some time, had been in the general area in which she was attacked. She may have been going in and out of the total exclusion zone or perhaps skirting it. She was accompanied by two Argentinian destroyers.

"The cruiser was armed with 15 six-inch guns (with a range of 13 miles) and the short-range Sea Cat missile, which posed a threat to our aircraft engaged in operations in the total exclusion zone. Both destroyers were fitted with Exocet missiles which have a range of over 20 miles. This force, because of its position relative to our task force and its weapon capability overall, posed a major threat to our ships.

"In accordance with the warning given to the Argentine Government on April 23, the cruiser was therefore attacked by an RN vessel. She was hit by two high explosive torpedoes. The capital ship of the group was therefore disabled and the RN vessel, in accordance with normal practice, then withdrew."

The spokesman added: "We have no further direct information about the cruiser or its accompanying two destroyers which, incidentally, were not attacked. The Argentine Government has now announced that the cruiser drifted for some time out of radio contact and has now sunk. We have no reason to disbelieve this account. We have no knowledge of Argentinian casualties.

"The task force is now continuing its patrols both by air and by sea and by night and by day to enforce the total exclusion zone around the Falkland Islands."

Thatcher Defends Sinking

LD041546 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1513 GMT 4 May 82

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Text] The sinking of the Argentinian cruiser, the General Belgrano, was vigorously defended by the prime minister in the Commons today.

She said the cruiser and its two accompanying escort ships had posed a very obvious threat to the British task force. "Had we left it any later it would have been too late, and then I might have had to come to the Commons with the news that some of our ships had been sunk. The worry that I live with hourly is that Argentine forces in attacks both naval and air will get through to our forces," she added at question time.

There was clear aggressive intent by the Argentinian fleet and the government, Mrs Thatcher said. This was clear from the claims that the warship Exeter had been sunk, the carrier Hermes had been damaged and that they had brought down 11 Harriers. This was clear evidence of the Argentine's aggressive intent," she added.

She faced considerable pressure from opposition leader Mr Foot to explain this "major development" as he called it in the British military operations. Mr Foot asked what political control there had been over the attack on the cruiser, which had led to a tragic loss of life.

"What calculations about the minimum use of force entered into these considerations and exactly what are the next steps which are going to be taken by the government to try to deal with this situation?" he asked. "There is always the danger that such an event as the sinking of the ship can recur, and some of our servicemen can be in danger," he added.

Mrs Thatcher said Britain had to protect the lives of its own servicemen. Then she stressed: "The task force is clearly and was clearly under political control."

Earlier Mrs Thatcher said: "We all regret the loss of human life in the South Atlantic but our first duty is to protect and minimise the danger to our own forces. She also told MPs that Britain was still hoping for a peaceful solution, but "in the meantime our first duty must be to protect our own boys."

The government had already warned the junta that any approach by their forces which could amount to a threat to interfere with the British forces in the South Atlantic "would bring an appropriate response."

Mr Michael Mates (C Petersfield) said the Commons had agreed to send the task force "and cannot now flinch from the consequences that may occur, however serious they are." Mrs Thatcher replied that the government's first duty was to the British forces. The second was to see minimum force was used.

Challenged by Mr Tam Balyell (Lab West Lothian) as to whether she personally gave the go-ahead for the torpedo attack on the General Belgrano, Mrs Thatcher said: "I can assure you the task force is under full political control."

There were angry shouts from the Labour benches as Sir John Biggs-Davison (C Epping Forest) said Mr Foot should have done his duty to his party, the country and as a privy councillor by joining the other party leaders in crisis talks with Mrs Thatcher.

Mrs Thatcher said it was up to Mr Foot. "I do not quarrel with his decision in anyway at all." But she begged him to have some regard to the practical considerations which affected British operations in the South Atlantic.

Mr Foot commented that his attitude had been taken by many opposition leaders in previous times "who have thought it would be failure of their duty to the House of Commons to gag themselves."

AIRCRAFT AGAIN ATTACK PORT STANLEY AIRSTRIP

TA041609 London BBC World Service in English 1600 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Another attack has been carried out today by British aircraft on the Port Stanley airstrip on the Falkland Islands. The news was given by the British defense minister, Mr John Nott. He said the attack was designed to prevent the use of the airstrip by light Argentine aircraft operating within the Falklands. These aircraft were involved in such duties as light supplies, communications and ground attacks. Mr Nott said the airstrip in the Falklands, at Goose Green, was also put out of action.

The previous attack on the Port Stanley airstrip by British aircraft, Mr Nott said, had cratered the airstrip and prevented its use by transport planes from the Argentine mainland.

Mr Nott also disclosed that 3 days ago an Argentine submarine was seen near the British naval task force in the South Atlantic. The submarine was attacked but it is not known if it was hit.

NOTT COMMENTS ON AIR ATTACK, BELGRANO SINKING

LD041642 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1539 GMT 4 May 82

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Text] A further sortie was made today to render the Port Stanley airfield unuseable for light supply, communications and ground attack aircraft operating within the islands, Defence Secretary Mr John Nott disclosed in Commons.

"The other main airfield on East Falkland at Goose Green has also effectively been put out of action," Mr Nott said in his statement to MPs. He also announced that the task force attacked what was believed to be an Argentine submarine on May 1, "which was clearly in a position to torpedo our ships." Mr Nott said: "It is not known if the submarine was hit."

"The prolonged air attack on our ships, the presence of an Argentine submarine close-by, and all other information available to us, left us in no doubt of the dangers to our task force from hostile action," said Mr Nott. Outlining the incident involving the General Belgrano, Mr Nott said the threat to the task force from the cruiser was such "that the task force commander could ignore it only at his peril." The General Belgrano, escorted by two destroyers, was close to the total exclusion zone and was "closing on elements of our task force which was only hours away," he said.

The attack took place "thirty to thirty five miles" outside the exclusion zone, said Mr Nott. The British submarine fired first -- "In this particular case because of the serious threat which this group of Argentinian vessels posed to our task force, our submarine was ordered to fire some torpedoes at the Argentinian cruiser." Mr Nott said: "It must be a matter of deep concern to the House at the loss of life from these engagements, including the sinking of the General Belgrano. But our first duty must be the protection of our own ships and men. There may be further attacks on our forces -- and they must be allowed to act in self defence. We cannot deny them that right." He stressed that the attack by the submarine involved the capital ship only, and not its escorting destroyers, so that they should have been able to go to the assistance of the damaged cruiser. "We do not know whether they did so -- but, in so doing, they would not have been engaged," he said.

Mr Healey said he believed the actions taken had met Mr Nott's objective of using "minimum force under strict political control to achieve a diplomatic solution. It seems to me you have succeeded in achieving this objective, first in the re-occupation of South Georgia, then in the attacks on the airfields."

But he believed the action against the Belgrano was 36 miles outside the exclusion zone. "The loss of life must run into some hundreds," he said. "This is already causing great concern among our friends and allies all over the world." Mr Healey prompted Tory jeers when he asked whether it would have been possible to cripple rather than sink the cruiser. "If the government has pledged itself to the minimum use of force, it must issue instructions which ensure that the minimum of force is used," he said. "I know it is not easy for submarines designed for global war against a great power to exercise minimum force in a police action against a minor power. "Why is it that the PRESS ASSOCIATION reported earlier today that the cruiser Belgrano had fired first, and later withdrew this statement, as not being true?"

(Because of a mis-interpretation of today's Defence Ministry briefing, the PA at first erroneously reported the cruiser as firing first. This report was quickly cancelled by the PA.)

Mr Nott said: "I have not heard of a report by REUTERS or the PA about who fired first. I can tell the House in this particular case, because of the serious threat which this group of Argentine naval vessels posed to our forces, our submarine was ordered to fire some torpedoes at the Argentine cruiser."

The cruiser and the escorting destroyers were "only hours away" from the task force he said: "I cannot give the precise distance to the House because am not prepared to reveal the position of our task force," the defence secretary added to Tory cheers. Only two torpedoes were fired at the cruiser. "It is impossible to say whether that would have crippled the cruiser or not -- that could not have been predicted." Having fired the torpedoes, the submarine "clearly could not have remained" in the area.

Mr Healey said Mr Nott's unwillingness to give further details on the closeness of the cruiser to the task force was "quite inadequate. This action took place nearly two days ago and nobody could assume our task force will still be in that position," he said.

But Mr Nott insisted "it would not be prudent" to say where the task force was. The defence secretary appealed to the media and military experts not to speculate too openly on the range of military options. "It would be of assistance to us if retired service officers and others did not speculate so widely on all the military options open to us," he said.

"It would also naturally be of help to us if the BBC and other television, and the media could have rather fewer programmes of this kind," added Mr Nott. "We are talking about lives, and the lives of our own servicemen. Some of these programmes go rather too far." He told questioners: "We cannot allow Argentine naval and air assets to remain free to attack and sink our ships." Argentina had released false details of the sinking of British ships and other losses with "great pleasure." "If the Red Cross want safe-passage in order to collect Argentine wounded we will make sure they have it," Mr Nott told a Tory MP, who cited the move as a possible course towards a "breakthrough" in the crisis. "If we can recover wounded ourselves we will do so," added Mr Nott. "We will provide them with hospital and medical facilities in our own ships. That would be part of the Royal Navy's normal conduct of affairs. If we are to perform this humane function -- which we will -- we must do so without hazarding our own forces."

PYM SPEAKS TO COMMONS ON DIPLOMATIC EFFORTS

LD041756 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1644 GMT 4 May 82

[Excerpts] In his statement to MPs -- before another by Defence Secretary Mr John Nott -- the foreign secretary, Mr Francis Pym, said the government was "working actively on various ideas" for a diplomatic settlement, including plans put forward by the president of Peru. But he stressed that the Argentine Government would have to comply with the United Nations resolution. "It must not be forgotten that we remain the victims of a totally unprovoked act of aggression in defiance of the United Nations Charter," he said, reporting to the Commons on his weekend talks in Washington and New York. "The military pressure we have exercised has been challenged despite our clear warnings and our desire to use the minimum force," he said. "Our response in the circumstances was as inevitable as it was right. But I can assure MPs that what we are seeking is not the military humiliation of Argentina, but a victory for the rule of law in international affairs."

And of his meeting with the UN secretary general, Mr Pym said they had both recognised that solution would require not only the right ideas but the right timing and the right sequence of events. "I know that the secretary general is in touch with the Argentine Government. The burden of compliance with what has already been decided of course rests squarely with them."

Mr Pym added: "We are seeking to ensure that Argentina does not profit from aggression, and to uphold the rule of law in international affairs. This is an interest which all members of the United Nations must share. Our resolve should not be doubted. Nor should our readiness to talk and our will for peace."

Shadow Foreign Secretary Mr Denis Healey said there was opposition concern and among many of our allies that certain types of military action -- of which the attack on the General Belgrano might be one -- might weaken or even destroy the possibility of negotiations for a long-term solution. Mr Healey said that the operations of the last few days had lost Britain a "great deal of support" among her European allies.

Mr Pym said Mr Healey was being "less than fair" in suggesting that what he was doing was anything other than "everything I possibly can to bring a negotiated settlement to this dispute as soon as possible -- the sooner the better." But he added: "I don't know yet whether that can be achieved."

Although the Americans' original proposals had been rejected by Argentina there were moves to put forward a new series of proposals, said Mr Pym, and he would be taking part in this. The new proposals were different in character but covered a similar area, including the withdrawal of Argentinian troops from the Falklands. Whatever the talks, he said, they must cover that area.

Mr Pym told MPs: "The action which has been taken so far is wholly in accordance with the principles we outlined in advance and the warning which we gave in advance."

Pressed by Dame Judith Hart, the Labour Party chairman, to secure a truce pending UN talks, Mr Pym said: "There could be a truce. But the Argentines must withdraw, and there must be no prejudice to the ultimate outcome of negotiations in the long term."

Mr Pym said the Peruvian moves had been communicated to the Americans, but the Argentinians had rejected them. He added: "I am going to communicate some ideas of my own which may perhaps lead to a basis -- I will do everything I can." Mr Pym said the government was willing to move towards the evacuation of the islanders, and he referred to the Red Cross as a possible agent in an evacuation, but he added: "It is a difficult thing to arrange."

POSSIBILITY OF FALKLANDS LANDING CONSIDERED

[By Tom McMullen, PA political staff]

[Text] Tory MPS are now convinced the government is seriously considering a landing on the Falkland Islands within the next few days. It was noted that none of today's Commons statements by the prime minister, foreign secretary or defence secretary ruled out this possibility. Mr Nott, specifically, said ministers could not discuss in public the options open to the task force when the proposal for the landing was put to them. MPs feel that ministers are now acting against a tight timetable.

The government would be seriously embarrassed if EEC sanctions were not renewed or if the Community was obviously split in its attitudes to the Falklands. Since the General Belgrano was sunk outside Britain's naval exclusion zone, there is a fear that international support for Britain could start to decline.

Common Market countries will have to renew their sanctions -- fixed for a month -- within the next two weeks. A few Community countries are now hinting that sanctions were introduced in support of Britain to avoid the need for military confrontation.

But, according to some Tories, Britain needs to strengthen her position quickly in order to induce Argentina to negotiate. Occupation of part of the Falklands would be one such move. Ministers and officials are now studying carefully the international reaction to the sinking of the General Belgrano. This has been the most dramatic event of the conflict so far and some MPs are anxious about the outcome. Some Tories anxiously comment that the very success of the task force could weaken Britain's international position. Argentina was widely condemned for its initial invasion. But since Argentina is not a major military power, the greater fire-power of Britain's task force could lead Britain to be classed as a bully.

It is believed that Peru and the secretary general of the United Nations, Mr Javier Perez de Cuellar, are now seeking to establish a framework which would enable serious negotiations between Britain and Argentina to start.

Mr Pym almost agreed that the secretary general was now acting as mediator. It was also noted that Mr Pym was ready to offer a truce if Britain's conditions for negotiations, in particular the Argentine withdrawal from the Falklands, were met but the foreign secretary carefully did not build up any hopes that significant progress was in prospect as the result of his weekend visit to New York. He did, however, deny any suggestion that his visit to the United Nations was intended to appease public opinion at home. He did point out that a number of countries were now seeking to help in an attempt to enable negotiations to begin.

ARGENTINES HIT SHEFFIELD; GOVERNMENT 'STUNNED'

LD042032 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2028 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] The British destroyer HMS Sheffield was attacked and hit by an Argentine missile late this afternoon, the Ministry of Defence said tonight. Ministry spokesman Mr Ian McDonald said: "The ship caught fire which spread out of control. When there was no longer any hope of saving the ship the ship's company abandoned the ship. All who abandoned were picked up. It is feared there have been a number of casualties."

He said the attack came whilst the Sheffield was patrolling the total exclusion zone around the Falkland Islands. It is understood the Sheffield normally carries a crew of 299 men. It is believed the Sheffield, a 3,500-ton Type 42 destroyer, was the first surface ship commanded by Admiral Sandy Woodward, the task force commander.

It was understood the ship was hit by an Exocet missile fired by an Argentine French-built Super Etendard fighter bomber from a land base. Two missiles were fired at a range of more than 20 miles -- one missed but the other was a direct hit on Sheffield's control room, sources said tonight. No further details will be released until next of kin have been informed. Mr McDonald also announced that a Royal Navy Sea Harrier had been shot down in an air attack on Port Stanley and the pilot killed.

Earlier today RAF Vulcan bombers armed with thousand pound high-explosive bombs mounted another attack on Port Stanley Airfield which was "successful and the aircraft involved returned safely," to Ascension Island.

"In the course of Sea Harrier attacks one of our aircraft was shot down," said Mr McDonald. "The pilot has been killed. His name will be announced after we have confirmation that his next of kin has been informed."

"All the other Sea Harriers returned safely," said Mr McDonald. "The task force is continuing with its operations as planned. A statement will be made in the House of Commons tomorrow when further details are known."

The weapon which sank Sheffield is a French-designed, sea-skimming missile with a high explosive warhead. In the last 10 kilometers of its flight, the Exocet's own radar homing head takes control and guides it on to the target. Shipborne versions of this missile are carried by both the British and Argentine Navies.

The inner "war cabinet" met in Mrs Thatcher's room at the Commons tonight and discussed the next moves following the loss of the Sheffield and the Sea Harrier. A statement will be made in the House and the speculation is it may come tonight.

Today's attack by an anti-ship missile reinforces the power of these 10,000 pound weapons. This is the first time an Exocet has been fired in anger and sunk a ship.

Opposition leader Mr Michael Foot described tonight's news as "grave and tragic." He has asked the government for a full statement in the Commons tomorrow. Mr Foot took the view that the situation is still "extremely confused." In the circumstances he felt the statement should be delayed until tomorrow.

Navy chiefs were reported "totally stunned" by the news of the attack, which occurred at 4.30 London time. "They just can't believe it," said one official. The land-based fighter was one of five operated by the Argentine Air Force. They had ordered 14, but the remainder have been held in France because of the arms embargo, following the Argentine invasion of the Falklands.

Ministers and MPs at Westminster were stunned tonight by the news that the Sheffield had been sunk. A senior minister much concerned with the crisis said: "It is a great shock.... A very bad thing indeed."

Labour shadow ministers sought a statement in the Commons as soon as the news was announced. Government ministers said, however, Defence Secretary Mr John Nott, in a statement from his department, had given all the information available so far. It was hoped that when he made his statement to the Commons tomorrow more information would be available.

Some Labor MPs who had been critical of the decision to send the task force asked tonight: "Is sanity now going to prevail?" Ministers said it was too early to say how the sinking of the destroyer would affect developments in the crisis. Each side had now suffered casualties. It was claimed that Argentina had now been extremely intransigent. This incident could make the Argentines even more so.

Some Tories were afraid that the Argentine strategy was to inflict casualties on the British fleet in the hope of influencing British public opinion. It was pointed out tonight that the Argentine record on human rights does not make the junta as sensitive to public opinion as is the British Government. Ministers said it was possible that the sinking of the Sheffield could affect Britain's approach to the crisis. But they were not prepared to discuss how this might happen.

Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym tonight sent what were called "constructive suggestions" to the United States as a development of proposals for ending the dispute. Mr Pym also received tonight proposals from UN secretary general, Mr Javier Perez de Cuellar. Similar proposals are understood to have been sent to Argentina. In London, the UN proposals were described as "not very specific." Mr Pym is expected to send his response to the United Nations tomorrow.

Nott To Make Brief Statement

LD042142 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2132 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] The Commons erupted in anger tonight as MPs protested that a government statement on the loss of the destroyer Sheffield would not be made until tomorrow afternoon. Members shouted as Deputy Speaker Mr Bryant Godman Irvine attempted to continue with debate on a Scottish local government bill. Eventually, leader of the Commons Mr John Biffen said Defence Secretary Mr John Nott would make a brief "holding" statement to the House tonight, before a full statement tomorrow.

'30 Sailors May Be Dead'

LD042228 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2219 4 May 82

[Text] As many as 30 sailors may be dead and there are expected to be other casualties after the sinking of HMS Sheffield in the South Atlantic, Defence Secretary John Nott told MPs late tonight. In an emergency statement to the Commons following repeated demands for details of the disaster from Labour MPs, Mr Nott said he deeply regretted to inform the House of the sinking of the Sheffield. But he told MP's: "A naval battle has been going on for several days..."

"In the course of its duties within the total exclusion zone around the Falkland Islands, HMS Sheffield was attacked and hit late this afternoon by an Argentine missile," said Mr Nott. "The ship caught fire and spread out of control. The order was then given to abandon ship." "There were accompanying vessels in the immediate area which picked up those who had abandoned ship."

The defence secretary went on: "Nearly all the ship's company and captain are accounted for, but I regret to say that initial indications are that 12 men are missing and there are likely to be other casualties." He later amended the figure to 30, after saying he had received fresh information.

MPs were quiet and grim-faced, as Mr Nott, with the prime minister sitting at his side, said communications were difficult. "This information must be treated as provisional until further reports are received," he said. "Next of kin will of course be informed first when the details are received."

Mr Nott then announced to MPs that in the course of further air operations, one Harrier had been brought down and the pilot killed. His name would be announced after the next of kin had been informed.

"All the other Sea Harriers have returned safely," Mr Nott said. This assurance came against a background of reports from Buenos Aires that two British planes had been destroyed. He said: "The task force is continuing with its operations as planned."

Opposition leader Mr Foot welcomed the statement. But he said: "It is grave and tragic news." "All of use deeply deplore the fact that you should have had to come here and say it," Mr Foot told him.

"For the House to make the right judgment about this matter, it is better we should have a statement made tomorrow," he added. Mr Foot said he did not seek "in any sense at all in what could be a tragedy for some of our people," to make any political comments.

There was uproar as Mr John Wells, Conservative MP for Maidstone, said opposition leader Mr Foot was "a prize hypocrite." He withdrew the remark after protests from the deputy speaker.

Former Navy Minister Mr Pat Duffy (Lab Sheffield Attercliffe) said the city of Sheffield took a deep pride in this "fine ship," the leading ship of the Type 42 class.

Mr Nott intervened to say that his earlier statement that 12 men were missing was now incorrect. "I did say that initial indications are that 12 men are missing. I regret to say that the latest news is rather worse. The number of deaths may be as high as 30. We don't have sufficient information at this stage to give firm news to the House. That is why I think it is better to wait until tomorrow."

Mr John Stokes (C Halesowen and Stourbridge) said MP's reaction to the sinking of the Sheffield tonight showed signs of panic, but it should not affect the government's determination to make sure the task force carried on with its job.

But Pontypool Labour MP Mr Leo Abse said the government should not risk the lives of more servicemen by sending out extra troops on the QE2. "The government should not compound the initial error which has brought us to this situation," said Mr Abse.

At the end of questions to Mr Nott, opposition MPs protested bitterly when the government initially turned down a request to cut short the Commons business as a mark of respect to the sailors lost in the tragedy. Scottish Secretary Mr George Younger said it would serve no purpose if MPs declined their normal duties "because something like this happened" and men on the task force would not think much of MPs for doing so.

But after senior Tory backbencher Sir John Eden (Bournemouth W) voiced Conservative support for the opposition's suggestion and Labour's Mr Willi Hamilton (Fife Central) said MPs should following the mining tradition of suspending a pit when a miner was killed, the government gave way.

Commons leader Mr John Biffen said: "There are certain occasions when the fewest words are the most eloquent." Tories nodded silent approval to the motion to end the sitting and MPs went home after a brief adjournment on a local Welsh topic.

Thatcher 'Grim' Over Incident

LD042356 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2348 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Mrs Thatcher, wearing black as she has been for most public appearances since the crisis began, heard of the sinking of HMS Sheffield while she chaired a meeting of the cabinet's economic committee at the Commons.

Her immediate reaction was "grim and one of deep concern," but suggestions that she was in tears were dismissed by close colleagues. A grim-faced Mrs Margaret Thatcher was driven from the House of Commons to Number 10 Downing Street early today. When she arrived at No 10 she said nothing to cameramen and reporters awaiting her, pausing only briefly to speak to her driver.

ARGENTINA REPORTEDLY SEEKING AID FROM USSR

LD041336 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1329 GMT 4 May 82

[By Don Philpott, PA Agriculture correspondent]

[Text] The Argentine Government is understood to be making urgent representations in Moscow for cash to continue paying its debts in the United States and Euorpe. The Soviet Union is being asked to pay in advance for grain shipments which are being harvested at the moment and will be ready for export in a few weeks time.

Banking sources in Brussels claim that sufficient hard currency will become available in this way to prevent Argentina from defaulting straight away on its debts to Western banks, which cover about 5,000 million pounds in the United States and aobut 2,777 million pounds in the UK.

There's a possibility, however, that Argentina will seek at least part payment of the grain sales in arms from the Soviets, even though that would tighten the cash supply, according to Agra Europe, the EEC intelligence bulletin.

Trade between the two countries has guadrupled since 1979 and three quarters of Argentina's grain exports now go to the USSR. Total annual trade is worth about 1,800 million pounds. Argentina's economy is already in bad shape with inflation running at more than 150 percent and foreign debts totalling more than 16,600 million pounds. About 6,800 million pounds is due to be repaid in the West this year.

CARRIER BULWARK TO SERVE IN FALKLANDS FORCE

PM041155 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 4 May 82 p 32

[Text] The carrier Bulwark, lying at Portsmouth for more than a year waiting to be scrapped, is to be brought back into service to serve as a barracks and airfield for the Falklands garrison expected to be set up once the Argentines withdraw.

Portsmouth dockyard is to make an all-out effort to get the 27,705-ton ship ready for sea in four months. This will mean some 500 men working in three shifts seven days a week.

An inspection of the ship last week by senior naval engineer officers and dockyard officials showed that while the ship's boilers, with one exception, are in good condition, much of her radar and her main gyroscopic compass are useless and will have to be replaced. One boiler was burnt out in a fire at Philadelphia in 1980, but its loss would not materially affect the ship's capabilities.

BBC LOCATES ORIGIN OF ARGENTINE JAMMING BEAMS

[Text] The BBC today said it had located the whereabouts in Argentina of the equipment being used to jam its Spanish language broadcasts to Latin America. It said the jamming, which take the form of a fast and continuous dialling tone, appeared to be operating out of three main Argentine regions: Rosario and Cordoba, two cities west of Buenos Aires, and also from San Salvador de Jujuy, close to the Chile-Bolivian border.

AKEL RENEWS ATTACK ON ATHENS GOVERMENT STAND

NC051058 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 5 May 82 p 3

[From the "Views and Comments" column: "We Must Protect our Sovereignty"]

[Text] Despite the fact that the explosive tension created by the unfortunate meddling by Athens in our domestic affairs is now abating, the monumental question of a point of order as underlined by AKEL, continues to remain unresolved. It must be understood and it must be clearly declared by all, including Greece itself, that the state of Cyprus, as an independent and sovereign entity, as a country with its own government and as a UN member, does not tolerate any interference in its domestic affairs, no matter where this interference may originate. The fact that today Cyprus finds itself in its present tragic position is exclusively the result of foreign interference. We are struggling to bring about a correction of the consequences of this very interference. We do so by citing our inalienable sovereign rights both as a state and as a people who have the right to decide their fate themselves. It is recognition and respect of this very right that we demand when we appeal to the UN and international solidarity.

How can we continue to demand that Turkey end its interference in our domestic affairs when we accord such a right to another country, no matter how friendly it might be, allowing it to meddle in our affairs and regulate our state policy? How can we convince foreign countries to help us restore our sovereign rights when we ourselves deny ourselves these rights and allocate them to others? How can we ourselves avoid undermining international recognition of our government as the legal and only government of Cyprus at a time when through our own actions we relegate it to the level of obeying the instructions of other governments?

Certain political forces here, acting either consciously in order to undermine our entity as a state, or in an opportunist manner in order to glean party benefits, or in order to strike at the democratic AKEL-DIKO cooperation, outbid each other in support of institutionalizing the "right" of Athens to intervene in our domestic affairs. This is not only political shortsightedness; it is, above all else, an act against Cyprus itself. If the Papandreou government truly wants to serve Cyprus and its cause correctly, it must not only refuse any "right" of interference in our political and state affairs but must also clearly declare that it will protect our entity as a state like the apple of its eye, as well as strengthen it by acts. As a first step we expect it to declare its intention, after its recent actions, not to interfere in our domestic affairs. It must also make it clear that in the future it will avoid any such harmful gestures. This will restore the sincere foundation for a close, harmonious cooperation between Nicosia and Athens which we all support and desire.

Kiprianou To Clarify Relations

NC051157 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] The government spokesman stated today that the president of the republic does not intend to get implicated in a discussion that will be harmful to our national issue, but silently and responsibly is continuing his efforts for the full restoration of relations and harmonious cooperation between the Greek and Cyprus Governments for the benefit of the national interest. The spokesman also said that with regard to certain points that indeed may possibly still need some clarification and that have constituted the object of criticism made in good faith, President Kiprianou will clarify these points fully in a speech in Larnaca on Sunday.

The government spokesman concluded: It would be good for all if an end were put to the exploitation of this issue that has arisen, as this only serves the enemies of our national issue.

4 May Dinner

NC042200 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2100 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Greek President Konstandinos Karamanlis and Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu have stressed the great significance of Balkan cooperation and its contribution to world peace as well as the development of friendly relations among all world countries. In the toasts they exchanged at the official dinner Karamanlis gave tonight in honor of Mr Ceausescu, the two leaders praised the friendly relations between Greece and Romania and expressed their conviction and determination to further expand Greek-Romanian cooperation.

Mr Karamanlis attached particular importance to the fact that Greek-Romanian relations and, more generally, the climate prevailing in the Balkans is in obvious opposition to what happens in other areas, which are tormented by indigenous disputes and strong controversies. He also stressed that this effort is weakened by Turkey through its inadmissible behavior toward Greece.

Mr Karamanlis also said the most crucial problem of our times is the limitation of armaments and, through it, the safeguarding of peace. He stressed there must be a controlled balance of forces at the lowest possible level, because only in this way can the mistrust prevailing in international relations and fed by the arms race be dispelled.

Speaking about the Cyprus issue, the president described it as a problem that poisons the atmosphere of our policy and creates dangers for all.

In conclusion Mr Karamanlis said friendship among people needs incessant care and this truth is confirmed by his meeting today with President Ceausescu.

In his reply address the Romanian leader pointed out the joint desire by Romania and Greece for broader cooperation recalled that the trade exchanges between the two countries from 1976 to 1981 increased by about two and a half times. He added: I believe there is room for expansion of this cooperation.

He also said that more than ever before peoples must unite their efforts to stop the aggravation of world tension and continue the policy of detente and peace. President Ceausescu said everything possible should be done to realize a Europe without nuclear weapons and stressed the importance he attaches to Balkan cooperation and the establishment in the area of a zone of peaceful coexistence without nuclear armaments. President Ceausescu further suggested the early convocation of a summit conference by the Balkan states to discuss and decide on practical measures to solve problems and strengthen confidence.

In conclusion the Romanian president expressed once again the conviction that his country's cooperation with Greece will expand in the interest of both peoples as well as of world detente and peace.

Mr Ceausescu held his first round of talks with Mr Karamanlis this afternoon, and tomorrow he will meet with Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou and discuss bilateral issues as well as questions of peace, detente and disarmament. At the same time, Mr Ceausescu will also officially submit his proposals for the convocation of a summit conference by the Balkan countries and of a special conference on the establishment of a nuclear-free zone in the Balkans.

5 May Meetings

NC051217 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu and Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou today had a 3-hour meeting at the political office. The conference started at 1000 and ended at 1300. Taking part were Mrs Elena Ceausescu in her capacity as first deputy prime minister of the Romanian Government, Greek Foreign Minister Yiannis Kharalambopoulos and Romanian Foreign Minister Stefan Andrei and the prime minister's diplomatic adviser, Makhairitsas.

At 1330 Prime Minister and Mrs Papandreou gave an official luncheon in honor of the Romanian presidential couple and members of the Romanian delegation. The luncheon was attended by ministers and officials from both sides.

The Greek-Romanian talks will be resumed at 1800 at the Foreign Ministry with participation of officials from both sides. This morning, prior to his meeting with Prime Minister Papandreou, the Romanian president, accompanied by Mrs Ceausescu, laid a wreath at the Mausoleum of the Unknown Warrior.

TURKISH MISSILES HIT STELLA SOLARIS 29 APR

NC041903 Athens NEWS in English 4 May 82 p 4

[Text] The captain of the Greek cruise ship Stella Solaris reported that two Turkish antiaircraft missiles fell on his ship at 10.07 am on 29 April while the ship was on a scheduled tourist trip from Istanbul to Izmir, the Ministry of Merchant Marine announced yesterday. According to the captain's report the incident occured two miles off the island of Uzun Ada. The two missiles came from training fire by the Turkish artillery, fired against a target towed by airplane. A third missile exploded in the air, two meters above the main deck.

The captain said he had received no warning from Turkish authorities that training shots would be fired in the area. When the ship reached the Izmir port, the captain complained to the company's local agent, and filed a report with the Greek Consulate.

SPOKESMAN EXPLAINS BOYCOTT OF NATO EXERCISE

NC032139 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2100 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] The government spokesman in Athens has stated that Greece's decision not to participate in the NATO Distant Drum 82 exercise, which began in the southern Mediterranean today, was made after the refusal of the alliance to accept Greece's demand that part of the maneuvers which touch on Greek sovereign rights should not be carried out. The spokesman added that, following this, the part of the maneuvers in the Aegean will be conducted in international waters.

In the meantime, the ATHENS NEWS AGENCY has reported that the Greek Air Force has received orders to reconnoiter and intercept any allied aircraft that enter Greek airspace during the maneuvers. For this purpose, the combat wings and air operations network have been placed on a state of alert.

GOVERNMENT CONTACTING LIBYAN EMBASSY ON COMMENT

NC041909 Athens NEWS in English 4 May 82 p 4

[Text] Press Under Secretary Dhimitrios Maroudhas yesterday said he would contact the Libyan Embassy's press attache for an explanation concerning a press release by the embassy on the postponement of Libyan leader Colonel al-Qadhdhafi's visit to Greece.

The press release, after accusing "certain rightist newspapers, known for their anti-Arab line and their partial attitude in favor of American imperialism, international Zionism, and Arab anachronism" of launching a campaign of "disseminating certain doubts and foolish things, which are totally untrue," said the visit would take place at a date that would serve the two countries' "common national and military objectives."

Government sources, asked by reporters about this last passage, said they too were baffled and could offer no explanation on the possible meaning of "national and military objectives."

BULGARIAN CABINET DEPUTY ARRIVES IN ANKARA

TA041036 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Deputy Chairman of the Bulgarian Council of Ministers Andrey Lukanov has arrived in Ankara on an official visit. At Esenboga Airport he was received by Minister of State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal. In a statement at the airport, Ozal said that Turkey attaches great importance to establishing close relations with its neighbors in accordance with the program being implemented. Ozal recalled that there are neighborly as well as historic ties between the two countries. Noting that the two countries have different systems, Ozal said that economy and trade do not recognize borders and systems. He added that therefore relations between Turkey and Bulgaria should be developed further. Ozal expressed the belief that the meetings held between the heads of state of the two countries in Sofia will open a new period in Turkish-Bulgarian relations.

Lukanov said that Bulgaria aims at further developing the cooperation between the two countries. Noting that Bulgaria desires practical results from cooperation in the fields of agriculture, industry and trade, Lukanov concluded by saying that cooperation in other fields as well will be beneficial for both countries.

The deputy ministers of foreign trade, agriculture and transportation are accompanying Lukanov.

[Text] Turkish-Bulgarian official talks have begun in Ankara. The Turkish delegation is headed by Minister of State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal and the Bulgarian delegation is headed by the Deputy chairman of the Bulgarian Council of Ministers, Andrey Lukanov, who arrived in Ankara this morning.

In a statement at the beginning of the talks, Lukanov expressed the conviction that the work to be conducted within the framework of the talks held in Sofia between the two countries' heads of state will be successful. In turn, Ozal said that the talks will yield beneficial results for both countries in a very short time.

Committees were formed in the fields of agriculture, trade, industry and mines and the meetings continued.

REPRESENTATIONS MADE ON MURDER OF CONSUL

TA051133 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] The Foreign Ministry has announced that representations have been made with the U.S. Government in connection with taking more effective measures to capture the murderer of Turkey's honorary consul to Boston, Orhan Gunduz, and for the protection of Turkish diplomats. A statement issued by the Foreign Ministry recalls that this last attack brings the number of attacks against Turkish diplomats in the United States this year to three, adding: The main thing is to prove to the world that the terrorist activities being carried out in Europe to advertise a so-called cause have spread to the United States as well. Undoubtedly, such inhuman acts, rather than serving a cause, display the disgusting tendencies and cruelty of the perpetrators of these acts and their supporters. It is inevitable for these acts to stain the entire Armenian community. The necessary representations have been made with the United States Government both in Ankara and Washington to ensure that the murderer is captured, put on trial and receives the most severe punishment he deserves. The U.S. authorities were also asked to take the necessary measures to more effectively protect the Turkish missions there.

ECEVIT UNDER INVESTIGATION FOR 'FALSE REPORTS'

NC041246 Paris AFP in English 1225 GMT 4 May 82

[Text] Ankara, 4 May (AFP) -- Former Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit is again under official investigation, this time for "spreading false reports detrimental to the Turkish state" in an interview with a Norwegian newspaper, a legal source said here today.

Conviction would mean a minimum jail term of five years. Mr Ecevit is also accused of violating a National Security Council decree forbidding any political statement that could cause friction.

Mr Ecevit was jailed last April 10 on the latter charge. On April 13 the Ankara military court agreed to free him, but the Ankara state of siege headquarters appealed the decision. As he was being freed on April 13, another arrest warrant was received by the jail authorities. The warrant was motivated by an interview that Mr Ecevit gave to Dutch television.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

NEUTRAL, NONALIGNED STATES WILL MEET BEFORE CSCE

AU041439 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 4 May 82 p 3

[Text] Stockholm/Vienna -- The nine neutral and nonaligned countries at the CSCE have agreed to meet at the beginning of September in Stockholm to work out joint proposals aimed at preventing a new East-West confrontation as very sharply manifested itself in Madrid in spring, and at bringing about success at the second CSCE follow-up meeting. This was announced by the Foreign Ministries in Stockholm and Vienna. On 12 March the Madrid meeting was adjourned to 9 September after 18 months of negotiations.

As announced, the meeting in Stockholm, which originally was thought of as a consultation of the delegation heads of the nine states (Austria, Switzerland, Liechtenstein, San Marino, Sweden, Finland, Yugoslavia, Cyprus and Malta), may be raised to the level of foreign ministers of these countries.

IRISH REPUBLIC

GOVERNMENT TOUGHENS STAND TOWARD UK ON FALKLANDS

LD041318 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1305 GMT 4 May 82

[Excerpt] The Irish Government today formally toughed its attitude towards Britain over the Falkland Islands crisis. A directly worded statement, thought to reflect the growing anxieties of other EEC member states about military developments in the South Atlantic, was issued after a meeting of the republic's cabinet.

The Irish called for an immediate meeting of the United Nations Security Council -- of which they are members -- to discuss the Falklands. They also said Dublin would seek an end to the Common Market's ban on trade with Argentina.

The Dublin statement said the Security Council should prepare a new resolution urging:

-- An immediate cessation of hostilities by both British and Argentinian forces.

-- The negotiation of a diplomatic settlement under the auspices of the United Nations.

The Irish declared: "Our government is appalled at the outbreak of what amounts to open war between Argentina and Great Britain in the South Atlantic, and reports that hundreds of lives have already been lost. They see the present situation as a serious threat to world peace. The concern expressed by the government in a statement on Sunday has now unfortunately been realised. It is imperative that the United Nations becomes involved immediately to secure an end to the present conflict. Accordingly the Irish Government will seek an immediate meeting of the Security Council. The government regards the application of economic sanctions as no longer appropriate and will therefore be seeking the withdrawal of these sanctions by the Community."

It was the Dublin administration's second comment on the Falklands in 48 hours. Ministers also discussed the affair at a weekend session and later appealed for a negotiated way out of the crisis. Today's declaration followed further consideration of the issue and preliminary talks between Premier Mr Charles Haughey, Foreign Minister Mr Gerry Collins and senior Irish Foreign Affairs Department officials. The latest Irish statement, coming after the sinking of Argentina's cruiser General Belgrano, was seen as the most blunt yet from any of Britain's fellow Common Market countries. In Dublin the two-pronged bid for action -- at UN and EEC level -- was seen as a potentially important initiative on the part of the republic. A hint of a possible harder line by Ireland was provided in comments before the cabinet meeting by Defence Minister Mr Paddy Power, who said Britain had now emerged as the aggressors in the South Atlantic.

SPD-FDP SUMMIT TALKS EASE TENSION IN COALITION

LD051932 Hamburg DPA in German 1638 GMT 5 May 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 5 May (DPA) -- In 4 hours of summit talks today the leadership of the Bonn SPD/FDP coalition has apparently partially removed the great tensions and oppositions in the ruling alliance, particularly in economic and tax policy, and have reached agreement on some essential areas of future government policy.

However, Helmut Schmidt (SPD), Vice Chancellor Hans-Dietrich Genscher (FDP) and other leading politicians in the coalition have not yet been able to plot a joint course for the government partners in the argument with the CDU/CSU majority in the Federal Upper House about the financing of the employment program and in the solution of the forthcoming difficult budget negotiation.

On Monday a ministerial discussion group under the leadership of the chancellor will meet to achieve further agreement in order to prepare for the mediation proceedings in the Upper House. According to participants in today's discussions another coalition talk is planned for next week.

FEDERAL CABINET REITERATES POSITION ON POLAND

LD051644 Hamburg DPA in German 1325 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] Bonn, 5 May (DPA) -- Following the recent demonstrations in Polish towns, the Federal Government today again supported the resumption of the dialogue within Poland. In a discussion on the Polish situation the federal cabinet backed the view that the military powers should start a dialogue with the church and the Solidarity trade union. "Otherwise it does not seem possible to achieve a solution to the political and economic problems in Poland," Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling told a federal press conference.

Boelling emphatically stated that the other two basic demands of the Federal Government of 18 December -- the lifting of martial law and the release of the internees -- are still valid. However, it cannot be denied, said Boelling, that there has been "a positive movement" with regard to the release demand.

PORTUGAL'S BALSEMAO CONTINUES OFFICIAL VISIT

LD051944 Hamburg DPA in German 1550 GMT 5 May 82

[Excerpt] Osnabrueck/Bonn, 5 May (DPA) -- Portuguese Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao sees in his country's planned entry into the EEC the chance for Portugal to be integrated into the family of the European democracies. Thus its own democracy could be consolidated and strengthened.

During a visit to Lower Saxony Balsemao also said on Wednesday in Osnabrueck that his country's entry should take place independently of the fact that there have been delays in the negotiations with Spain, "because some specifically Spanish problems could not be solved."

POLITICAL, DIPLOMATIC MANEUVERING CONTINUES

Labor MP's Call For Truce

PM051317 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 5 May 82 p 32

[Text] More than 70 Labour MPs last night signed a Commons motion warning that the conflict in the South Atlantic could escalate further and called for an immediate truce.

The protest against the government's continued use of the naval task force, and implicitly against the official line of the opposition, involved a larger section of the parliamentary party then previous displays of dissent. Just over a fifth of all Labour MPs signed.

Organisers of the campaign within the party for a purely negotiated settlement arrived at Westminster yesterday confident that the sinking of the Argentine cruiser with heavy loss of life would give it an impetus it had previously lacked.

Cease-Fire a Possibility

LD051650 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1625 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] An early cease-fire and prompt withdrawal of Argentine forces are a vital ingredient of new ideas for peace being discussed with the Americans, the foreign secretary, Mr Francis Pym, told the Commons today. In his statement, following one by Defence Secretary Mr John Nott, Mr Pym stressed that the losses on both sides in the Falkland Islands dispute "emphasise all the more the urgent need to find a diplomatic solution."

There were many points of similarity between the thinking of the UN secretary general, Senor Perez de Cuellar, and the points being pursued with the U.S. secretary of state, Mr Alexander Haig. But Mr Pym warned MP's that at the moment the Argentinians were showing very little desire to come to a settlement.

In later exchanges on the activities of the Peruvian Government, Mr Pym said: "There were some proposals which originated in Peru. These have been absorbed in the other negotiations designed and thought up by the United States. I have put a constructive contribution into that. I hope that out of it will come a proposition with some chance of success. I cannot say more than that."

Mr Pym said Mr Haig was in close touch with Peru. "With their contacts with Argentina it may be a good way of negotiating with the Argentines," Mr Pym said.

He told Dr David Owen (SDP Devonport) that the establishment of a United Nations trusteeship council was a possible solution. In his statement Mr Pym said he was working very actively on ideas put to him by Mr Haig "including some advanced by the president of Peru (Senor Fernando Belaunde).

The foreign secretary added that after making a statement to the Commons on Tuesday afternoon he had sent "a constructive contribution" to Mr Haig and would be in touch with him again later today. "A vital ingredient of the ideas on which we are working is an early cease-fire and the prompt withdrawal of Argentine forces. I can assure the House that we are sparing no efforts in the search for an acceptable solution in line with the principles previously underlined by the government."

Mr Pym stressed he was keeping in touch with the UN secretary general whose "helpful ideas seem certain to be reflected in the basis of any solution which we may be able to achieve." He added: "Any obstructionism there may be will not come from our side.

Although it is we who have been the victims of aggression, it is also we who are working tirelessly and constructively for a peaceful solution."

The shadow foreign secretary, Mr Denis Healey, said that if military escalation continued in the way it had over the last few days, more lives could be lost, both Argentine and British, than there were inhabitants in the Falklands Islands. "That underlines the paramount necessity of achieving a diplomatic solution."

Mr Healey asked for confirmation of reports that Mr Haig had asked for a two-day cease-fire. He also urged that the government should be willing to let the UN fill the vacuum in negotations created by the suspension of the Haig peace mission. Mr Pym stressed that he shared the strong desire "to achieve a negotiated settlement if that could be done."

A cease-fire was inevitable in a settlement involving the withdrawal of Argentine forces from the islands. "That is obviously an area which is and always has been part of the discussions."

The UN secretary general had offered his good offices both to the Argentine and to the UK. "I have responded in that sense." But Senor Perez de Cueller had not put forward any definite proposals. They had shared ideas and were keeping in touch.

Mr Pym said the Haig mission had not been suspended but a "new phase" had been started with the Argentine rejection of the secretary of state's proposals. Mr Haig's efforts were "the most hopeful basis for achieving a settlement." Mr Pym said that although he was in close touch with the secretary general, he thought the work he (Mr Pym) was doing with Mr Haig looked more likely to achieve a result. "But no door is closed," Mr Pym added.

Dealing with further points the forign secretary said there did not seem to be any desire -- "at any rate, very little desire" on the other side to come to an agreement. He also commented that the junta was very difficult to negotiate with. "A decision from their foreign secretary can sometimes be overturned in the middle of the night."

Dr Owen urged Mr Pym to give some clear indication of the British Government's long-term position in the crisis and to give a "postive welcome" to the idea of a UN trusteeship council. Mr Pym told him: "The government has an open mind about what must be the ultimate solution.

"A United Nations trusteeship council is most certainly one of the possibilities. It might prove to be a suitable one. It is a concept which is certainly among those which can be considered."

Before the exchanges ended Mr Pym warmly thanked Mr Healey for his expressions of support. "The fact that the House of Commons does speak very broadly with the same desires is nothing but helpful to the operations, both diplomatic and military, we have in hand at the present time," Mr Pym added.

But he rejected a call by Mr Healey to take a new initiative in the United Nations, stressing that the mandatory resolution had not been obeyed. "I am not convinced that another initiative by us in the United Nations would actually help," Mr Pym said. "We have to bear in mind very carefully how it is to our best advantage and to the advantage of securing a peaceful settlement to take a further initiative at the United Nations."

In the questions which had followed the statement, Mr Ian Lloyd (C Havant and Waterloo) asked Mr Pym: "Is it not preferable, sooner rather than later, that we should recognize that the task force will not be able to achieve its objectives, failing a negotiated settlement, unless the Argentinians are not capable of operating missile-carrying aircraft from any runways within striking distance of the carrier fleet?"

Mr Pym replied: "Military considerations and aspects are being thought about in great depth. Possible plans are being prepared. That is entirely right because we have a task force there operating in the South Atlantic," He did not elaborate. But he added: "Let us at the moment concentrate our minds in trying to achieve a peaceful settlement."

Options Considered

LD051846 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1805 GMT 5 May 82

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Military options for Britian's task force in the South Atlantic are now being examined by ministers, Tory MP's were saying today. The sinking of the Sheffield has led ministers and service chiefs to re-examine the risks to the task force -- in particular the aircraft carriers -- according to defence experts at Westminster.

One option was to try to knock out the Argentine submarines. To provide adequate air cover ministers will have considered attacks on the Argentine mainland, it was felt. This would involve attacks on aircraft runways -- and possibly on aircraft -- as Britian could not let its carriers be put to unnecessary risk. Until those risks were eliminated Britain could not easily mount a successful raid on the Falklands -- although this is still considered a strong possibility.

There was intense diplomatic activity while these options were considered. But Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym had a notably guarded word for MP's when he said -- without any British commitment -- that a cease-fire was among the proposals being considered. Any withdrawal by the Argentine forces would inevitably involve a cease-fire, he added.

Mr Pym indicated that he sees the U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig, now in consultation with the Government of Peru, as offering the best hope for a negotiated settlement. Ideas had been received as well from UN Secretary General Mr Javier Perez de Cuellar, setting out a possible framework for negotiations. Mr Pym said he intended replying to these later today.

At Westminster Argentine confidence, earlier felt to be fairly brittle, is now seen to be boosted by the sinking of the Sheffield. And Britain, it is felt, must show herself ready to negotiate if she is not to lose international support.

Ireland, which wants to end the EEC trade sanctions against Argentina, was described at Westminster today as "a typical fair weather but not foul weather friend."

Diplomatic Moves Outlined

LD051854 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1830 GMT 5 May 82

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Text] Britain is unlikely to accede to a cease-fire -- even a temporary one -- in the Falklands Islands dispute without a firm commitment from Argentina to first withdraw her invading forces. This became clear tonight as Whitehall sources were at pains to underline that Britain's resolve to re-capture or regain control of the islands has not diminished in the slightest.

The proposal for a 48-hour cease-fire emerged from a new and intensive flurry of diplomatic activity following the destruction of HMS Sheffield and the earlier sinking of the Argentine cruiser, the General Belgrano. Britian fears that agreeing to a request for a cease-fire while Argentine troops remain on the Falklands will enable the invaders to cement themselves into the islands even more firmly than now.

Diplomatic moves rather than military action dominated today, with proposals emerging from both the United Nations and Peru aimed at ending the conflict without further bloodshed. Britain has already sent a "constructive reply" to U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig about the Peruvian proposals. Mr Haig is acting as the link between London and Lima. But so far no reply has been sent to the United Nations.

An emergency cabinet meeting, summoned a short notice this morning, considered all the military and diplomatic options open. But the insistence by Argentina that the Falklands are already theirs and by Britian that the invaders must withdraw before the talking can be resumed, seems now to have deadlocked direct negotiations. Neither Britain nor Argentina appear willing to budge an inch from their present stance.

Meanwhile, Mr Francis Pym, foreign secretary, used the term "cease-fire" for the first time in any Commons statement so far made by a government minister. He told MP's: "A vital ingredient of the ideas on which we are working is an early cease-fire and the prompt withdrawal of Argentine forces. I can assure the House that we are sparing no efforts in the search for an acceptable solution in line with the principles we have stated on several occasions."

Some observers are reading that statement as a back-track by the government following the loss of the Sheffield. But Whitehall sources denied weakening in the government's resolve and repeated that the invaders must quit as a preconditions to talks.

As the casualty toll mounts, many nations are now pressing for at least a truce. West Germany was among the first to call for cease-fire, appealing last night to both sides "to use every opportunity to reach a peaceful solution." The West German government expressed its "consternation and dismay" at the deaths of Argentine sailors on the torpedoed cruiser, the General Belgrano.

Callaghan Backs Government

LD052214 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2147 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] Former Labour Prime Minister Mr James Callaghan said tonight that Britain must stick to its principles despite the sinking of the Sheffield. In an interview on ITV, Mr Callaghan said: "I do not think the sinking of a ship can alter the fact that we should adhere to the principle that must be kept by the world if there is to be any hope for us at all -- namely that unprovoked aggression cannot be allowed to succeed, within the limits of our strength."

Mr Callaghan went on: "I do not know what limits we will reach, but I know we must go on now." Mr Callaghan also showed symphathy with Mrs Thatcher who was having to make the most difficult decisions "since Suez." "The balances that Mrs Thatcher must weigh are terribly difficult for her and that is why I certainly wouldn't want unduly to criticise her during the midst of these operations."

Mr Callaghan said he feared that support from the international community was draining away for Britain and he called for a tremendous diplomatic effort. "We have got to keep hammering home the lesson that we are the victims of unprovoked aggression and unless that is solved not only will other countries be in trouble but the United Nations itself will be weakened."

UN Proposals Studied

LD060142 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0127 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] Downing Street was non-committal early today (Thursday) over a statement by the UN secretary general that Argentina had accepted his proposals aimed at ending the Falklands crisis. Mr Javier Perez de Cuellar said he was expecting Britian's reaction today and added: "I think there are some reasons for hope."

A Downing Street spokesman confirmed that proposals were being studied. "When Mr Pym was in New York at the weekend he had discussions with the UN secretary general and indeed he did put forward some ideas then which we are considering and which we will be replying to," he said. But he could not say when the British reply would be made.

Britain is unlikely to accede to any cease-fire -- even a temporary one -- without a firm Argentine commitment to first withdraw her forces from the islands. And it was not immediately clear from New York whether the reported Argentine acceptance had any conditions attached. Argentina's foreign minister Mr Costa Mendez was due in New York later today.

Mr de Cuellar declined to go into details of his plan until after Britain had responded, but it is understood to call for a phased withdrawal of forces on both sides. Up until now Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym seemed to place more hope in the combined diplomatic efforts of U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and proposals from the Peruvian president.

He told the Commons last night however that ideas had been received from the UN secretary general and that he intended to reply to them later that night. However by mid-evening no reply had been sent. REUTER reported that Britain's UN delegate Sir Anthony Parsons said Argentina had accepted Mr de Cuellar's "demarche" -- political initiative. It was not the acceptance of a "monumental plan" but a willingness to discuss details, he said.

As hopes of a peaceful settlement rose in line with the flurry of diplomatic activity, the Defence Ministry in London continued to deny persistent reports that the British task force was engaged in a major battle with Argentine forces. "There have been a number of reports of action, but our sources in the task force indicate that there had been no enemy activity in the vicinity of the task force since the attack on HMS Sheffield," said a spokesman.

NOTT TO SEE WEINBERGER BEFORE NATO MEETING

LD051935 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1730 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] Defence Secretary Mr John Nott will meet his American counterpart Mr Caspar Weinberger in Brussels tomorrow for private talks on the Falklands crisis. The meeting will be followed by the regular session of NATO defence ministers, which will be dominated by discussion about the escalating conflict in the South Atlantic. Despite the rising death toll, NATO is still solidly behind Britain, according to Mr Weinberger.

He said in Brussels: "I sense no diminishing of support. There is great regret over the loss of the Sheffield, and regret that we have not yet worked out a formula to end the hostilities." He will be discussing the Falklands with Mr Nott to "see what the requirements are."

Mr Nott is expected to brief his counterparts in the 13-strong NATO military alliance on latest developments. If necessary he will be ready to justify Britain's actions as necessary for the defence of the task force and emphasize the continuing search for a diplomatic settlement.

NATO Condemns Argentina

LD060902 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0820 GMT 6 May 82

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Brussels]

[Text] NATO's European partners today backed Britain by condemning Argentina's invasion of the Falklands and her failure to comply with UN Security Resolution 502, which called for immediate withdrawal. A communique from the defence ministers referred to the importance of not allowing the forced occupation of territory to succeed, but, significantly, there was no call on the UK to withdraw from the area. Neither was there any reference to a cease-fire.

The statement, issued at NATO headquarters in Brussels, came as British Defence Secretary John Nott was holding private talks with his American counterpart Caspar Weinberger on the crisis. They met over breakfast in the Belgian capital and had a "very friendly and cordial discussion," according to Ministry of Defence spokesman Ian McDonald.

He said no requests had been made or offers given and that talks had covered both military and political issues. "There was a satisfactory general discussion including discussions about the kind of help that might be given. Enthusiasm is a good word to use for both sides," said Mr McDonald.

He refused to say what kind of help Mr Nott might have been calling for at this stage, but emphasised that the latest diplomatic moves towards a settlement were in the hands of Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym and his counterpart Alexander Haig.

Today's communique following yesterday's meeting of European NATO defence ministers, contained one brief paragraph referring directly to the Falklands. This stated: "Ministers condemned Argentina's armed invasion of the Falkland Islands and the dependencies as well as her failure to comply with Security Council Resolution No 502. Ministers noted the importance of maintaining the principle that aggression for occupation of territory by force should not be allowed to succeed, and urged the need to seek a negotiated solution acceptable to all parties concerned on the basis of the implementation of Security Council Resolution No 502 in all its parts."

At a press conference later, the Italian chairman of the ministers, Signor Lelio Lagorio, said there had been unanimous agreement at the talks on all aspects of the crisis. The meeting had been a political discussion, and there had been no request from Britain for logistical or other support from her NATO allies.

Asked why the communique did not mention a cease-fire, Signor Lagorio said: "The cease-fire is a technical tool to open negotiations on a peaceful settlement. It is known there is a UN initiative in this respect, and I think we can all hope that within a few hours there will be some reassuring answers on this initiative of the secretary general.

However, asked about Italy's position over support for the UK, he said: "We remain loyal allies and friends of Great Britain, but we should make known that we have old ties, also blood ties with the Argentinian people. We think that negotiations should be active and not indefinite. The fighting in the South Atlantic has been causing human losses, so we believe we must reach a cease-fire soon. In the international sphere we will support any initiative."

Signor Lagorio said he thought a withdrawal from the Falklands and a cease-fire could happen at the same time. No comment has been made so far on the effect that the deploying British forces in the South Atlantic has had on NATO's security role.

Talks were continuing today, with Mr Nott bringing his colleagues up to date with latest developments and emphasising yet again Britain's commitment to a diplomatic solution as a priority.

SOURCES SAY ARGENTINE SUBS IN EXCLUSION ZONE

LD051452 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1435 GMT 5 May 82

[By PA defense correspondent Robert Hutchinson]

[Text] Two modern Argentine submarines are inside the 200-mile exclusion zone around the Falklands it was disclosed by authoritative sources today. The sources named the submarines as the West German-built Salta and San Luis, 1,285 tons, each armed with eight 21 inch torpedo tubes.

The rest of the Argentine fleet is said to be outside the zone and heading for the mainland coast in the wake of the Sheffield attack.

A British assault on the Falklands now depends on total control of the exclusion zone by the Royal Navy battle fleet, said the authoritative sources. Officials said today they could not risk the lives of 4,000 assault troops inside an area where Argentine ships and aircraft could mount devastating attacks.

The presence of the two submarines is apparently causing concern to task force commander Admiral "Sandy" Woodward.

On Saturday, elements of the British fleet picked up a contact and Sea King anti-submarine helicopters dropped depth charges and torpedoes. Yesterday Defence Secretary John Nott said it was not known whether the submarine was hit. Today it seems it was not -- and the two boats continue to pose a potent threat to British vessels.

BBC INFORMS FALKLANDERS OF RECENT EVENTS

LD060414 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0330 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] The Falkland Islanders were told last night of the sinking of HMS Sheffield and the loss of the Sea Harrier, but Foreign Office Minister Mr Cranley Onslow also pointed to the Argentine setbacks. These tragic losses would only strengthen Britain's resolve to secure the islanders' freedom, he said on a BBC World Service broadcast to the Falklands.

He said they may have heard already that British forces coming to their help had suffered their first casualties in action. He said: "The destroyer HMS Sheffield sank with the loss of some of her crew and one Sea Harrier was shot down over the islands.

"I am sure you will realise that these tragic losses will only strengthen our resolve to secure your freedom and the withdrawal of the Argentine forces. Our cause is just, and we shall pursue it.

"Meanwhile, the Argentine junta and people must be feeling even more acutely the dire consequences of their rash adventure. They have lost two patrol boats, various aircraft and the cruiser General Belgrano, happily with less loss of life than was at first feared."

AKEL URGES PAPANDREOU TO CONFIRM NONINTERFERENCE

NC031722 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 3 May 82

[Text] Commenting on yesterday's statement by the Athens government spokesman expressing the Greek Government's satisfaction with President Kiprianou's statement to the ATHENS NEWS AGENCY, an AKEL sopkesman has stated, among other things, that a point of order continues to exist, adding that the least to be expected from the Papandreou government would be a statement clarifying that he does not desire to interfere in the internal affairs of Cyrus.

The AKEL spokesman has said the Cypriot people's biggest conquest is that Cyprus is an independent state and a UN member country with its own entity and government, and those who are dealing a blow to this conquest are also dealing a blow, as the AKEL spokesman put it, to the Cypriot people's liberation cause.

In conclusion, the AKEL spokesman said that alignment with or support for the Cyprus struggle is welcomed from any government and, in particular, from the Greek Government. In no case, however, can this support be taken as the right to interfere in the internal affairs of Cyprus or to give instructions to the Cypriot president and his government.

DENKTAS RAPS KIPRIANOU FOR REMARKS ON FORCES

TA051145 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] President Denktas has said that if the Greek Cypriot leader, Mr Kiprianou, wants peace he should give up the policy of usurpation and aggression. The president was replying to Mr Kiprianou's claims that the presence of a Turkish peace force in Cyprus was contrary to the UN Charter and that it should be withdrawn.

President Denktas stressed that the Turkish Cypriot community, which has gained freedom and security as well as enjoying life without fear, rejected Mr Kiprianou's claims. The president said that it was high time for Mr Kiprianou to understand that by continuing in his present policy and not seeing the realities he was making the solution of the Cyprus problem more difficult.

President Denktas reiterated that the Turkish Cypriot community which the UNFICYP had tried to defend for 11 years had been saved by the Turkish peace force and had begun to live in freedom and security as provided for under the UN Charter.

He called on all countries who favored the equality and freedom of all people to exert pressure on Greece and the Greek Cypriot leader, Mr Kiprianou, to give up their meaningless approach to the Cyprus problem and look for a solution through the Cyprus intercommunal talks.
President Denktas said that there were two equal communities in Cyprus and that, in 1977 he and the late Archbishop Makarios had held a summit meeting as leaders of these two equal communities and agreed upon the establishment of a bizonal federal republic in Cyprus. He pointed out that the two communities were already concentrated in these two zones. He recalled that these two communities had proved that they could agree on a common flag for the federation and similar basic subjects and Mr Kiprianou's efforts to describe Turkey as an invader could not change the realities.

President Denktas also stated that he had written to the UN secretary general complaining of the imprisonment in the south of the captain of a Danish ship and of a West German yachtsman for calling at federated state ports. He said that this Greek Cypriot action was contrary to the six points of the summit agreement between him and Mr Kiprianou, especially at a time when the Cyprus intercommunal talks were continuing in a positive manner.

ROMANIA'S PRESIDENT CONTINUES OFFICIAL VISIT

Papandreou Speaks at Luncheon

NC052040 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] At noon today Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou delivered a very important speech during a luncheon given at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in honor of Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu and those accompanying him. The speech dealt with national questions, Greek-Turkish relations, the situation in the Aegean, relations with the United States, the Cyprus problem and the international situation, with particular reference to the Falkland Islands crisis. The luncheon was attended from the Romanian side, in addition to the Romanian president and his wife, by First Deputy Prime Minister Oprea; Foreign Minister Andrei; Machine-Tool Industry, Electrical Engineering and Electronics Minister Petrescu; and Romanian Ambassador in Athens Brad. Representing Greece at the luncheon were Chamber of Deputies President Alevras; Foreign Minister Yiannis Kharalambopoulos; members of the Council of Ministers; Mr Yeoryios Mavros; bank governors and other officials.

Addressing the Romanian president, Prime Minister Papandreou said: [Begin recording] Mr President, Mrs Ceausescu, Dear Friends: I feel particularly honored and pleased, because I welcome today the president of Romania. Mr Ceausescu is not a statesman who is confined within the dimensions of either the Balkans or Romania. He is a world personality who has identified with the struggle for independence and self-determination of all people; for equality in relations among great and small countries; for the noninterference of any state in the internal affairs of another, and within the framework of the alliance to which he belongs he has shaped a really multidimensional foreign policy, the repercussions of which reach every corner of the earth. Wherever a struggle is being waged for national independence, for self-determination of people, one will find President Ceausescu a supporter. For this reason we are twice pleased, because the government which emerged from the 18 October elections in Greece is a government that also wishes to follow -- and is following -- a fair, multidimensional foreign policy.

We had the opportunity to [words indistinct] the world balance that resulted from the last world war. This balance has become most unstable today. It is no longer right for just one power to shape the policy for social, economic development within an anachronistic framework that has been created since the end of the world war and from the spheres of influence that developed at that time.

It is clear that the European countries -- I am not discriminating between East and West -- are seeking their own road, their own course, determined by the people. This, of course, is probably a distant vision: It is distant because we have returned, unfortunately, to a period of antagonism [anametrisis] and cold war, despite the great dangers that are entailed. It would be a mistake not to recognize the world forces which are struggling for independence and self-determination. The great problem in the relations between North and South is probably something much deeper than the antagonism between East and West. [Words indistinct] major social and economic changes will come out of this antagonism between North and South more than what would positively result from East-West relations. It is certain that small states can only exercise moral influence on the international political stage. But we should not underestimate this contribution.

In this period we are threatened by a crazy race in nuclear armament. There is little concern if one of the superpowers has the possibility to destroy mankind 11 times and the other only 9 times. This is precisely what introduces a paralogism, all these calculations. The strike force of the one or the other have surpassed the limits of human and logical (?dimensions).

Romania, under the inspired and bright leadership of President Ceausescu, is waging the struggle on the frontline for the denuclearization, first of some areas of Europe, and later on a pan-European scale. Indeed, there are 300 SS-20 missiles at the Eastern side.

Would balance be restored if we had 300 Pershing II missiles in Western Europe? Would this escalation be a contribution to detente and peace? The mere fact that Moscow could be hit from Western Europe within 5 to 6 minutes, as compared to the intercontinental missiles that take at least 16 to 17 minutes, alone would constitute a qualitative escalation to which the Soviet Union would definitely respond accordingly. The only logic, the only human appraisal is that an end should be put to the race. And for this reason, regardless of the complicated calculations of the technocrats of war, the political decision of those governments which believe in mankind, in its survival, must be the termination of nuclear armament (?to be followed) by a general course to find balance at much lower levels.

We know that President Ceausescu has offered, and is still offering, much to this struggle. It is also a position within our government's platform to wage of a similar struggle for the denuclearization of the Balkans, and similarly for the restraint of Scandinavia from the nuclear arms race. The contribution of these small countries -- from the North to the South -- in Europe may be decisive in the end and may bring about, at least, some logic in the relations between the superpowers.

I would stop here if I did not feel it my duty to say at the same time that our country, which has also been struggling on the frontline for detente, peace and disarmament, has the said privilege itself to face a danger from the East. Because there is, indeed, a Balkan country, Turkey, which has been claiming national Greek territory. And we have made it clear to the Government of Turkey that we have no hostile intention or any claim on them. On the contrary, we believe that the status quo in the Aegean -- just as it is envisaged by the Helsinki Final Act -- is the definite status and the framework on which we must develop our relations of good neighborliness and friendship. We claim nothing. We are ready to develop neighborly relations, but we do not intend to give up even 1 inch of land, sea or airspace.

Of course, there is another major national issue. It is Cyprus. The stance of the Greek Government toward this enormous issue is summed up as follows: This is not a problem between two communities. There are definitely problems between them, between the Greek Cypriot majority of 80 percent and the Turkish minority of 18 percent. But the great world, international question is the invasion and occupation of an independent country, a UN member. Some time ago Argentina invaded the Falkland Islands, and an enormous issue was created on a worldwide scale. The European Common Market was mobilized. They asked all of us to condemn the invasion, and we did so. But they had forgotten that in 1974 there was an invasion of an independent state called the Republic of Cyprus. And Great Britain, which asked all of us to back it, forgot that, despite the fact that it was a guarantor power, it allowed that brutal aggression, invasion and occupation of Cyprus. Fortunately, there have been voices in the British Parliament which have pointed out this fact. And on this occasion, I would also like to point it out, and to call on Great Britain to fulfill its obligations toward the Republic of Cyprus.

Mr President, forgive me if I have dwelt on questions which are so Hellenic. Of course, the Cyprus problem is neither a Hellenic nor Turkish problem. It is an international problem. Forgive me if I have dwelt on it more than is customary in addresses, but because you are a world personality and because you are interested in substance and not in form, I considered it my duty to say these words.

I want to assure you that you have all the Greek people's wishes with you in your great effort for peace and justice. Please accept my warmest thanks for your presence and for that of your wife, Mrs Ceausescu. [applause] [end recording]

Ceausescu Replies

NC052147 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2100 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] In his reply to Prime Minister Papandreou's address, Romanian President Ceausescu expressed satisfaction with his Athens meetings and hailed the government's choice to follow the course of socialism.

We pray, he said, for the success of this effort. Mr Ceausescu stressed the will of the two countries to develop their cooperation in the economic, scientific and technical fields and pointed out their very good relations in the last 10 years.

Then the Romanian president referred to the need for cooperation among people so that the great problems threatening world peace may be faced. He particularly stressed the danger to Europe from the existence of nuclear arms and said that disarmament should be sought; the [words indistinct] of nuclear missiles and the ones already existing be removed. He added: The European countries must work for their unity and development. A nuclear-free zone, he said, must be established in the Balkans, and the countries in the region must resolve the problems between them. In conclusion, Mr Ceausescu wished the government success in carrying out its program.

Disagreement on Cyprus

NC051354 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 5 May 82 p 1

[Text] Using diplomatic language, Romanian President Ceausescu expressed a double disagreement with the Papandreou policy in his toast during the official dinner given in his honor yesterday by President of the Republic, Konstandinos Karamanlis.

-- On Cyprus: He indirectly, but clearly, placed himself against the internationalization being attempted by the Greek prime minister, referring to the need "for intensification of efforts toward the correct and viable solution of the issue through negotiations" -- in other words through continuation of the intercommunal talks.

-- On European nuclear disarmament: "Romania is struggling with determination for prevention of the installation of medium-range missiles "(Pershing and cruise)" as well as "for withdrawal of existing ones" (in other words Soviet SS-20). In this way the Romanian president in essence disagrees with the well-known Brezhnev proposal to freeze armaments, a proposal which Papandreou hastened to state he finds positive -- nearly the only one among Western leaders."

In addressing the Romanian president during the dinner Karamanlis on his part referred to the Cyprus issue as a problem "which poisons the atmosphere in our area and which creates dangers for us all." At the same time he denounced the position of Turkey which "with its unacceptable behavior toward Greece weakens these efforts" (for establishment of a climate of peace in the Balkans).

EEC AID TO PAKISTAN IN DOUBT AFTER INCIDENT

PM051107 Paris LE MONDE in French 2-3 May 82 p 4

[Text] On Thursday, 29 April, the European Parliament's Political Commission unanimously adopted a draft resolution asking the Brussels commission "to consider relations between the community and the Pakistani Government" following Pakistan's refusal to receive a delegation from the assembly led by Mr Gerardo Israel (Gaullist, France). That delegation was to visit Afghan refugee camps. In 1981, EEC aid to Pakistan -- financial, technical and food -- amounted to $25 million, and further food aid amounting to some $10-12 million was planned for 1982. Afghan refugees have already received EEC aid amounting to $47 million. While urging the community to show "political realism" in this respect, the Pakistani foreign minister restated that Mr Israel was "unwelcome" because of his membership in the international Israelite alliance and the "strong feelings of the Pakistani people and Afghan refugees with respect to the Israeli question."

Shortly after leaving the meeting with President Mitterrand, Rodriguez told the press that he was very satisfied with his talks with the French president, talks which according to him centered on significant aspects of bilateral relations and the international status quo.

For me it was a great satisfaction to meet with the president of France and I am very happy that this post is occupied by Francois Mitterrand whom I greatly respect and value as a political leader and writer. I am honored to be his personal friend, the Cuban vice president said. The meeting between Rodriguez and the French president lasted 45 minutes.

SALVADORAN REGULAR TROOPS KILLED JOURNALISTS

NC052010 Paris AFP in English 1958 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] The Hague, 5 May (AFP) -- Salvadoran regular troops were responsible for killing four Dutch journalists in El Salvador last March in cold blood, the spokesman for the Dutch Foreign Ministry said today. The spokesman, Jan Willem Bertens, made the statement after a two-day interrogation here of a Salvadoran guerrilla fighter, known as "Martin," said to be one of two survivors of the nine killed -- including the four-man Dutch television crew -- by a Salvadoran Army Patrol in El Salvador on March 17.

Martin, who was identified today by the journalists' West German driver in El Salvador, Armin Wertz, said he was one of four guerrillas travelling with the Dutch reporters and a guide in the countryside when the army patrol fired on the nine. The four-man Dutch television crew were being escorted by the guerrillas to the home of a peasant family for an interview when they were surprised by troops.

The journalists were unarmed. Mr Bertens said the army patrol outnumbered the group in men and arms and could easily have placed them under arrest. The Dutch Government had asked to interrogate the head of the patrol but had received no answer to the request, he said.

CONTROVERSY ARISES OVER UK USE OF AIRPORT

LD060222 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2340 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] Reports by some news media about the use of Porto Santo Airport in the Madeira Archipelago by British military aircraft have given rise to some controversy. Here is a report on the matter by our newsroom in Madeira:

Despite official denials to the effect that Porto Santo Airport has not been used as a staging point by any British military aircraft bound for the Falkland Islands, RDP-Madeira this afternoon managed to talk to the pilot of the bomber plane forced to land yesterday due to mechanical failure. The pilot in question did not disclose his identity nor his destination. He merely said that authorization to land in Porto Santo had been given by the airport. Approached by us, the director of Porto Santo Airport denied that the airstrip had been used by any British military aircraft.

A private source approached by us in Porto Santo, however, confirmed that the airport in effect has been used by the British Air Force. The regional press, too, reports with great detail that a British jet fighter landed in Porto Santo yesterday due to mechanical failure. An official source quoted by Portuguese news agency ANOP has said, for its part, that there have only been two landings by British jet fighters in Porto Santo and that such landings were authorized under international agreements by the regional government because it was a question of an emergency situation. The same source explained that Madeira is in no way connected with the Falklands conflict and that the use of the archipelago's air space by the aircraft in question falls within the normal procedures internationally upheld by any country.

PEREZ-LLORCA COMMENTS ON NUCLEAR ARMS IN SPAIN

LD060404 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 5 May 82

[Dispatch from Washington]

[Text] It is possible that the new Hispano-U.S. agreements will be signed before 21 May when the present extension to treaty expires. At the end of the 2-hour meeting in Washington between Spanish minister of foreign affairs, Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca, and U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig, the Spanish view was that the meeting had been very positive and satisfactory. The view of the U.S. diplomats was one of complete optimism. Ambassador Todman was certain that agreements would be reached before 21 May.

The delicate question of the possibility of installing nuclear arms in Spain, both through entry into NATO and through the agreements with the United States, was clarified by Perez-Llorca in categorical terms:

[Begin recording] Entry into NATO does not introduce any changes into the subject and the treaty with the United States will make things absolutely clear. [end recording]

IRELAND REAFFIRMS BID TO END EEC TRADE BAN

LD061936 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1814 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] Dublin premier, Mr Charles Haughey, tonight reaffirmed his government's aim to end the Common Market ban on trade with Argentina. In the face of British criticism of the Irish move -- agreed after a cabinet meeting on Tuesday in tandem with a bid to get United Nations action over the Falklands crisis -- Mr Haughey signalled his determination to press on with the initiative.

The republic's prime minister said: "The situation has changed radically since we agreed to the economic sanctions. It now seems to us that the sanctions, rather than reinforcing efforts for a diplomatic solution, are in fact complementing military action. Support for that is not acceptable to us as a neutral country. We are satisfied there is a great deal of questioning in the EEC capitals about their respective positions."

Mr Haughey repeated that Dublin would be against unilateral action on the sanctions if the other Common Market states turned down the plan to scrap them. But he also hinted that Ireland could review her attitude if there was still no end to the South Atlantic conflict when the trade ban ended on May 17.

Asked about British reservations over Ireland's intervention, Mr Haughey replied: "Some people in Britain feel we have no right to an opinion of our own. But we have to reassert our neutral status in the world and if we have been given the honour of a seat on the United Nations' Security Council we should not sit there and say or do nothing.

"People should not think we went on the Security Council to be a sleeping partner." Mr Haughey also reported that the Dublin Government was considering a draft resolution for submission to the Security Council.

"It will feature reassertion of United Nations' Resolution 502, a call for a cessation of histilities, also for a withdrawal of the Argentine forces and the setting up of some form of UN presence on the islands."

Denmark Has Misgivings

NC052116 Paris AFP in English 2102 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] Brussels, 5 May (AFP) -- Danish Premier Anker Jorgensen expressed strong misgivings here today about any extension of European Community economic and military sanctions against Argentina, beyond their present mid-May expiration date. Mr Jorgensen told a press conference that Denmark's "participation in the sanctions was not undertaken without reservations -- it was meant to lead to a peaceful settlement, not to war."

Turning to internal community issues, the Danish premier was critical of Britain over its insistence on a linkage of European farm price levels and its own contribution to the community budget. "This linkage is nonsensical," Mr Jorgensen declared. "Because of a single country (Britain), we are asked to accept a solution that is no solution," he added. The nine other countries of the community, he warned, "have been patient, very patient with Britain."

He said that fighting unemployment within the community's area would be a prime concern after Copenhagen takes over the grouping's revolving presidency for six months as of next July 1.

Mr Joregensen is here for talks with the Socialist caucus in the European Parliament in preparation for the Danish presidency.

PAHR COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH CSSR'S CHNOUPEK

AU071136 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 7 May 82 p 2

[Special report by "Smo"]

[Excerpts] Vienna -- Following his first working talk with his CSSR counterpart, Chnoupek, Foreign Minister Pahr on Thursday stressed the "basically very positive attitude" of the CSSR guest toward Austria's wishes.

Economic questions were only briefly touched on in the talks on Thursday, Pahr said, since the ministers concerned will deal with them extensively later this month; but he noticed in this field, too, a "highly positive attitude" by the Czechoslovak side. However, the Austrian foreign minister added, "all these intentions will now first of all have to be implemented."

AU071229 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1020 GMT 7 May 82

[Erich Macho report on the current visit to Vienna of CSSR Foreign Minister Bohuslav Chnoupek]

[Excerpts] There is obviously a political thaw between Vienna and Prague at present, but it remains to be seen whether this thaw actually marks the beginning of a long sunny period. The Austrian side, primarily Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr, is at any rate satisfied with the talks held so far with CSSR Foreign Minister Bohuslav Chnoupek. Pahr declared that there had been positive replies by the CSSR to all Austrian wishes broached at the talks. Pahr named as examples the planned negotiations about the CSSR nuclear powerplants situated close to the Austrian border, the promise of genuine improvements in the border crossing procedure, and the generous consideration the Czech side promised to give to the list of humanitarian cases presented by Pahr.

As far as the two CSSR nuclear powerplants in the vicinity of the border are concerned -- one is located near Brno, the other near Bratislava -- Austria is advocating a kind of nuclear alarm plan providing, among other things, for Austria's being immediately informed in the event of a reactor accident. Here Chnoupek declared that the CSSR Government is ready for talks at cabinet level. This is assessed by the Austrian side as a genuine CSSR concession to Austria. The Prague leadership may have taken this step only after consultation with Moscow, since planning and development of nuclear energy is a supranational matter in the East European countries, and an Austrian-Czechoslovak treaty could thus become a precedent that might indirectly also affect other East European countries which already hve, or plan to have, nuclear powerplants close to their borders. As for the long waiting lines at Austrian-Czechoslovak border checkpoints, Chnoupek announced that a CSSR Government commission is now examining the border crossing procedures practiced at border checkpoints, and that a quicker clearance is to be expected sooner or later.

This afternoon, CSSR Foreign Minister Bohuslav Chnoupek will meet with President Kirchschlaeger. The main topic to be discussed at this meeting will be the visit to Vienna of CSSR state and party Chief Gustav Husak that is planned for this fall or some later date.

PROSECUTOR FEARS TERRORIST ATTACKS AT BONN SUMMIT

DW051932 Hamburg BILD in German 4 May 82 pp 1, 8

[Reporters Michael H. Spreng and Friedemann Weckbach-Mara interview with FRG Federal Prosecutor Kurt Rebmann -- date and place not given]

[Text] BILD: Do you expect a terrorist attack during the NATO summit in Bonn in mid-June?

Rebmann: I am worried that the "Red Army Faction" (RAF) may use the NATO summit to carry out an attack. According to the ideas of the RAF, President Reagan would certainly be the most important target. But the security authorities will do everything possible to protect the President. In Bonn only a suicide command would stand a chance. But this is not the "RAF's" mode of operation.

BILD: And outside of Bonn?

Rebmann: During the NATO summit we must reckon with the terrorists' attempts or attacks on high-ranking U.S. officers or with their carrying out of explosive attempts on U.S. institutions in various cities.

BILD: How strong is the hard core of the leftist terrorists?

Rebmann: My estimate is that those who are ready to commit assassination offenses amount to between 16 and 20 persons at most.

BILD: And the revolutionary cells?

Rebmann: They continue to attract support and are very active. I believe that in the long run the "revolutionary cells" are more dangerous than the "Red Army Faction." They are hard to unmask. They are clever at utilizing alleged or really existing social grievances for acts of violence -- as, for instance, on the occasion of protests against the construction of the west runway [at Frankfurt Airport].

BILD: How dangerous is rightist terrorism in our country today?

Rebmann: Very dangerous. The rightist extremists have access to a large number of weapons and explosives in the Federal Republic and in neighboring countries -- as events in Munich [in October 1980] have shown. This is why we always have to reckon with terrorist attempts from the rightist camp as well. I am particularly worried about the unpredictability of the rightist terrorists.

BILD: Is rightist radicalism becoming more attractive?

Rebmann: Yes, I am afraid so. Unemployment and the fear that foreigners might take away citizens' jobs undoubtedly give impetus to rightist radicalism. Rightist groups already appear in public with antiforeigner slogans.

BILD: Foreigners are demonstrating in our country against nuisances in their homelands and are attacking each other -- like the Iranians in Mainz. Can things go on like this?

Rebmann: No. It threatens our security when groups of foreigners, such as those from Iran, Iraq or Turkey are fighting their disputes on our territory. We must reexamine our right of assembly with a view to being in a position of banning demonstrations of foreigners protesting nuisances in their homelands and triggering the threat of violence in our country. Even liberal Switzerland does not allow such demonstrations.

BILD: One hears little about uncovered espionage incidents. But the exchanged spy Guillaume spoke of a big "mole" in Bonn...

Rebmann: I do not disregard any clues to the effect that the GDR has placed a top agent in the Federal Republic. My estimate is that the number of Eastern spies deployed in the Federal Republic by the "GDR" alone amounts to between 1,500 and 2,000.

SCHMIDT, GENSCHER HOLD TALKS WITH STOESSEL

LD061518 Hamburg DPA in German 1430 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] Bonn, 6 May (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today received the U.S. under secretary of state, Walter Stoessel, for an exchange of views on topical political issues which focused mainly on the crisis in the South Atlantic. According to a spokesman, the exchange of views was followed by a talk with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher at the Foreign Ministry.

Other important topics were the situation in Poland and the forthcoming NATO conferences. Genscher showed particular interest in Stoessel's experiences during his special mission to the Middle East. Genscher will himself travel to Israel on 2 June.

Stoessel arrived in the Federal Republic this morning and tomorrow will take part in a conference of U.S. ambassadors to Eastern Europe in Berlin. Stoessel, who for many years was the U.S. ambassador in Bonn, also visited Federal President Karl Carstens.

BOELLING SAYS GDR LEADERS WANT 'CLOSE CONTACT'

LD061244 Hamburg DPA in German 1134 GMT 6 May 82

[Excerpt] East Berlin, 6 May (DPA) -- Klaus Boelling, the former head of the Federal Republic's Permanent Mission in East Berlin, said today following his farewell visit to Erich Honecker, chairman of the Council of State, that they had had an "immensely business-like talk." Boelling declined to tell newsmen the content of the 1-hour talk because he wanted to brief Chancellor Helmut Schmidt first. He said that the talk had made it clear that the chairman of the Council of State and the GDR leaders want to remain in close contact with the Federal Republic in what is a very difficult overall situation. No one underestimates the problems, but Honecker and Schmidt have the will to achieve what is possible in the present situation between the two German states.

Boelling declined to answer specific questions. With regard to the minimum exchange amount for Western visitors to the GDR, he merely noted in a general statement that the Federal Government wants to deal with all questions in an overall way. He said there would always be "ups and downs" in relations between the Federal Republic and the GDR. The difficult, unfavorable overall climate must not discourage the two states from "tackling what can be done" without getting into contradition with their respective alliances.

Referring to recent "direct contacts" between Schmidt and Honecker, Boelling said that we had not had a "message" to convey during his farewell visit. Asked about a possible date for a Honecker visit to the Federal Republic, Boelling merely mentioned the existing invitation.

Wischnewski Meets With Envoy

LD061348 Hamburg DPA in German 1102 GMT 6 May 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 6 May (DPA) -- Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, minister of state in the federal chancellor's office, and Ewald Moldt, the GDR's permanent representative in Bonn, met in Bonn today to discuss improved conditions for people in relations between the two German states.

After the 1-hour talk, which is the first Wischnewski has had with Moldt since assuming office, a Bonn government spokesman stated that the GDR representative had conveyed East Berlin's replies to a number of individual points dealt with by Minister of Inter-German Relations Egon Franke at the summit meeting held between Helmut Schmidt and SED chief Erich Honecker at Werbellinsee last December. Franke had expounded Bonn's desire for improvements for people, especially for GDR citizens, visiting the Federal Republic. The Bonn government spokesman gave no details of the GDR's replies.

Government Views Talks

[Excerpts] Bonn, 7 May (DPA) -- The most recent German-German talks in Bonn and East Berlin have, in the view of the Federal Government, resulted in "positive starting-points" for continued dialogue on the problems between the two German states. Of course there will still have to be a lot of discussion on some of the difficult issues, and in Bonn nobody is getting "euphoric," Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling told pressmen on Friday. He said, however, that he sees in East Berlin a great interest in "continuing" on the basis of the German-German summit meeting at the Werbellinsee.

The government spokesman declined to give any details of recent talks. All those questions which had been touched upon at the summit meeting between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Honecker were discussed. Boelling did, however, reiterate that the government sees no "linkage," but an "overall connection" between the annulment of the drastic increase in the minimum exchange levy by the GDR and an extension of the interest-free overdraft facility in intra-German trade, which expires at the end of July. At the same time, he stressed that the other side has repeatedly said that it will not allow itself to be put under the pressure of an ultimatum. The Federal Government is not setting any ultimatum, however "there is a date which prevents the deliberations from being prolonged."

MITTERRAND HOLDS HIGH-LEVEL MEETING ON ASIA

PCF DELEGATION REPORTS ON INDOCHINA VISIT

PM061019 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 29 Apr 82

[Francoise Germain-Robin report on PCF Politburo member Paul Laurent 28 April press conference in Paris]

[Text] Last month a PCF delegation visited three countries of what was formerly Indochina: Vietnam, Kampuchea and Laos. PCF Central Committee Secretary and Politburo member Paul Laurent, who led the delegation which was composed of Central Committee member Sylviane Ainardi and Max Zins, told pressmen in Paris yesterday about the lessons learned from this 3-week visit, during which the PCF delegation attended the fifth Vietnamese Communist Party congress.

First Laurent stressed that the delegation was welcomed in each of the three countries by top-level state leaders "with much respect, esteem and friendship," in accordance with "the traditional ties of friendship and fraternity forged by a joint struggle against colonialism." He recalled in this connection that Ho Chi Minh attended the 1920 Tours congress at which the PCF was formed.

"But," he added, "the attention given to our delegation is in proportion to the attention accorded by these three countries to France. They expect much from France and from the change that took place here in May and June 1981."

Laurent returned several times during the press conference to the need and advisability for France to strengthen its cooperation with these three countries, to the positive role that it could play there in favor of regional detente and development. He welcomed the signs of rapprochement observed in recent months with Vietnam, which has received successive visits from one of President Mitterrand's special advisers and a minister of the French state, while the Vietnamese foreign minister has been received in Paris and several accords have been signed. Nevertheless, he added, "We do not overstress these signs of rapprochement, because we believe that we could do much better."

While noting that all three countries visited by the delegation are poor (Laos is one of world's 32 least-advanced countries) he nevertheless stressed their great diversity: "When we French Communists say that one of the characteristics of the contemporary world is the increasing diversity of the socialist countries, I believe that this is a living example of it."

In Vietnam the delegation was able to observe the importance of the legacy left by the war: "It cannot be eliminated in a matter of a few years or even in one or two generations." "Even 6 years after the end of the war, as the Vietnamese leaders did not conceal, the country is having to tackle major economic and social difficulties. Our Vietnamese comrades themselves say that they believed that they could progress quickly and forge ahead, that they had made mistakes." Pointing out that "the Vietnamese people were separated for over a century from the handling of their own affairs and their cadres are having to learn everything," Laurent declared himself convinced that the fifth congress marked "a new departure at a more realistic speed."

With regard to Kampuchea he pointed to "the contrast between one's image of it gained from French newspapers, radio and television and the country's real conditions....People in France are not yet aware that Kampuchea is evidently recovering 3 years after liberation from its executioners.... It seems to us that it is the duty of our people, our country and our state to contribute to the recovery of Kampuchea, a country where French is spoken and where there is a great fondness for France."

Two examples of fields in which French aid could be provided are education, which is carried out in French, and the restoration of the temples of Angkor.

Above all Laurent and the delegation which he led vigorously condemned the outrage of "Pol Pot's presence at the United Nations, where he continues to represent Kampuchea and the tragic misrepresentation of comparing Vietnam's action in Kampuchea with an aggression."

"The idea of a Vietnamese aggression against Kampuchea is false and untenable. The Vietnamese presence is regarded by the population as a guarantee against a return to the massacres." Answering a question in this regard, Laurent expressed his belief that "at the first specific sign of security in Kampuchea there will be at least a partial withdrawal of Vietnamese forces, and a complete withdrawal if this security is guaranteed on the international plane."

BELGIAN CP LEADERS VISIT PARIS; MEET MARCHAIS

PM061153 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 29 Apr 82 p 9

[Text] Belgian Communist Party [PCB] National President Louis van Geyt, accompanied by PCB Central Committee member Augustin Duchateau, had a meeting in Paris yesterday with PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais and Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz. The friendly meeting provided an opportunity for a broad exchange of views on the situation in the two countries and the two parties' activities.

Van Geyt informed his interlocutors about the work and policies of the 24th PCF congress. Marchais stressed the significance of the PCF's action as a party of struggle and government.

The discussions also related to international questions. Recalling their strong opposition to any resumption of the arms race, Marchais and Van Geyt welcomed the scale of the people's movement for peace in Europe. They reaffirmed their desire to work to rally the broadest possible forces in the struggle for disarmament.

CHRISTIAN DEMOCRATS ELECT DE MITA NEW SECRETARY

AU060858 Rome ANSA in English 0853 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] Rome, 6 May (ANSA) -- The Italian Christian Democrat Party's fifteenth national congress last night elected Ciriaco de Mita as its new political secretary. De Mita, who replaced Flaminio Piccoli in the post, was elected with 55.14 percent of the votes. The only other candidate for the job, Arnaldo Forlani, received 42.16 percent. The remaining ballots were blank or void.

Those voting for De Mita (considered the DC's "intellectual") were those in the Andreotti faction, part of the Fanfani faction (those remaining loyal to the senate speaker), part of the Dorotei faction (those aligned with Flaminio Piccoli's position) and the entire Zaccagnini area, which included all of the party's leftwing groups.

Those voting for Forlani were those members of the Dorotei faction that aligned themselves with Toni Bisaglia, the remaining members of the Fanfani faction, Donat Cattin's "new forces" and minor groups such as the friends of Mariano Rumor, friends of Emilio Colombo, "Proposta", etc. De Mita's election at the helm of Italy's largest party was the first result of a change in the DC's physiognomy.

Two powerful factions within the party -- the Dorotei and the Fanfani -- split over the choice of the secretaryship. Three historic leaders of the DC -- Amintore Fanfani, Giulio Andreotti and Flaminio Piccoli -- are forging a new group loosely defined as "a central area", but already dubbed "PAF" by the press, using the last name initials of the three founders. A Forlani area is also forming which should unite all of the party's moderate forces. The Zaccagnini area continues to focalize the leftwing forces within the party. Thus, as the national congress draws to a close today, the DC seems to be divided into three big alignments: "PAF" (central area), the Forlani (moderate) area, and the leftwing Zaccagnini area.

The alliance between the Zaccagnini and central areas, as demonstrated by the De Mita victory, can count on a healthy majority. It is still difficult to make out the new policy lines of this new majority force within the party, however.

Addressing the congress Wednesday, De Mita, 54, like Forlani the day before, reiterated the view that the present five-way government coalition is the only formula possible in Italy. He declared himself opposed to "incomprehensibe" early elections. His policy line was not unlike that of his rival candidate, but the tone used was very different from that of Forlani. Interpreting the mood of most of the congress delegates, De Mita was much harder on the Socialists whose secretary Bettino Craxi has long had his sights on the premiership.

The Socialists (PSI) are currently the DC's most troublesome partner in a government led by Republican Giovanni Spadolini. Minor partners in the coalition are the Social Democrats, the Liberals and Spadolini's own Republicans. The Christian Democrats are still smarting from their loss of the premiership and many would like to cut Craxi -- and his ambitions -- down to size.

De Mita urged the PSI "in a friendly manner" to quickly get used to dealing with the DC with the respect due a democratic party having clear programs and ideas and the largest popular consensus in the nation. De Mita insisted on the need for the DC to show more clout both in its dealings with its government allies and with the opposition parties, including the communists. The newly elected DC secretary judged the Communists to be in "a state of confusion" and lacking "a culture and a political proposition". With its new leader, the DC has shown itself determined to take the initiative on the nation's political scene. Just what this political line will be has not yet been clearly spelled out.

The DC congress winds up today with the election of the new national council.

ROME PAPERS COMMENT ON DE MITA'S SPEECH

AU061607 Rome ANSA in English 1500 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] Rome, 6 May (ANSA) -- The speech with which the Italian Christian Democrat Party's new secretary Ciriaco de Mita placed the seal on his subsequent election was viewed by political analysts here today as showing no signs of any need to attract the waverers.

According to the Rome daily, LA REPUBBLICA, it was a speech delivered by someone who "knows he has won and does not need to attract the don't knows". According to LA REPUBBLICA, now he has been elected, De Mita will be able to launch a "friendly warning" at Socialist Party Secretary Bettino Craxi that the Christian Democrats are not prepared to administer their own decline, will compete with the Socialists in Italian society and institutions, and "will challenge the Socialist Party on its own ground, commitment included". [as received] The Christian Democrats and the Socialists are the major partners in Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini's incumbent administration. The other partners are the Social Democrats, the Liberals, and Spadolini's own Republicans.

The conservative Rome daily, IL TEMPO, agreed that the Christian Democrat Party which emerged from its fifteenth congress was certainly not a party resigned to its own "sunset". According to IL TEMPO, neither De Mita nor his rival for the secretaryship, Arnaldo Forlani, offered doubts about the present ruling partnership. "But De Mita, while confirming the intention of maintaining the alliance with the Socialists, in no way closed the door on the eventuality of dialogue with the Communists", this daily asserted.

According to the leading Milan daily, CORRIERE DELLA SERA, the fate of the Christian Democrat Party is now in the hands of a "strong" secretary who "launches warnings, even if 'friendly' ones, at the Socialists, plans maintaining the Christian Democrats' identity as a popular party...and admits there is a 'margin of diffidence' around his election". In another version of the same reading, the leftist Rome daily, PAESE SERA, argued that the Christian Democrats have "changed horses, but are uncertain which road to take". "In the current state of affairs", this daily pointed out, "it is difficult to say what policy the Christian Democrat Party will in fact propose for emerging from the crisis".

"Going by the congress's debate, it could seem that the real and burning problems of unemployment, the crisis in production, inflation and endangered peace were somehow separate from the political and cultural crisis to which many speakers referred".

According to IL MANIFESTO, the leading voice to the left of the Communist Party, De Mita is an "almost historical minority....a bomb with a delayed fuse". This paper too pointed out that his speech made no reference to "any concrete social objective". But it also noted that the Christian Democrat congress may well mark the start to a "political movement" as the major Italian parties rethink their history since World War II. While noting that, to a certain extent, the Communists still have to follow the Christian Democrats and the Socialists in this evolution. IL MANIFESTO said that "the Christian Democrat Party too has lost its diversity based on anti-communism and has become a party like the others". In brief, even the Christian Democrat Party thinks it should set sail in order to avoid a slow destiny of destruction. "It might be time for the Communist Party, which people already locate on the high seas, to begin adjusting its fire".

DEFENSE MINISTER REPORTS TO CONGRESS COMMITTEE

PM051453 Madrid ABC in Spanish 29 Apr 82 pp 13, 25

[Excerpt] Madrid -- Minister of Defense Alberto Oliart yesterday explained to the corresponding Congress of Deputies committee the broad outlines of defense policy and of arms programs. The defense minister's report was delivered in open session, but once the statement and the debate which was started afterward were over, the defense committee meeting continued behind closed doors, while the parliamentary groups' spokesmen questioned the three generals, representing the three services, present at the session.

Spain's future entry into NATO is the government's principal aim in defense, and all the arguments put before the Congress committee revolved around this point. Other, no less essential aims were cited in Oliart's extensive report: The recovery of Gibraltar; presence in the Mediterranean; and, domestically, the defense of the constitutional system. "Spanish defense policy," Oliart stated, "is complex, as benefits a country which is at the same time Mediterranean and Atlantic, which is linked to Europe but for which the Strait of Gibraltar has never been a strait of separation from North Africa."

The defense minister explained the advantages entailed by joining NATO, which "facilitates enormously the resolution of the problem of Gibraltar." Concerning the Rock of Gibraltar, Oliart stated emphatically that it represents "a violation of our territorial integrity and an inescapable demand of any Spanish policy." Oliart later expressed the government's concern about possible instability in northwest Africa and the threat looming over the Western world b ecause of the Warsaw Pact.

Next the minister listed the aims of national defense, differentiating among those of a general nature, an external nature and an internal nature. With respect to the aims of a general nature, Oliart emphasized that the defense at all costs of the national territory's integrity against any external or internal threat is obvious. The exercise of sovereignty in all territories under the Spanish flag must be ensured, he added, with the consequent defense of airspace and seaspace.

He also emphasized that one of the armed forces' aims is to defend the constitutional system, the democracy under which we live and the parliamentary monarchy.

Referring to the aims of an external nature, the minister stated that it is necessary to supplement the national means with appropriate alliances, as well as the alliance [as published] and the best possible friendship with the Kingdom of Morocco, and to achieve membership in the Atlantic alliance. [sentence as published]

Regardless of this policy of alliance, he added, it is necessary to reaffirm our presence in the Mediterranean, the Strait [presumably, of Gibraltar] and the Atlantic, and to achieve the recovery of Gibraltar, in accordance with the UN resolution.

Last, as regards the aims of an internal nature, the minister said that it is necessary to achieve the strengthening of the national consciousness of all Spanish people and to secure the greatest possible identification between the people and the armed forces in the joint undertaking of defense.

He later stated that internal security rests with the state security forces, but it is also clear to us that the civil guard forces are part of the army, and in many instances in the struggle against terrorism army forces must defend possible targets for terrorist attacks.

As regards military potential, Oliart stated that it is necessary to secure, organize, equip, train and maintain a military force substantial enough to guarantee the defense of national territory, cooperate with the allied countries and deter other countries which may attack the integrity of the national territory.

The defense minister later asserted the need to develop a military intelligence system which will make it possible to forecast and monitor the progress of threats.

Next, Oliart summarized our services' military potential, stating, as regards the army, that we currently have three divisions -- armored, mechanized and motorized. "Since the 1971 law," the minister said, "an enormous effort has been made to modernize the army's equipment, but much of the weaponry, vehicles and equipment of these units is obsolete and will see the end of its useful life in this decade."

The minister announced that a substantial reduction of personnel will be effected, "to make the units that we have far more effective." He also stated that the substantial changes in the plan which will be put forward are primarily aimed at improving antitank and antiaircraft defenses.

After stating that an electronic warfare battalion [batallon de guerra electronica] will be set up, Oliart said that the investments as a whole fall into three blocks: First, undertaking already made; new purchases, which will be used for the partial replacement of the equipment of, among others, the units of Ceuta, Melilla, the Balearic Islands and the Canary Islands; and the infrastructure, which is, he said, one of the most important aims.

With respect to the navy, Oliart said that we now have a large navy for the size of the nation, which can be ranked among the four principal navies of the European Atlantic alliance. But, he said, it is a very old navy.

As regards the air force, the minister said that we now have 10 fighter and attack squadrons. Five of them -- the U.S. F-5S and the Phantoms -- must be decommissioned in this decade. The program which we have put forward for the airforce involves finishing payment for the F-1 program, the Mirages, whose deliveries are being completed.

The minister concluded by saying that we are going to adopt more sophisticated weapons and equip our three services with better weaponry.

PCE'S CARRILLO ADDRESSES CENTRAL COMMITTEE

PM051525 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 30 Apr-6 May 82 pp 1-12

[Unattributed report on PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo 26 April speech at PCE Central Committee meeting in Madrid: "Terrorist Offensive Instigation for Coup d'Etat"]

[Excerpts] In his speech on Monday afternoon PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo first stressed the significance of the report delivered in the morning by Nicolas Sartorius -- "An entire political approach; which consists in centering our debates on the essential problems of the working class and the people's masses."

I am talking about an approach which, as Mauricio rightly stressed this morning, aims to set the party's political work within the framework of the people's real anxieties and concerns, within the framework of the specific conditions, and to transcend ideological abstraction as the only ingredient of the debate.

In this connection it is necessary to overcome something which, through practice, threatened to become an attitude -- the idea that the major social problems affecting the labor world must be tackled by the trade union. Such problems constitute the basis of what must be our policy, the specific domain of the class struggle which must be occupied by the workers party, though this does not imply interfering in the trade union's own domain. It is not enough for us to have a trade union policy, though this is undoubtedly most important: We must also assert our influence in the labor world. We need to integrate into our everyday policy the concerns and anxieties of this world, to experience them and shoulder responsibility for them every day -- not just at election times.

Sometimes we might give through our debates the impression that we are a party that continuously plans for the final battle and does not attach adequate importance to the daily battles, which are set aside as the concern of the trade unions. By rejecting the reformist principle that the movement is everything, which is correct, we might appear to be -- and this would be wrong and dangerous -- a party that will only be of use on the day of total change. This in fact moves us further away from, rather than closer to, the transformation of society that must take place by means of an accumulation of quantitative prior to qualitative changes -- quantitative changes in which the party must be a more and more active and dynamic protagonist.

Distorted Image of Party

This attitude, which at some times we might have reflected, could give a distorted image of the party to some sectors of workers. This leads to the idea that when reforms must be carried out it is better to support the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE], which is suited to that role, while the Communist Party is a kind of revolutionary reserve for the day when grandiose dreams of liberation can be realized.

These sectors agree to the PSOE's making pacts, AMIS and organic laws on the harmonization of the autonomy process, backing the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] government and contradicting itself daily. They continue to vote for the PSOE because that is what they consider a useful vote. They do not agree to the Communist Party's making pacts and essential alliances to prevent the crisis from causing more and more disastrous consequences every day or reaching intermediate solutions. The Communist Party must remain uncontaminated and virginal, in short, an exemplary [testimonial] group, pending the great day of the radical revolution.

We undoubtedly need to carry out a major ideological task to educate our party, our supporters and voters and the broad workers masses to the idea that the revolutionary party, the party of radical change, the Communist Party, must also carry out everyday political activity, negotiate intermediate solutions, promote reforms and reach compromises if it wants to put itself in a position to achieve this radical change. We must make a resolute effort to reassess our political action and its importance as a task for the party and the masses themselves, as a commitment for everyone.

Though objective circumstances are unfavorable, due to the economic crisis, the persistence of vestiges, attitudes and even personalities from the previous regime must be rehabilitated, not only with regard to the major principles, but also in everyday matters. Unless we achieve this, the people's masses will continue to regard politics as alien, the domain of what is called, in an ambiguous and inaccurate expression, the political class, and they will not be active protagonists in the country's future. They will opt in every election not for what is good but for the lesser evil. This ideological endeavor must be supported by practical political activity. What we have now done with regard to welfare, we must do in the future with regard to all the major social problems affecting the majority of the population in all fields.

This is the first conclusion that I would like to draw from today's debate.

Specter of the Popular Front

I believe it would be worth looking at the manipulation being made of specter of the popular front. In the minds of this country's public the popular front is connected, among other things, with propaganda carried out for many years, the civil war propaganda. It must be stated first that the popular front was not a coalition of "Reds," as it seems some people would lead the public to believe. It was a coalition which under present conditions could include a major sector of the UCD and even some sectors of the democratic coalition: It would of course include the Basque and Catalonian nationalists. In other words this specter of the popular front represents socially and politically the basic composition the present Cortes, the present political situation. The fact that the working class gained hegemony within the popular front when the Francoist rising exploded and civil war was declared is another matter.

The same applies to the fact that the popular front acquired a much more radical and advanced character than at the outset as a result of a civil war that it did not provoke, but which was provoked by the Francoist rising.

What is regrettable is that it is actually the PSOE that is stressing the creation of a climate of fear around the idea of the popular front. The PSOE's veto on cooperation with the Communist Party is basically a manipulation of the fear of the popular front created by the right over many years. Consequently it is an attitude that weakens both the Socialist Party and the left of this country.

Therefore the step taken in Asturias is important within the Spanish political context because the Asturian comrades have succeeded in smashing this veto, smashing the PSOE's strategy in their region.

But what does this victory show? It is the link to which we must cling. This victory shows that in the PSOE grass roots, among PSOE members and many PSOE cadres, there is a unitary spirit, a spirit of leftwing unity. We must develop this spirit, this trend toward leftwing unity, by appealing to it in all our campaigns and by being very careful about how we criticize Socialist leaders.

I believe that both in Andalusia and elsewhere we must avoid coarse anathemas against Socialist leaders, while nevertheless seriously criticizing their policy, to avoid wounding the feelings of the Socialist grass roots and, on the other hand, to stimulate those feelings, thus arresting anti-unitary stances.

I believe that actions such as the one the other day at Getafe, where both Socialists and Communists addressed 15,000-20,000 workers and talking about unity, are very important in this whole process. The coming May Day is very important. Indeed, the party must strive to make it a great May Day, a major unitary mobilization of the masses, because these mobilizations can help influence the PSOE's course toward unity.

I would like to say in connection with our relations with the PSOE, our policy of cooperation with the PSOE, that there are levels at which we could temporarily accept outside support and participation, supporting the PSOE, if they gained sufficient parliamentary strength for this. There are other levels at which we could not accept what would simply be discrimination. In other words, if tomorrow there is a leftwing majority in the Chamber of Deputies -- I will not now hazard any forecast -- I believe that the Central Committee would have to assess whether or not it would be advisable to insist on the presence of communist ministers in a situation such as this in a government at state level. But at the level of municipal government and governments of provinces, nationalities and regions, we can in no way accept any discrimination -- discrimination that would serve only to categorize the communist vote as a futile vote, a vote that resolves and changes nothing, when in fact the opposite is true.

I believe that the importance of the decision in Asturias is not simply that it smashes the PSOE's strategy, but that it shows clearly that the communist vote is a useful vote, a vote worth casting.

I will not dwell on the importance of the Andalusian elections. Comrade Antonio Romero has given a report which I find brief, concise but complete on the situation in these elections.

Both the elections in Andalusia and the coming general election will not be easy tests for our party. They will not be easy tests because it is indisputable that the dogmatic split has been confirmed in Catalonia and an attempt is being made to extend this split to the rest of the country. In addition, the plan of which there is talk -- it is still not very clear how far it will go -- to turn the ARI into a political party could have an unfavorable influence on our electorate, not in the sense of giving those groups the chance to be represented but in the sense of limiting, of making us lose by several hundred, or several thousand votes in some instances, representatives who might have been ours.

I therefore believe that we should henceforth begin to study our election campaign; we should begin to prepare our election proposals, convinced that it will be a tough battle for the party in which we must maintian and increase our strength -- something which in my opinion is possible if we conduct our campaign well.

Even emphasizing the difficulties which we will have and which we did not have in 1979, I am convinced that the party can maintain and even exceed its score in the next general election if we prepare that campaign well and if we use all our energies, all the militancy there is in our party and all the atmosphere which, after what happened in Asturias, could be created to the effect that there really will be no leftward-leaning government in Spain unless the Communist Party, which has no substitute to that end, has a strong representation -- a representation which can really carry weight in national politics.

Since our party's desire for change -- for increasingly real and radical change -- is genuine, we can base on that feeling, that desire for change -- the effort to counter the difficulties confronting us in order to maintain and even exceed our 1979 election results.

MINISTRY DENIES REPORT OF ARMS FOR ARGENTINA

PY061305 Paris AFP in Spanish 1146 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] Madrid, 6 May (AFP) -- The Spanish Foreign Ministry today categorically denied that Spain has supplied arms to Argentina or that it is ready to do so, and it noted that no request has been made to it in this regard so far.

The Madrid daily DIARIO 16 today asserted that the Spanish Government was contemplating the imminent possibility of dispatching 120 mm mortars to Argentina.

DIARIO 16 also wrote that 80 mortars and approximately 15,000 mortar shells had been transported to a garrison near Madrid yesterday, Wednesday, in order to dispatch them to Buenos Aires.

In this regard, a spokesman for the Spanish Foreign Ministry noted that DIARIO 16 had made a mistake and that the Spanish Government had not been asked for military aid by the Argentine junta.

FINLAND

CABINET AGREES TO HIGHER DEFENSE, OTHER SPENDING

PM050915 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 1 May 82 p 1

[Text] The year's second supplementary budget was presented to the Eduskunta yesterday after long discussion in the government. The most striking supplementary spending involves 450 million markkaa for the import of defense material from the Soviet Union.

This sum has primarily been justified by the need to make a contribution to eliminating the current trade imbalance between Finland and the Soviet Union.

Nevertheless the Government was divided on this point. The Finnish People's Democratic League [SKDL] ministers were opposed to the decision and only accepted it on condition that the Eduskunta SKDL group be given a free hand when this particular piece of spending is debated in the Eduskunta.

It was possible to avoid a cabinet vote with the help of an agreement that the supplementary purchases agreed now will be taken into consideration when drawing up next year's defense budget.

Reports indicate that the purchases will include antiaircraft artillery, antitank missiles and special materiel of various sorts. Of the 450 million markkaa 300 will be spent this year and 150 next.

The supplementary budget also contains provisions to promote employment, including housebuilding programs and investments. The supplementary budget totals a little over 1.6 billion.

SWEDEN

UNIDENTIFIED SUBMARINE SPOTTED IN LOCAL WATERS

PM051611 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 30 Apr 82 p 7

[Lars Porne report: "Foreign Submarine Discovered"]

[Text] Naval and coast guard units were searching yesterday for a foreign submarine which had been located in Swedish waters near Soderarm. At midday a helicopter made contact with something which could have been a submarine and dropped charges on it. Then contact was lost once again.

The lighthouse crew at Soderarm and the crew of a tugboat first saw the submarine in surface position on their radar screen on Wednesday [28 April] night.

The navy sent out two helicopters, the torpedo boat Virgo and the mine vessel Visborg to the area to search. The coast guard also sent vessels and aircraft.

Some of the coast guard boats are fitted with a simple hydrophone which can just be used for submarine searchers, navy headquarters said.

The helicopter came into contact with a "possible submarine" at 1200 hours 1.5 minutes north-northwest of Soderarm. This means that the submarine was deep inside Swedish waters.

There were no Swedish submarines in the area, navy headquarters said. The search continued until nightfall.

NOTT 'RULES OUT' CEASE-FIRE WITHOUT WITHDRAWAL

LD061124 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1107 GMT 6 May 82

[By Geoffrey Meade, PA staff reporter in Brussels]

[Text] Defence Secretary John Nott today firmly ruled out a cease-fire without simultaneous withdrawal of Argentine troops from the Falklands. "To agree a cease-fire without withdrawal would be to leave the burglar with his spoils," he declared after talks with NATO defence ministers in Brussels.

Mr Nott said nobody wanted a peaceful solution more than he did, but withdrawal had to be a precondition of any cease-fire agreement. He said Britain's efforts at a negotiated settlement would not falter and the UK was relying on the "tremendous support" received from Europe.

Mr Nott emphasized that Britain's continued military presence in the South Atlantic was an important element in achieving peace. "We are dealing with a military junta, and so far there has been no evidence that they understand anything other than strength."

He constantly underlined the principle of total withdrawal of Argentine forces before a cease-fire can be agreed. He said: "If we have a cease-fire without Argentine withdrawal, democracy will have surrendered to aggression and the aggressor will be in possession of his spoils."

He went on: "We are perfectly prepared to agree to a cease-fire, but only on the understanding and on the basis that it runs concurrently with withdrawal. We understand there may need to be some transitional arrangement before the two sides undertake talks on the long-term future of the islands."

He pointed out that talks were going on at the time of the invasion and Britain was prepared to talk again. Further military action in the South Atlantic was a risk, he said.

"But that will only arise if the Argentinians challenge the total exclusion zone and if they pose a continuing threat to our ships and men. The only way to avoid engagement is by them not challenging the zone or threatening our ships and men." Mr Nott said: "The way to bring about peace tomorrow is for them to withdraw and obey United Nations Resolution 502."

The defence secretary said that during discussions over breakfast with his U.S. counterpart, Caspar Weinberger, he had talked about the question of American material support for Britain. But he added: "We have the necessary military forces and logistical backup and we are able to pursue our military mission to its conclusion should that be necessary. I hope very much we will find a peaceful solution in the next few days to make that unnecessary, but we have all we require to make the mission successful on our own."

Mr Nott said new proposals regarding a negotiated settlement had been made to the UN secretary general, but he did not know how closely aligned they might be to any other proposals now under consideration. He said it was true that there was a fundamental disagreement over the question of sovereignty, but it was too soon to talk about what form any long term solution might take.

But he added that compliance by Argentina with the UN resolution calling for withdrawal from the Falklands could not prejudice any outcome of long term negotiations.

Asked if he could give accurate figures about deaths and casualties, following the sinking of HMS Sheffield, Mr Nott stressed that many ships in the fleet were maintaining radio silence for their own protection.

And, as the survivors were scattered around the task force, it had been impossible to accurately assess the true picture. He hoped to be able to do so soon.

Earlier, Mr Nott said he was grateful for the support of NATO as indicated in today's communique from NATO headquarters in Brussels.

PERUVIAN, UN PEACE PLANS BEING PURSUED

LD061326 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1310 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] Britain is in direct contact with the Government of Peru over its peace plan on the Falklands crisis, the Foreign Office announced this afternoon. Contacts are being conducted through the British ambassador in Lima, Mr George Wallace.

A Foreign Office spokesman in London said: "We hope these contacts may lead to early progress." The spokesman added: "We are continuing our work with all urgency to achieve a negotiated settlement as soon as possible. Contacts continue with the United States and the United Nations secretary general."

At first, discussion of the Peru peace plan was conducted by Britain through the U.S. secretary of state, Mr Alexander Haig. In this new flurry of diplomatic activity, however, the government has established there are two Argentine representatives in Lima talking with the Peruvian Government on the peace plan which was first put forward on the initiative of the Peruvian president.

Chief Foreign Office Spokesman Mr Nicholas Fenn was careful to point out today that Britain is not in direct touch with Argentina. He also said that the purpose of any cease-fire proposal would be to enable Argentine forces to withdraw from the Falklands as set out by the UN Security Council. He insisted that withdrawal was still a major British requirement, but declined to go into details of how this might be agreed.

Meanwhile Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym is replying to suggestions by UN Secretary General Mr Javier Perez de Cuellar for a possible Falklands settlement, the Foreign Office said today. The spokesman said that Mr Pym's reply will be "in positive terms." However, he declined to indicate what exactly that phrase meant and would not go into details.

Argentina has already replied to the secretary general's ideas, also it seems in positive terms, having apparently agreed to the need for a cease-fire. But Mr Fenn said Britain had not seen the text of the Argentine reply to the secretary-general.

Up to now the Argentine position was that her sovereignty of the Falklands must be recognized in advance, he added. That position was not acceptable to the British Government.

THATCHER SAYS MILITARY OPERATIONS TO CONTINUE

LD061540 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1520 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] Britain's military operations against Argentina will not be held back while the latest diplomatic moves continue, the prime minister said today. Argentine acceptance of the United nations' peace plan without a pledge to withdraw the troops from the Falklands would be a "plot" she told MP's.

"It would not be impossible, it may be very likely, that Argentina is concentrating on a cease-fire without withdrawal," said Mrs Thatcher at question time, when pressed by Labour leader Mr Foot on the UN peace moves. "That would be a very evident ploy to keep them in possession of their ill-gotten gains, and we are right to be very wary of it," she said.

Mrs Thatcher was challenged by Mr Foot to rule out "deliberate escalation of military action which could injure prospects which now appear to be much more hopeful of getting a real peace."

To tumultuous Tory cheers, the prime minister told him the Argentines had escalated the conflict with their invasion.

"We must continue with our military activities," she said. "It would be too easy to say 'no military activities during negotiations'. We should then be hamstrung, the people would still be under the heel of the invader while Argentina increased its activities on the mainland, with supplies and reserves, to attack us at their will."

Mrs Thatcher's reply drew furious protests from Labour backbenchers, who claimed she had refused to answer an MP's specific demand for no bombing attacks on the Argentine mainland.

Dealing with the two current peace moves in turn, Mrs Thatcher said Britain had made a "very constructive response" to the United States' proposals being pursued through Peru. She hoped to hear more today. "Whether Argentina will respond in the same way, we do not know," she said.

The United Nations' peace proposals were "framework" on which further discussions could be based. She was sending a message to the United Nations secretary general today. Reports on the Argentine response to the UN proposals had been conflicting, said the prime minister. She made it clear that the UN proposals linked a cease-fire with the withdrawal of troops.

"It seems clear they are very interested in a cease-fire, but they may not accept withdrawal and may do it on a totally different basis or require undertakings on sovereignty." But she said that there could be no cease-fire unless it was accompanied by full and properly supervised withdrawal of troops.

"I stress that any proposals, if they are to be acceptable, and if they are to work and to command confidence, must be precise as to the timing, sequence and verification of events." "We must always remember that they were the aggressors," went on the prime minister.

The Argentines had ignored calls by the UN Security Council and President Reagan not to invade. "That same government invaded and has been piling in soldiers and equipment against the UN resolution ever since. That is the kind of government we are dealing with," she said.

Although he had called for military restraint, Mr Foot said he welcomes the tone of the prime minister's comments on the peace moves. He urges Mrs Thatcher to do everything possible to "nurture" the chances of a peaceful settlement.

PYM BLAMES ARGENTINA FOR PERUVIAN PLAN COLLAPSE

LD061916 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1912 GMT 6 May 82

[By Andy Webb, PA political staff]

[Text] The Peruvian Government's peace initiative has collapsed, the Foreign Office announced tonight, and Britain put the blame for the breakdown firmly on Argentina. It is understood that the British Government would have been prepared to accept the terms of the Peruvian president's peace plan which closely followed the original initiative from U.S. Secretary of State Mr Alexander Haig.

The full terms of the proposals have not yet been published. But in a brief statement tonight from the Foreign Office in London, Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym said: "I am deeply disappointed that Argentinian intransigence has once again frustrated a constructive initiative. Had they genuinely wanted peace, they would have accepted the latest proposal put to them, and we could have had a cease-fire in place by 5 pm, (BST) tomorrow, Friday."

He will make a full report on the latest diplomatic position in a statement to the Commons tomorrow. Argentina is believed to have had two senior members of its government in Lima for the past few days to discuss the proposals.

But it appears that they have now told the Peruvian authorities that they cannot accept them. The Peruvian initiative, therefore, has never had official status.

The view within the Foreign Office is that the Argentinians appear to be going for the United Nations plan, which they believe can secure them a cease-fire without any commitment to withdrawing their troops from the Falklands. This possibility is dismissed as "ridiculous" in British Government circles, and Mrs Thatcher told MP's today that there would be no cease-fire without withdrawal.

The British Government says it has made "a constructive response" to the plan put forward by the UN secretary general, which was delivered to Mr Perez de Cuellar earlier today. The government insists that it is still seeking a diplomatic solution.

Military Action More Likely

LD062028 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2022 GMT 6 May 82

[By PA political and defence staff]

[Text] Fears that only a military solution would end the Falklands crisis rose sharply tonight after Britain's main hope for a peaceful settlement collapsed. And gloom deepened with the news that Britain had lost two more Harrier jets, with their pilots presumed dead.

Mrs Thatcher had been pinning her hopes of peace on an initiative by the Peruvian president based on original proposals by U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig, but the Argentinians threw out the plan today. Now, with only the UN proposals left for discussion -- and these are regarded with deep skeptism by the British Government -- the prospects of a diplomatic solution looked increasingly bleak.

The UN plan may founder for the same reason as Peru's -- because Argentina will not commit itself to withdrawal. The loss of the two planes reported to have just "disappeared off the radar screens", is a serious blow to the task force, now down to 17 Harriers from its original strength of 20. Another was shot down over Port Stanley on Tuesday.

It was understood that news of the disappearance of the planes, while on a patrol, was originally to have been given at a Defence Ministry briefing to announce the Sheffield casualties -- 20 dead and 24 injured. But nothing was said and Whitehall sources said tonight they could give no credence to reports that Mrs Thatcher had personally ordered a delay of the announcement.

Hours later however the ministry confirmed the planes were missing and contact had been lost. "The weather and visibility were very poor. At noon London time contact with the Harriers was lost. We do not know the reason for this," said Spokesman Mr Ian McDonald.

"In view of the time that has now elapsed the aircraft must be assumed missing. No further details are available at present but search and rescue operations are now in progress. The next of kin are being informed."

The prime minister earlier told the House that further military actions may be needed if there was to be a settlement -- and she insisted that there would be no cease-fire without withdrawal from Argentina [as received]. She told MP's that she feared Argentina was trying for a cease-fire without removing its troops, but she said she was still hoping for a settlement through the Peruvian initiative.

However, tonight, in a brief statement, the foreign secretary announced that the Peruvian proposals had foundered. Accusing Argentina of "intransigence" Mr Pym said: "Had they genuinely wanted peace they would have accepted the latest proposals put to them and we could have had a cease-fire in place by 5 pm BST tomorrow."

"When it was learned that Argentina had rejected its proposals, the Peruvian Government did not even bother to table them formally to either Argentina and Britain.

They had been discussed only on informal lines in Lima with members of the Argentinian Government and Britain's ambassador, Mr George Wallace.

Mr Pym will make a Commons statement tomorrow on the latest diplomatic position. But the only avenue open now is through the United Nations, and Britain is extremely pessimistic about Secretary General Perez de Cuellar's chances of success.

He said he had received a "positive response" from Argentina on his ideas, which include phased withdrawal of both sides, a UN interim administration and negotiations for a settlement under UN auspices. However, in Buenos Aires it was reported that Argentina was sticking by its condition that its sovereignty should be recognized.

If Britain insisted on a total withdrawal as a condition for a cease-fire "then there is no diplomatic solution for the moment," said an Argentine Foreign Ministry spokesman. Britain has also sent a "positive" response to Mr de Cuellar, but it is understood that this asks him to be more specific on what might be needed to establish a framework for negotiations. However, MP's at Westminister feared tonight that the latest news could bring the chances of more serious conflict much nearer.

And there was a feeling that the only reason for the apparent lack of action in the South Atlantic since Teusday was that Argentina had not breached the total exclusion zone. There was a total news blackout among government sources tonight over the chances of quick invasion by British forces, but Mrs. Thatcher's warning of more military action must mean the option is now closer. It was 10 days ago that she warned the nation that "time was running out."

LACK OF ANTI-MISSILE-MISSILE BLAMED FOR LOSS

[Peter Pryke report: "Sea Wolf Missiles Are Urged for Task Force Defence"]

[Text] The lack of an anti-missile-missile on the 4,100-ton destroyer Sheffield was identified by Mr Nott, defence secretary, in the Commons yesterday as a reason for the loss of the warship. He was closely questioned by MP's anxious to know the cause of the disaster. One of them, Sir Patrick Wall (C, Haltemprice), suggested that the Sea Wolf missile was the only effective answer and urged their installation of our ships "with the utmost urgency."

Mr Nott accepted that the Sea Dart missiles, which were the Sheffield's principal defence system, were not effective against incoming missiles. "One of the factors which has led to us not having anti-missile-missiles as fully on our ships as I would like is that the Soviet Union and their Warsaw Pact allies, up to recently, did not deploy sea-skimming missiles. "That is one of the reasons why, in restrospect, we have not moved forward as we should."

The Sheffield was armed with Sea Dart missiles of the latest kind, but these were an area air defence weapon. They could be used, but were not very successful, against incoming missiles. "They are primarily for engaging, on an area basis, incoming aircraft."

Mr Nott added that he did not know why the Sea Dart system had not successfully engaged the Argentine aircraft. "It is possible the aircraft came in very low under the radar cover."

Describing the events leading to the loss of the Sheffield, Mr Nott said in a statement that she was attacked by Argentine Super Etendard Aircraft launching Exocet missiles at about 3.30 p.m. London time. She was about 70 miles off the Falklands, enforcing the total exclusion zone, with other elements of the task force.

"One missile missed the ship; the other hit her amidships. The resulting explosion caused a major fire. Although attempts were made to extinguish the fire for nearly four hours, with the assistance of fire-fighting teams from other ships in the area, it eventually spread out of control.

"At about 7 p.m. London time the order was given to abandon ship. Ships of the task force in the area picked up survivors and the latest information I have is that about 30 men are still missing." A further number had sustained injuries and they were being well cared for under medical supervision.

Casualty Toll Announced

LD061756 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1724 GMT 6 May 82

[By PA defence staff]

[Excerpts] Twenty officers and men from HMS Sheffield must now be presumed dead, the Ministry of Defence [MOD] announced tonight. Another 24 sustained injuries and are receiving medical attention.

MOD spokesman Mr Ian McDonald said tonight that one of the injured crewmen was on the seriously ill list. The other 242 survivors from the Sheffield, hit on Tuesday by an Argentine missile, are "well" and have been transferred to other task force ships he said.

Mr McDonald told a packed press conference tonight: "Twenty officers and men serving on the ship must now be presumed dead. Twenty-four of the crew sustained injuries and are receiving medical attention. All next of kin have now been informed. Details of these presumed dead, and of the one man on the seriously-ill list, are not being issued by the ministry."

Mr McDonald said he had been asked to appeal to the media to respect the grief and privacy of all the families involved. He said he had no reports of any further action in the South Atlantic, and added that enforcement of the 200-mile total exclusion zone around the Falklands was continuing.

'DISAPPEARANCE' OF TWO HARRIERS REPORTED

LD061908 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1903 GMT 6 May 82

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] Two Sea Harrier jump jets from the Royal Navy battle fleet were lost earlier today inside the 200-mile total exclusion zone around the Falklands. It is reliably understood that the two jets, on a combat air patrol, flew off and then "disappeared off the radar screens."

As the aircraft have now exceeded their fuel capacity, the two pilots have been listed missing presumed dead. Next-of-kin has been informed, I was told tonight.

An official announcement of the Harrier casualties was postponed at the last minute. At the press conference on the HMS Sheffield casualties, Defence Ministry Spokesman Ian McDonald was quizzed on reports of other casualties today -- either operation or accidental, he said he "could not comment at present" and no statements are expected from the Defence Ministry tonight.

The task force has now lost three Sea Harriers from its present strength of 20 onboard. On Tuesday one was shot down over Port Stanley in a bombing raid on the airstrip. The pilot was named as Nicholas Taylor, 32, of Ryme Intrinseca, Dorset.

Report Confirmed

LD062044 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2035 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] Tonight's further loss of two Sea Harriers -- now officially confirmed by the Defence Ministry -- poses a big headache for task force commander Rear Admiral Sandy Woodward, charged with the task of enforcing the 200-mile air and sea blockade around the islands.

With the Harrier lost during Tuesday's Port Stanley bombing raid, he is now limited in the number of aircraft he can mount for Port Stanley and Goose Green airstrips. He now has only 17 aircraft at his disposal and must await the arrival of the requisitioned container ship Atlantic Conveyor with reinforcements of a further 20 RAF and Navy Harriers.

As Tuesday's air attack on HMS Sheffield showed, air supremacy is vital to the success of his mission. No attempts to oust the 6,000-strong Argentine garrison on the Falklands can be attempted until the enforcement zone is secure.

FRANCE HALTS DELIVERY OF FIGHTERS TO ARGENTINA

PM061223 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 6 May 82 p 5

[Air Cdre G.S. Cooper report: "Paris Halts Order for Jets in Missile Raid"]

[Text] France has put a halt to completion of deliveries of 14 Dassault Super Etendard single seat fighters -- similar to the jet which attacked and disabled the destroyer Sheffield on Tuesday -- but latest estimates from Paris say 12 may actually be in service in Argentina. Argentina became the first foreign customer for the transonic strike aircraft in 1979.

The Super Etendard threat to the task force was identified in THE DAILY TELEGRAPH on April 7, but at that time there was no confirmation that Argentina possessed the AM39 air-launched version of Exocet -- also built in France by Aerospatiale.

The task force has no anti-missile-missiles or guns that can be relied on to stop Exocet. Some of the ships have Sea Wolf short-range defence missiles, but not of the type that can stop sea-skimming Exocet. Britain must either stop the aircraft from taking off; intercept the aircraft with Sea Harriers or Sea Dart air defence missiles; block the Exocet's radar guidance and homing head; or keep back out of range of the system.

Super Etendard carries one Exocet missile under the right wing and an extra fuel tank under the left. This enables the aircraft to reach a target 400 miles from the mainland. The radius of action of the aircraft can be extended by flight refuelling either from one of Argentina's two KC-130 tankers or from other Super Etendards.

The Super Etendard has a very advanced navigation system that makes it simple for the pilot to find and attack his target. It is assumed that Argentina is obtaining intelligence on the position of the British ships either from its own Lockheed Neptune maritime reconnaissance aircraft, or possibly through satellite intelligence passed on by Russia.

Exocet can be fired at up to 30 miles from the target from low level, allowing the aircraft to keep down out of sight of the ship's radar. Once launched, the missile homes on to the ship and skims across the sea at a height of about 10 ft. Its rocket motor gives it a speed of about 700 MPH.

Undoubtedly France will have told Britain how many Exocet missiles Argentina has, but it is unlikely that more than 20 will have been delivered. Iraq and South Africa are believed to be among the countries to have ordered the missile. Argentine pilots are known to have been receiving their flying training in South Africa.

If the air-launched Exocet threat cannot be contained by normal defensive means and if Argentina is not limited by the availability of missiles, Britain is bound to consider seriously the option of attacking the base from which the Super Etendards operate. Vulcan bombers operating from Ascension Island with the aid of in-flight refuelling Victor tankers have already demonstrated their ability to hit airfield targets under cover of darkness.

The Super Etendards are normally based at Commandante Espora near Puerto Belgrano, but to shorten the distance from the mainland to the Falklands area it is probable that they have been deployed to a base further south. There are three airfields available: Comodoro Rivadavia, Puerto Deseado and Rio Gallegos.

PYM ADDRESSES PARLIAMENT ON PEACE PLANS

LD071058 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1047 GMT 7 May 82

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Text] Britain is urgently and constructively pursuing the UN secretary general's Falkland peace plan following the collapse of the Peru initiative, MP's were told by the foreign secretary today.

Mr Pym disclosed for the first time details of the Peru-U.S. package and of the new search for a settlement, but issued a strong warning that if the Argentine remained intransigent: "We shall do whatever necessary to end their unlawful occupation -- our resolve remains undiminished."

After repeating his censure of Argentine intransigence in rejecting a diplomatic solution, Mr Pym told the Commons he would give an account of where Britain stood -- "and of where we intend to go from here." He praised U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig for his part in the Peru plan and said the government signified yesterday willingness to accept and implement immediately an interim agreement preparing for a definitive settlement.

"If it had been accepted by the Argentines, the cease-fire, which would have been firmly linked to the beginning of Argentine withdrawal, could have come into effect as early as 5 pm today." Then Mr Pym outlined the interim agreement. He said it included the following elements:

-- "Complete and supervised withdrawal of Argentine forces from the Falkland Islands matched by corresponding withdrawal of British forces;

-- "An immediate cease-fire as soon as Argentina accepted the agreement and agreed to withdraw;

-- "Appointment of a small group of countries acceptable to both sides who would supervise withdrawal, undertake the interim administration in consultation with the islanders' elected representatives, and perhaps help in negotiations for a definitive agreement on the status of the islands, without prejudice to our principles of the wishes of the islanders;

-- "Suspension of the existing exclusion zones and the lifting of economic sanctions."

The prime minister listened as the foreign secretary continued: "This agreement would not, of course, have prejudged in any way the outcome of the negotiations about the future, that is a sticking point for us. Pending the outcome of the negotiations, the two sides would simply have acknowledged the difference that exists between them over the status of the islands.

"We have worked, and will continue to work, positively and constructively for a peaceful solution. Our agreement to these ideas makes this once again abundantly clear. I wish I could say that the Argentine junta had been working in a similar spirit -- clearly, they were not. The Argentines have so far insisted that a transfer of sovereignty to them should be a precondition of negotiations on a final settlement.

"The Argentines talk much of the need for the decolonization of the islands. What they appear to mean by this is a recolonization by themselves," he said to loud cheers. "The Argentines seem now to be obstructing progress in another, but equally fundamental way.

"They appear to be asking for a cease-fire without any clear link with a withdrawal of their invasion force. To grant this would be to leave them indefinitely in control of people and territory which they had illegally seized, and to deny ourselves the right of pursuing our own self-defence.

"We have not allowed Argentine military activities to halt the measures which our task force is taking. We will not allow their diplomatic obstructionism to do so either. Nor will they be allowed to halt our own vigorous endeavours to find a peaceful way out of the conflict into which they had led us."

The foreign secretary then talked of UN proposals. "The secretary general has put to both us and Argentina some ideas as a framework around which progress might be made. The Argentine Government claims to have accepted these ideas. We are bound to be skeptical of this claim... It is difficult to believe that Argentina, having rejected ideas devised by Mr Haig and the president of Peru, can now accept the secretary general's ideas which have such a similar basis.

"For our part, we have accepted the general approach set out by the secretary general. I sent him yesterday a positive and substantive reply, making clear that the elements of a solution put forward by him were close to those which had been the basis of our efforts since the beginning of the crisis." But Mr Pym stressed that an unconditional cease-fire had to be unambiguously linked to the commencement of Argentine withdrawal. But the government had communicated what it would be prepared to accept "to fill out the framework..."

The foreign secretary said: "If one phase of diplomatic effort has been brought to an end by Argentine intransigence, another phase is already underway in New York. We are working urgently and constructively with the secretary general... I hope the Argentines will henceforth show that readiness and desire to reach a peaceful settlement which has been evident so far only on our side.

"If they do not, let them be in no doubt that we shall do whatever may be necessary to end their unlawful occupation. Our resolve is undiminished. It remains the government's highest priority to achieve an early negotiated settlement if that is humanly possible."

BBC INCREASING SPANISH PROGRAMS TO LATIN AMERICA

LD061418 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1410 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] In a bid to overcome Argentine jamming, the BBC boosted from six to ten the number of short-wave frequencies carrying its Spanish programmes for Latin America today. From tomorrow there will also be an extra 30-minute broadcast each day at 1200 BST.

This will contain a bulletin of world news and a 20-minute round-up of international affairs concentrating on the Falkland crisis. "We are extending our broadcasts so that we can reach Buenos Aires at breakfast time and not just in the evening," said Mr Douglas Muggeridge, managing director BBC external broadcasting.

"This extra time on the air will make jamming more difficult, as will the extra frequencies we are now using." "There are growing indications that because of our objective coverage and in spite of the jamming, we are reaching a much larger audience in Argentina than the Argentine authorities would like," he added.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN ON NICOSIA-ATHENS RELATIONS

NC070938 Nicosia PUBLIC INFORMATION OFFICE in English 7 May 82 p 1

[Statement by Government of Cyprus spokesman 7 May]

[Text] Despite the prudent, responsible and constructive attitude of the president of the republic and the government regarding the question that has arisen in the Athens-Nicosia relations and despite efforts for the full restoration of these relations and harmonious cooperation, the opposition and its mouthpieces are continuing, by distortions, provocations and arbitrary allegations, their attempts to undermine Athens-Nicosia relations, completely disregarding the consequences, in an effort to serve petty political interests. It is reminded, lest the opposition has forgotten it, that Attila is in Cyprus and what is imperative is that everyone should help strengthen and safeguard close cooperation between Athens and Nicosia.

Despite this completely unacceptable and nationally harmful tactic, the president of the republic and the government will continue to handle the matter in a responsible manner avoiding anything that might make things difficult, being confident that harmonious cooperation will be fully restored for the sake of our national cause and that the hopes and expectations of those, locals or foreigners, who seek to create tension and discord between the governments of Greece and Cyprus, will be disappointed.

ROLANDHIS MEETS PYM; COMPARES CYPRUS, FALKLANDS

NC062007 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] The republic's foreign minister, Rolandhis, today held talks in London with British Foreign Secretary Pym and Deputy Foreign Secretary Lord Belstead. A statement issued after the talks mentions the talks were held in a warm and friendly atmosphere and covered such issues as the Cyprus problem, Cyprus' relations with the EEC, the Cyprus Government's economic claims on the basis of the provisions of the treaty of establishment, the Falkland Islands crisis and the issue of fees for Cypriot students in the United Kingdom.

A detailed discussion was held on the issue of the economic claims, and various views were exchanged. It was agreed that further contacts would be made after both sides have studied what has been discussed. Later Pym gave a luncheon in Rolandhis' honor which, among others, was attended by members of parliament and Deputy Foreign Secretary Belstead.

Speaking at the luncheon, Pym referred to the close ties which link Cyprus with the United Kingdom. In reply, Rolandhis stressed the significance Cyprus attaches to the strengthening of its ties with the United Kingdom, while at the same time noting the need for an evaluation and solution of the problems which plague contemporary international relations on the basis of the principles for the guarantee of international peace, security and justice. Rolandhis also referred to the occupation of part of Cyprus by Turkish troops and to the violation of the principles of law in Cyprus' case.

In addition, in an interview with a London radio station, Rolandhis mentioned that the sum Cyprus is demanding for the use of the British bases is somewhat more than 200 million pounds. Rolandhis mentioned that Britain has a legal obligation to pay the sum Cyprus is claiming, because the treaty clearly stipulates that compensation should be paid for the use of the bases.

In reply to a question connected with the Falkland Islands crisis, Rolandhis observed that the British Government, in the case of Cyprus, did not adopt a similar stance to the one it maintained against the aggression in the Falkland Islands. Britain, he said, though a guarantor power, did not discharge its duty to protect Cyprus during those tragic days of the Turkish invasion. We cannot, he concluded, implement two sets of standards.

LIBYAN ENVOY EXPLAINS 'ABUSE' OF GREEK PRESS

NC061648 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 6 May 82 p 10

[Text] Yesterday Mr D. Maroudhas, deputy minister to the prime minister in charge of press affairs, summoned Libyan representative Al-Qammudi and asked him for explanations in connection with a recent statement by the Libyan diplomatic mission in Athens.

It is recalled in this connection that the said statement -- unprecedented in diplomatic annals -- included abusive language against the Greek press.

It has been learned that Al-Qammudi told Mr Maroudhas that the purpose of the statement was to rebuff some press reports which referred to Colonel al-Qadhdhafi and which were found to be puzzling and which therefore did not promote the relations between the two peoples. He also added that there was no intention of offending the Greek press which functions in absolute freedom. In the end he claimed that obviously the statement included some translation inaccuracies.

Further reports say that Mr Maroudhas pointed out to the Libyan representative the loathsome nature of the affair and stressed to him that the newspapers here are free to exercise criticism in every direction.

NC051914 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1800 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] A draft agreement on economic, industrial, scientific and technological cooperation between Greece and Romania was signed this afternoon at the end of the second meeting between Romanian President Ceausescu and Prime Minister Papandreou.

Speaking to reporters, the Romanian president and the [Greek] prime minister expressed their satisfaction with this agreement and the wish that it would mark the start of a more general promotion of inter-Balkan relations.

In this connection, Prime Minister Papandreou made the following statement: Today, we signed with the president of the Socialist Republic of Romania a draft cooperation agreement, and I would like to believe this constitutes the foundation stone of a close cooperation between our two countries and, beyond the two countries, within the framework of the Balkans -- a cooperation that will change the Balkans into an area of peace and progress.

In conclusion, addressing Romanian President Ceausescu, Prime Minister Papandreou said: Mr President, I have signed this agreement with great pleasure.

At the same time, Romanian President Ceausescu said: I would also like to express my satisfaction and pleasure at the signing of the draft agreement -- a long-term agreement for the development of cooperation between our two countries. With this agreement we have signed, Mr Prime Minister, we offer a broad prospect for the development of cooperation and of Greek-Romanian collaboration which respond to the interests of our two peoples in the struggle for economic progress, independence and peace. Mr Ceausescu concluded: I am also confident that at the same time this will contribute to the development of multilateral cooperation among the Balkan countries and the conversion of the Balkans into a zone of peaceful cooperation, with the prospect, of course, of denuclearization.

BEN YAHIA'S PLANE SAID ATTACKED BY 2 AIRCRAFT

TA051640 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkist 1600 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] It has been announced that the plane taking Algerian Foreign Minister Ben Yahia to Iran crashed as a result of an attack by two unidentified military planes. The statement issued by the Foreign Ministry on the issue is as follows: The Turkish authorities who are conducting the necessary investigation in connection with the Algerian plane which was taking to Iran the foreign minister of the friendly and brotherly Algeria and the delegation accompanying him and which crashed near Qotur in Iran have assessed the tapes which recorded the conversation between the plane and the control tower and other evidence.

As a result of this comprehensive investigation it has been determined that the Algerian plane continued its normal course while in Turkish airspace; that it reported to the Esenboga control tower that it would leave Turkish airspace at 1628 local time; that the nationality of the pilot, who again called the Esenboga control tower after entering Iranian airspace and after Tabriz [as heard] at 1630 local time, was not determined; and that the plane was within Iranian airspace at a distance of some 16 to 30 miles from the border at the time it reported that it was attacked by two planes.

The pilot did not report any abnormality while the plane was within Turkish airspace prior to the last message. The Algerian plane was followed by Turkish radar until it was out of Turkish airspace, and it has been determined that there was no other air traffic in the region during that time.

FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON ARMENIAN TERRORISM

TA061556 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1545 GMT 6 May 82

[Text] Ankara, 6 May (AA) -- The consultative assembly debated Thursday Armenian terrorist attacks on Turkish missions with Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen declaring: We do not doubt that defenders and supporters of the so-called Armenian cause will be frustrated. Counter-propaganda cannot bring Armenian terrorist acts to an end. There are other ways of fighting terrorism. All terrorist acts create a reaction which destroys it eventually."

Such terrorist acts have now sprung to America from Europe, Turkmen said, adding "they now think they can advertise their so-called cause in America by committing murder. Armenian organizations have organized to a great extent in the United States in order to spread hate and hostility against Turks and Turkey in all fields. This racist propaganda is itself one of the facts creating Armenian terror have intermingled [sentence as received]. They cannot be separated any longer. For this reason, it is high time for circles in Western Europe and the United States supporting Armenian propaganda to realize that, in the end, they are encouraging these murders.

Meanwhile, assembly member from Mardin Basir Hamitoglullari said "Soviet Russia, Greece and France were behind Armenian terror" and called for "reprisals."

ARMS SMUGGLERS FOR DISSIDENT ARMENIANS ARRESTED

NC051009 Paris AFP in English 0949 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] Ankara, 5 May (AFP) -- Eight hundred people have been arrested in southern Turkey and the customs director in the Turkish part of Cyprus has disappeared, following the discovery of a huge arms smuggling ring working with a radical dissident Armenian group, the HURRIYET newspaper reported today.

The newspaper quoted police sources as saying the Turkist-Cypriot export-import firm with numerous international subsidiaries, Overco Northern Cyprus, served as the transit point for weaponry from Europe and the Middle East. The arms later reached the Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia the newspaper said. The organization has claimed numerous attacks on Turkish diplomats abroad.

Another Armenian group, the commandos of justice for the Armenian genocide, claimed the latest such attack, in which Turkish Honorary Consul Orhan Gunduz was shot dead yesterday in a Boston, Massachusetts suburb.

The newspaper said Overco Cyrpus was headed by a Cypriot of Armenian descent, identified as Musa Koyluyan, also known as Yahe Ohannes. The firm had set up offices in the Netherlands, Iraq, Syria and Lebanon, it added. It also had a number of collaborators in the southern provinces of Turkey, especially near Gaziantep and Iskenderun, near Syria, where the 800 people were arrested, the newspaper said.

The customs director in Turkish Cyprus, Kamuran Ezer, disappeared yesterday, the newspaper added. His car was found at the border crossing between Turkish and Greek Cyprus at Beyarmurdu [Pergamos], it reported.

The newspaper alleged that the import vouchers, allegedly completed by a Turkish businessman, Nejat Soyler, and the Overco director, Mr Koyulyan, with Mr Ezer's complicity, said the shipments containing the arms consisted of cigarettes, whiskey and household appliances. The weapons were then sent to the Greek part of Cyprus, where they went to Armenian secret army members in the Middle East, according to the account.

It further said that an investigation had revealed that in 1979, Mr Koylulan rented a Boeing 707 jet which may have served to pass arms on voyages to several continents. The jet was abandoned at Ankara International Airport, where it stayed for a year and a half before police wondered why it had been there for so long.

The newspaper also said 63 trucks that disappeared two years ago after entering Turkey from Europe had delivered their cargo to Overco. The contents of two of these trucks -- including 2,500 pistols, rocket launchers and ammunition -- [word indistinct] found in two (?farms) in southern Turkey, according to the report.

[Text] Lekfosa, 5 May (AA) -- Kamuran Ezel, director of customs department of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, fled to the Greek-Cypriot region after being implicated in a case of smuggled arms destined for secret Armenian organizations, it was reported. He had left his office yesterday (Monday) [as received] for his home but never arrived there. His wife alerted the police. The preliminary investigation revealed that Ezel first went to the Dhikelia British base and then to Larnaca where he contacted the Greek-Cypriot authorities and said he wanted to go to London. The investigation goes on, according to Turkish Cypriot sources.

EEC CONTINUES SUPPORT FOR UK ON FALKLANDS

LD091434 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1417 GMT 9 May 82

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Brussels]

[Text] Common Market foreign ministers today gave their continued backing for Britain in the Falklands crisis at their meeting in the Belgian countryside.

Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym had gone to the informal talks to persuade his partners to continue full support, following signs of discontent. Belgium Foreign Minister Leo Tindemans announced after the meeting at a chateau near Liege that Britain's partners had confirmed their solidarity with Britain and repeated their call for the withdrawal of Argentine troops according to UN Security Council Resolution 502. But they reached no conclusion about continuing EEC trade sanctions against Argentina, which expire on May 17. Formal talks will take place before May 17 to settle the future of the sanctions agreement.

While Mr Tindemans, president in the office of the EEC ministers, stressed the solidarity of all community countries for Britain at the political and diplomatic level, he would not comment on the attitudes of individual countries, such as Ireland, which has demanded an immediate end to the sanctions because of the military struggle.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE CANNOT AGREE ON TURKEY STANCE

PM050943 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 30 Apr 82 p 17

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA dispatch: "Stray Stuck to his Guns"]

[Excerpts] Strasbourg -- The Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers failed to reach agreement on a communique on Turkey at its meeting in Strasbourg on Thursday [29 April]. Norwegian Foreign Minister Svenn Stray asked for a reply from the Turkish foreign minister which would commit the country to respecting human rights and to reintroducing democracy.

Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen found these demands completely unacceptable and stressed that the Turkish Government would not make such a declaration. Foreign Minister Stray then said that a positive reply to the parliamentary assembly was impossible, so that it was not possible to reach agreement on a communique. Stray was unwilling to accept a communique text which did not contain a clear political message to those in power in Ankara.

Swedish Criticism

PM051443 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 30 Apr p 3

[TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA dispatch: "Turkey -- Junta Criticized by Ullsten"]

[Excerpts] Strasbourg -- "In the long run Turkey cannot be tolerated as a member of the Council of Europe, which is a forum for Europe's democracies, unless democracy is reintroduced," Swedish Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten stressed on Thursday [29 April] when the Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers discussed the situation in Turkey.

"At the same time as the military regime in Turkey is talking about reintroducing democracy we hear new reports of torture, death sentences and executions. It is therefore important that the Council of Europe continue to follow developments in the country closely," Ullsten said.

NATO COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON FALKLANDS 7 MAY

LD071154 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1119 GMT 7 May 82

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Brussels]

[Text] NATO Secretary-General Dr Joseph Luns today referred to the alliance's full support for Britain "and its actions" in the Falklands dispute. The "great stumbling block" now seemed to be that Argentina was insisting on sovereignty over the islands, he told a press conference at the end of a two day meeting of NATO's 14-member Defence Planning Committee. A final communique issued today repeated, word for word, the condemnation of Argentina's armed invasion expressed by European defence ministers in a statement yesterday.

Dr Luns told the press conference: "The full support of the alliance was reiterated for Great Britain and its actions." But his apparent specific endorsement of Britain's military strategy was not reflected in the communique. On the Falklands' invasion it simply said: "Ministers endorsed the statement by Eurogroup ministers in their communique of the previous day in which they condemned Argentina's invasion of the Falkland Islands and the dependancies as well as her failure to comply with Security Council Resolution Number 502; noted the importance of maintaining the principle that aggression or occupation of territory by force should not be allowed to succeed; and urged the need to seek a negotiated solution acceptable to all parties concerned on the basis of the implementation of Security Council Resolution Number 502 in all its parts." The communique also referred to continuing consultations between NATO allies on any deployment of NATO forces outside the NATO area.

The defence ministers stressed their "common interest in the security, stability and sovereign independence of the countries outside the NATO area." The communique went on: "At the same time military aggression in areas outside NATO has potential to threaten the vital interests of members of the alliance." They could contribute directly, or indirectly to efforts to deter aggression outside the NATO area. Consultation on such external deployment of forces was intended to identify common objectives, "taking full account of the political situation in the area concerned and of the effect on alliance security and defence capability as well as the national interests of member countries."

Asked about the effect on NATO of the deployment of British forces away from the normal NATO operations area, Dr Luns said: "It stands to reason that the naval strength of the alliance at this moment is less than it was three weeks ago. But only if we envisage the possibility -- probability -- of a crisis requiring all the naval strength of the alliance would it bring any worry."

He pointed out that NATO strengths had been reduced in the past, most recently because of U.S. action in Vietnam, without problems.

He expressed hope for a political solution to the Falklands' crisis, but added: "The great stumbling block seems to be that Argentina wants its sovereignty over the Falkland Islands established and there is nothing to say about that."

[Excerpt] At a press conference today in the late afternoon, CSSR Foreign Minister Chnoupek commented favorably on the results of the visit. He said:

Asked about forthcoming political trials against civil rights activists in Prague, Chnoupek said:

[Begin recording] I don't know where such trials were talked about, perhaps here in Austria or in Western countries, but in our country no such trials were discussed. All I know is that there will be no such trials in our country, in the CSSR. [end recording]

SPADOLINI WINDS UP TALKS WITH SCHMIDT IN HAMBURG

[Text] Hamburg, 7 May (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and his Italian counterpart Giovanni Spadolini once again spoke firmly in favor of a peaceful settlement of the Falklands conflict. After a meeting in Hamburg, at which Foreign Ministers Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Emilio Colombo were also present, both politicians in a joint communique expressed great concern for the development of the conflict and described the "total execution of Resolution 502 of the UN Security Council" as indispensable.

In order to avoid having to mourn the loss of further human life, they support the immediate implementation of a cease-fire, accompanied by the simultaneous start of a withdrawal of forces on both sides, the communique said. Spadolini added that with this statement the Governments of the FRG and Italy took the same view as was already expressed by France.

The talk, which continues the regular German-Italian consultations, centered again on relations between Europe and the United States, the East-West relationship and problems of the world economy.

Both governments leaders also epressed their concern over the continuing high interest rate of the dollar in the United States. At the forthcoming economic summit in Versailles this subject will have to be discussed because of the negative effects of the high interest rate on investment activity in Europe, Schmidt said. Spadolini said that at Versailles Europe has to advance its joint viewpoint against that of the United States.

At the forthcoming NATO summit conference in Bonn on 10 June the "alliance" unity and readiness to act must be shown" and new forms of consultation between Europe and the United States sought, according to the two government leaders. Schmidt and Spadolini expressly holding on to NATO's dual decision. The preservation of balance is necessary because of the danger of destabilization in East-West relations.

Both politicians continue to view developments in Poland with concern. Spadolini said that 5 months after the declaration of martial law, trade union rights and basic rights are still being trampled on. Both heads of government agreed that this situation has to be changed as soon as possible. What the Polish people really feel has been shown in the 1 May demonstrations.

Spadolini, who went on a tour of the harbor during the afternoon, accompanied by the chancellor, signed his name in the Golden Book of the city during a visit to the town hall. The Italian Government leader will flyon to Berlin for a private visit on Saturday.

POLISH OFFICIAL BEGINS POLITICAL TALKS IN BONN

[Text] Bonn, 10 May (DPA) -- Edward Kowalczyk, Polish deputy premier and chairman of the Central Committee of the Polish Democratic Party [SD], today began political talks in Bonn. Kowalczyk, who is in Bonn at the invitation of the FDP, first had a meeting today with FDP Parliamentary Group Chief Wolfgang Mischinck. The exchange of views in the Thomas Dehler house is to be continued this afternoon at a talk with FDP Party Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Kowalczyk, head of the small democratic minority party in Poland, will speak on Tuesday and Wednesday with Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff [FDP] and Hans-Juergen Wischnewski (SPD), minister in the chancellor's office, as well as visit the Baden-Wuerttemberg FDP Regional Diet Group in Stuttgart.

BUNDESTAG DEPUTY RETURNS FROM VISIT TO POLAND

LD080912 Hamburg DPA in German 0722 GMT 8 May 82

[Text] Oldenburg, 8 May (DPA) -- In the view of SPD Bundestag Deputy Walter Polkehn the further fate of Poland will decisively depend on a dialogue with the workers as well as on a stabilization of the economy within the next months. Polkehn, member of the Bundestag Foreign Affairs Committee, returned on Friday from a 5-day visit to Warsaw. Together with his colleague from the Parliamentary Group, Volker Neumann, he held official talks with Sejm deputies and with government representatives, as guests of the Polish parliament.

Polkehn told DPA on Friday evening that in talks with the Polish partners they affirmed their intention to continue the reform process in Poland. According to the Polish side, this also includes the existence of a trade union independent of the state and party, which could not however, consider itself as an independent political force beside the party. The Polish partners in the talks appealed expressly to the German side not to impose sanctions on Poland within the framework of the EEC and to allow further credits as much as possible. In Polkehn's view the supply of basic foodstuffs to the Polish population is largely sufficient. But the mood is depressed.

GENSCHER WELCOMES REAGAN DISARMAMENT PROPOSAL

LD100838 Hamburg DPA in German 0808 GMT 10 May 82

[Text] Bonn, 10 May (DPA) -- The American President's disarmament offer could have "a positive effect on the Geneva negotiations on medium-range nuclear systems, to which we still attach maximum importance," Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said today. The foreign minister's statement emphasizes the United States' "serious efforts" for arms control. The Federal Government backs Washington's intention of wanting to negotiate not only on limitations but also on "substantial reductions" of strategic weapons.

Initial comment by the Federal Government late on Sunday evening described the Reagan proposals as a "substantial widening of the East-West dialogue."

Genscher also underlined on behalf of the Federal Government the hope that "other important East-West negotiations" will receive "fresh inpetus" as a result of the American proposals.

BUNDESWEHR WOULD NOT PROVIDE TROOPS FOR UN FORCE

LD091400 Hamburg DPA in German 1254 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] Bonn, 9 May (DPA) -- Under no circumstances will the Bundeswehr make soldiers available for a possible UN force in the Falklands. This was stated by a Foreign Ministry spokesman on Sunday in response to an enquiry. It remains open whether the Federal Government would make civilians available if the United Nations successfully intervened in the British-Argentine conflict over the Falkland Islands.

The spokesman was referring to a report in DER SPIEGEL, which mentions an Argentine desire to have the FRG alone among the European powers participate in an international interim administration of the islands. This is alluded to in UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar's peace plan for the Falklands. The sole Latin American representative would be Brazil. If the UN official requests assistance, the FRG will not refuse, DER SPIEGEL said. The Bundeswehr has never previously participated actively in a UN peace force for constitutional as well a foreign and inter-German political reasons. The argument is that, among other things, the task of the Bundeswehr is only defensive. German forces have given only logistical support to the United Nations, such as air transport.

Obviously the conflict over the Malvinas will also be a major topic.

Accepts Bulgarian Invitation

LD080742 Paris Domestic Service in French 0600 GMT 8 May 82

[Text] The head of state has accepted in principle an invitation to pay an official visit to Bulgaria, said Minister of External Relations Claude Cheysson at the end of his 48-hour official visit to Sofia. This presidential visit, the date of which is yet to be set, will not take place this year since Francois Mitterrand's schedule is already too busy. In any case, this will be the first visit by a French head of state to Bulgaria.

PCF SECRETARY VIEWS GOVERNMENT POLICIES

PM100827 Paris LE MATIN in French 4 May 82 p 2

[Dominique Burg interview with PCF Central Committee Secretary Paul Laurent; date and place not given]

[Excerpts] LE MATIN: The PCF seems to have been evolving toward more unitary positions over the past few weeks, even on Poland. Why have you not gone further?

Laurent: We are and will remain members of the union. We are implementing our 24th congress policy: To build a French brand of socialism by making progress in the necessary social, economic and cultural reforms, and by making progess at the rate decided by the French people. As for Poland, we said from the start, after the serious events of December, that the important thing, once bloodshed has been averted, is to move toward the necessary economic reforms and democratic renewal, and the complete restoration of freedoms. If there are differences of opinion they relate to the attitude to adopt to the events themselves and to the way of helping Poland overcome them. Events in Poland at this very moment show that those differences should not have prevented unity on 1 May.

LE MATIN: You talk of the rate chosen by the French people. But does there not seem to be a people's movement supporting the government?

Laurent: Success depends on the union but also on the mobilization of the people's forces. The implementation of the major reforms cannot just be a matter for the government. Let us take an example: The government lines on professional training for young people are the right ones. But they require negotiations, struggles in the municipalities and in the enterprises to determine the rate and methods for putting them into practice. Everything is not contained in laws or in a rigid timetable. Action by those concerned is necessary. For instance, we have never had any illusion that the employers were going to throw themselves eagerly into the solidarity contracts. That is the subject of a struggle. Moreover, the policy to promote investment poses a problem for us. We are not hostile in principle to support for reviving production. But the decision to grant an additional Fr18 billion to the employers is not accompanied by any guarantee that that money will create jobs and that it may help to develop the country's economy.

LE MATIN: Do you think that decision is the sign of a new political line taken by the government?

Laurent: It just strikes us that the government's attitude in that sphere was affected more by the idea of compromise than by the search for means for helping revive production and create jobs. The employers' attitude since 10 May gives no grounds for tranquility. We must not count on their goodwill. In our view all the economic measures should be aimed at solving the great problem of employement and social inequalities. A binding framework must be fixed, and if money is given it must be known from whom it comes and for what it is to be used. Nonetheless that is merely our judgement of a government initiative. We are fully committed to the government in a constructive way and to the effort to make the change succeed in the country. However that does not make us yes-men.

LE MATIN: Could the lack of government cohesion, which emerged recently, have negative effects on the chances of success?

Laurent: The vital thing is that the government should act while remembering that it was adversaries. There is nothing dramatic about those events as such. But in some circumstances natural or necessary differences can give rise to campaigns and manipulation. That must be borne in mind.

PERONIST LEADER DEFENDS ARGENTINE INTERESTS

NC071837 Paris AFP in English 1703 GMT 7 May 82

[Text] Paris, 7 May (AFP) -- Argentina's Peronist Party is ready to defend Argentine sovereignty over the Falklands, a Peronist leader said here today. The Peronist, Jorge Vazquez, immediately added in a conversation with AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE that this position in no way implied support for Argentina's "military dictatorship."

Mr Vazquez, a former undersecretary of state for foreign affairs, is on a tour of Europe for the Peronist party, whose official name is the Justicialist Party, Argentina's strongest. The party leader said that his tour aimed at "setting up a parallel diplomacy by representatives of the (Argentine) people, so as to break out of the isolation into which six years of dictatorship have plunged Argentina."

The Argentine people, Mr Vazquez declared, reject any negotiation on soveriegnty over the Falklands and "will bring to trial anyone ready to do so." He added such people would be tried "just as will be tried those who in the course of the past six years of crushing the production apparatus have squandered the national heritage."

PCI'S BERLINGUER DECLARES 'WAR' ON TERRORISM

AU071933 Rome ANSA in English 1917 GMT 7 May 82

[Text] Rome, 7 May (ANSA) -- Italian Communist Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer today declared war on terrorism, the camorra and the mafia. At a press conference here today, the leader of the West's largest communist party called on the people and all of the state's forces to launch an all-out battle against terrorists and the underworld. The PCI conducted an inquiry into terrorism and crime bosses between November 1981 and January 1982. The party gathered up the responses to 136,000 questionnaires in 34 Italian provinces.

According to the results of this investigation, 86.3 percent of Italians polled considered terrorism one of the country's worst, if not the worst, problem. For 67.9 percent, the chief cause of terrorism in Italy was the government's inability to cope with the economic crisis and social disintegration and the failure to promote state renewal. Asked who benefited from terrorism, 36 percent said it was the country's moderate and reactionary forces in their efforts to strike at the PCI. 29.9 percent believed terrorism served reactionary forces in general to beat back the workers. Another 15.6 percent said that terrorism served the interests of no one.

As to terrorism's international links, most of those questioned (50.2 percent) believed that investigations must be made in all directions. 15.4 percent believed terrorism was backed by the Eastern European states. 12.4 percent believed in links with Western power centers; and 12.2 believed that Italian terrorism was a strictly national pennomenon without foreign links.

Berlinguer said that these problems will be the center of a Central Committee meeting to be held here Tuesday.

RESULTS OF CHRISTIAN DEMOCRATIC CONGRESS DEBATED

AU100836 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 10 May 82

[Text] Rome, 10 May (ANSA) -- As the new Christian Democratic National Council prepares to meet tomorrow to elect the party president and appoint the deputy secretaries, political forces continued today to debate the results of the DC National Congress. As soon as the new internal party arrangement is completed, newly-elected DC Secretary Cicaco de Mita will meet with Premier Giovanni Spadolini and with the secretaries of the other partners in the coalition government: The Socialists (PSI), the Social Democrats (PSDI), the Republicans (PRI) and the Liberals (PLI) in preparation for a verification of the government's platform.

Sunday the top DC leaders devoted their speeches to the memory of Aldo Moro, the party chairman slain by his Red Brigade kidnappers four years ago, on May 9, 1978.

Communist Party leader Enrico Berlinguer sized up the current political situation in Italy in his Sunday address. He lashed out against the two chief government partners -- the Christian Democrats and the Socialists -- whose only goals he said, seemed to be to keep the present five-way majority together no matter how inadequate or paralyzing it is. Berlinguer was also hard on the recent DC congress, which while reversing the previous congress in its choice of party leaders, nevertheless demonstrated a "vacuum" and "a basic contradiction", he said. The previous congress was contrary to any sort of government understanding with the Communists, while the new DC leadership showed a cautious opening towards the PCI, according to observers.

Berlingeuer proposed to build an alternative that would change political orientations and directions, find solutions to the nation's ills and develop new methods of government. He said that new spaces were opening up for PCI initiatives, adding that the party is a powerful force for change and renewal.

For his part, Premier Giovanni Spadolini spoke out vigorously in defense of the five-party formula which he has led since June of last year. Speaking in Venice at the concluding session of a congress of European democratic and liberal parties, he said that deep reasons existed for a balance of laic, Socialist and Catholic forces which must not be compromised by upcoming developments in Italian life.

Opposed to any cautious opening to the Communists by the new DC leadership was Socialist Deputy Secretary Claudio Martelli who claimed that the PCI's reactions to the DC congress were "confused and surprising" while Berlinguer's alternative was a belabored tactic to eventually resuscitate the historic compromise (a ruling agreement at the national level between the DC and the PCI).

With a view to the coming verification among the coalition partners, Liberal Party Deputy Secretary Alfredo Biondi yesterday called for clarity so that the government forces could emerge from their "ambiguity and uncertainty".

PRESS SPECULATES ON DC, PSI COALITION

AU071558 Rome ANSA in English 1520 GMT 7 May 82

[Text] Rome, 7 May (ANSA) -- With the Christian Democratic Party [Congress] over, the Italian political forces are now looking ahead to the much touted "verification" of accords between the coalition partners in Giovanni Spadolini's Government. All of the nation's press today expected problems ahead between the coalition's chief partners: the Christian Democrats (DC) and the Socialists (PSI). Newly elected DC Secretary Ciriaco de Mita has already given notice that the Socialists will have to learn to treat the DC differently. The PSI, which is seeking a bigger role in the national leadership, "asked for equal dignity" in the ruling arrangement, de Mita said, "and the rule has to apply to all."

The Socialist Party paper AVANTI today said it was struck by "the explosion of a gut anti-socialism" at the DC Congress.

Rome's REPUBBLICA claimed that PSI Secretary Bettino Craxi was not allowing a moment of truce to the new DC led by De Mita and was behind AVANTI's charges that "the DC cannot bear free and strong allies, is scared of alternating the government leadership, is horrified by any alternative and seems ready for anything as long as it can stop useful and possible change." The daily therefore warned that the coming verification might deteriorate into an open clash which could make the prospect of early elections this fall that much more likely.

The financial daily IL SOLE 24 ORE observed that De Mita was elected secretary in a close vote. He garnered 55.14 percent of the ballots as against his rival Arnaldo Folani's 42.16 percent and won the edge with "an atypical center-left alliance', the paper said. He will now have to sound out the DC's chief government ally, the Socialists, who ever since the congress are irritable and restless and who now seem bent on widening the distance between the two parties, IL SOLE maintained.

For IL GIORNO Craxi did not like the way the congress went and is not in a cooperative mood. The Milan daily believed that for the moment, at least, Craxi would do nothing until he saw what concrete moves De Mita made. Both the Socialists and the Social Democrats have indicated that DC must explain what exactly they want, the paper said. The Liberals are also asking for a clarification of intent, while the Republicans are not making waves, IL GIORNO added. The Social Democrats, Liberals and Republicans are the three minor partners in the Sapdolini Government.

Rome's IL TEMPO lamented the dearth of meaningful policy debates at the DC Congress. Those who awaited precious indications on programs and orientations that could be brought before the government partners for study during the coming "verification" were sadly dissappointed, the paper said.

POLITICAL, ECONOMIC ISSUES SHELVE USSR GAS DEAL

PM070855 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 3 May 82 p 41

[Alberto Valverde report]

[Excerpt] The Spanish-Soviet talks on sales of Siberian gas to Spain have been postponed indefinitely even before the two sides have held an initial formal meeting. Political and, above all, economic problems have forced the Spanish side to temporarily suspend what it was believed would be a rapid process and to make a more detailed analysis of the costs and consequences of conveying over a distance of over 5,000 km a hydrocarbon which, even in this decade, might not prove competitive because of its present high price compared to other energy sources.

Reliable sources have informed EL PAIS that, despite the "political will to continue these talks in the near future," the need for further technical and economic studies into the viability and cost of conveying Siberian gas over such a long distance has necessitated a comprehensive reassessment of the entire matter.

The same sources do not expect that any formal contacts will take place between the two countries before July, especially following the political problems that seem to have emerged recently in relations between Moscow and Madrid.

Although the main reason for the "intensive and detailed study" of the matter seems to be of an economic and financial nature, diplomatic sources have also indicated the strong influence that the political implications may have exerted on the decisions taken.

In this connection, the bad phase being experienced by Spanish-Soviet relations, recently reflected in the expulsion from Spain of two Soviet officials charged with espionage activities, seems to have been a decisive factor in the subsequent postponement of formal negotiations, whose start was scheduled for 23 May.

Another factor that seems to have acted in favor of the postponement are Washington's pressures on the European countries regarding the strategic inopportuneness of dependence on Soviet supplies of natural gas when other, less risky sources can be found.

Some sources have indicated that although Spain's position is to ignore in principle any kind of external interference in its soveriegn affairs, an appraisal of the U.S. recommendations suggested a thorough technical examination of them, taking advantage of the lull imposed by other factors.

Despite the huge short-term importance of economic aspects in the postponement, gas industry sources consulted have explained to this newspaper that the basic reason for the wait is the reassessment that needs to be made of this country's policy on natural gas. These sources indicate that the policy of "converting Spain to gas" contained in the national energy plan (even in its revised form, recently submitted to the Cortes) necessitates greater clarification or at least complete specificity.

PRC GENERAL ARRIVES IN MADRID FOR WEEK-LONG VISIT

NC090630 Paris AFP in English 1801 GMT 8 May 82

[Text] Madrid, 8 May (AFP) -- General Wu Xiuquan, deputy chief of staff of the Chinese People's Liberation Army, arrived here today on a week-long official visit at the invitation of the Spanish Government. General Wu's trip will include visits to the Toledo Infantry Academy south of Madrid, the 12th Brigade of the Armoured Division, the Talavera la Real Air Base and other bases which military sources did not identify.

PYM SPEAKS TO PRESS AFTER COMMONS ADDRESS

LD071238 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1212 GMT 7 May 82

[Text] Mr Pym repeated the bulk of his Commons statement to a press conference for the benefit of the world's press -- to make sure Britain's message reached the rest of the world. He stressed that though he was sceptical of reported Argentine interest in the UN proposals, he had not given up hope of a peaceful solution.

But he warned that if Argentina rejected all peace proposals, Britain may still try to take the Falklands by force, though it was an option the government wanted to avoid if possible. "I am not in the business of closing doors, I am in the business of opening them," said Mr Pym.

The foreign secretary refuted a suggestion that the purpose of the press conference was to "soften up world opinion" in preparation for a British invasion of the Falklands next week. The conference was simply to set out Britain's position, he said. He also warned there could be further attacks on Port Stanley Airfield. "If they mend the airfield and start using it again and take advantage of it to attack our forces, we would bomb it again". "We do not wish to use any more military force than is necessary, but we will secure total exclusion zone," said Mr Pym.

Mr Pym told the conference: "We are not asking anything too much of the Argentines. They are the aggressor. They put their forces onto the island. They have poured in thousands of troops. The only thing I am asking them to do is get off that island." Asked how much time was left, Mr Pym replied, "That remains to be seen. I hope they will get off the islands without any escalation of military activity. I hope economic pressures and military pressures are having that effect. It could be within the next few days or a week or so that the Argentine will change their minds."

Mr Pym did not see any point in seeking a direct meeting with the Argentine foreign minister Mr Costa Mendez. "It is much better that someone talks to them and then talks to us," he said. Questioned about a time limit for the actual withdrawal of Argentine forces, Mr Pym said: "One does not want it to drag on for too long. It might be seven days or ten days. The number of days does not matter. There should be a clear period of time by which it is completed. The withdrawal must be verified. There are a number of ways in which that could be done."

Asked if raids on the Argentine mainland was a growing possibility, Mr Pym said: "I would not say that. We do not want to see an escalation of military activity. I would not exclude any possibility whatever. That would not be right. At some point in the future the circumstances may change. I must keep all the options open at present. We are only concerned with preserving the total exclusion zone. We do not know what is going to happen. It would not be right to exclude anything."

Mr Pym said that negotiations on the future of the islands could not take place on the basis that the end result was fixed in advance, as the Argentines had been suggesting. "Otherwise there is nothing to compromise on," he added. "What is the point of negotiation? Our attitude is completely reasonable."

However, Mr Pym seemed to indicate some slight change in the British approach to future negotiations on the status of the islands. Asked if self-determination of the islanders was still paramount, he replied: "Yes, it is basically." Mr Pym said it would be necessary to ascertain the wishes of the islanders when the crisis ended. He felt it would be some months before this could be done after the ending of the immediate crisis.

Asked how long the crisis was likely to drag on, Mr Pym replied: "It is up to the Argentines.

We have said they are going to leave that island. I will not put any time scale on it. Our objective is quite clear." Mr Pym said he was ready to fly to New York to meet the UN secretary general if he felt this would be useful, but he had no immediate plans to do so. This weekend he would be meeting Common Market foreign ministers in Belgium.

NIMRODS TO BE DEPLOYED IN SOUTH ATLANTIC

LD071254 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1236 GMT 7 May 82

[By Alan Jones, PA defense staff]

[Text] RAF Nimrods fitted with air-to-air refuelling probes will shortly be deployed to the South Atlantic, the Ministry of Defense disclosed today. Trials have been held over the past few days to fit the probes which would "broaden the operational options" open to the task force, Defense Ministry Spokesman Mr Ian McDonald told a news conference.

"Thanks to the efforts of those engaged in this work, both civilian and military, the trials have been successfully concluded and Nimrods using this new capability will shortly be deployed to the South Atlantic," he added. Mr McDonald also said that a "significant number" of RAF Harriers, already on their way to support the task force, had been fitted with Sidewinder missiles.

He said the ministry had no further knowledge of the two Harriers that disappeared yesterday. And he added that there had been no operations in the South Atlantic over the past 24 hours.

EXCLUSION ZONE EXTENDED TO 12 MILES FROM COAST

LD071738 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0725 GMT 7 May 82

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defense correspondent]

[Text] Any Argentine warship or military aircraft found more than 12 miles from the mainland coast will, with immediate effect, be regarded as hostile and "liable to be dealt with accordingly," by British forces, the Defense Ministry announced tonight. A tough statement said the new move came because "of the proximity of Argentine bases and the distances that hostile forces can cover, particularly at night and in bad weather."

Ministry Spokesman Mr Ian McDonald said the government "has consistently made clear that the UK has the right to take whatever additional measures may be needed in exercise of its inherent right of self-defense," under the United Nations Charter. Mr McDonald pledged that the government "will take all necessary measures in the South Atlantic in the self-defense of British ships and aircraft engaged in operations, and in resupplying and reinforcing British forces in the South Atlantic."

He warned that if the Argentinian Government "did not show the same readiness and desire to reach a peaceful settlement, it should be in no doubt that her majesty's government would do whatever may be necessary to bend the unlawful Argentine occupation of the Falklands Islands." Mr McDonald recalled that on April 23, Britain set up a defensive zone around its forces in the South Atlantic, warning that any approach by Argentine warships, submarines, naval auxiliaries or military aircraft which threatened the task force "would encounter the appropriate response."

This no-go-zone also covers all Argentine aircraft including civil aircraft engaging in surveillance. "In addition, her majesty's government has made clear that all Argentine vessels, including merchant vessels or fishing vessels apparently engaging in surveillance of, or intelligence gathering activities against, British forces in the South Atlantic, would also be regarded as hostile, and were liable to be dealt with accordingly."

Seven days later the 200-mile total exclusion zone was thrown around the Falklands, applying not only to Argentine warships and naval auxiliaries and aircrafts, whether military or civil, but also to other ships, including merchant and fishing vessels operating in support of the illegal occupation. It is understood that tonight's move does not imply an intention or warning that Argentine mainland bases could come under attack by British forces. It is being seen as yet another turn of the screw of military pressure on the Argentine Government and a further demonstration of the government's determination and resolve to achieve a speedy settlement.

ARGENTINES CLAIM ATTACK BEGUN ON FALKLANDS

LD090826 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0818 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] The Ministry of Defence in London said it could not confirm a claim by the Argentine military high command that British forces had begun an attack on the Falkland Islands early today. "We have no news of this at the moment," said the ministry spokesman.

BBC television reported that according to Argentine radio, the attack began more than 3 1/2 hours ago and was being repelled by Argentine forces.

Throughout yesterday, Britain's warships faced fog, extensive cloud cover and low visibility as they patrolled the no-go zone, newly extended to within 12 miles of the Argentine coast. Defence Ministry Spokesman Mr Ian McDonald said in London that a "tented town" had now group up [as received] on Ascension Island, the staging post for British forces heading for the Falklands. The island is being used by Royal Marines and the 3rd Battalion, Parachute Regiment, for exercises -- as well as by the RAF to base VC10s and Hercules aircraft.

Defense Ministry Denial

LD090936 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0925 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] The Ministry of Defence in London firmly refuted this morning's Argentine claims that British forces had launched an attack on the Falkland Islands.

In a statement, a ministry spokesman said: "There are some reports from foreign sources that our task forces have begun an attack to recover the Falkland Islands. This is not true. We are, of course, continuing our patrols to maintain the total exclusion zone around the Falkland Islands."

BENN ADDRESSES FALKLANDS PEACE RALLY IN LONDON

LD091020 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1007 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] Most of the British people are opposed to any further killings in "Mrs Thatcher's war" against the Argentine, Mr Tony Benn claimed at a Falklands peace rally in London's Hyde Park today. "The BBC and ITV news bulletins, which are now the mouthpieces of the Ministry of Defence, have tried to ignore us. The gutter press have called us traitors. But the British people support us," he said. "They know that our servicemen were sent to the Falklands without any authority from the House of Commons or any declaration of war. They know that the prime minister is determined to fight at whatever cost behind a smoke-screen of talk about a negotiated settlement. They know that the world will not support an all-out war and that there can be no permanent military victory, and in the end the United Nations must take charge."

The peace movement, which would go on until the war was stopped, was making three clear demands. "First, we demand an immediate and unconditional cease-fire before more lives are lost," he said. "Second, we demand the transfer of sovereignty of the Falklands at once to the UN, and third, we demand that the fleet be brought home. We shall carry on this campaign for peace in the streets and in Parliament until the government stops the war -- and we shall succeed."

THATCHER EXPECTED TO CALL MEETING OF INNER CABINET

LD091036 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1029 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] The prime minister, who has been spending the weekend at Chequers, is returning to Downing Street later today. Mrs Thatcher is expected to call a meeting of her inner cabinet to review developments in the Falklands crisis, particularly the Argentine claim that British forces have landed on the Falklands. Her aides said today that this report was "not true." However, Argentina's decision to make the claim suggested in London that there is no basic change in the junta's position. If hopes of a diplomatic settlement were improving it is assumed that the junta would not want to broadcast to its people reports of new clashes.

Influential Conservative Party opinion is convinced that Britain is on the verge of landing forces on the Falklands, if only to strengthen the British position in negotiations. A landing, it was pointed out, does not necessarily mean a frontal assault. Batches of troops could be landed at several points on the Falklands, probably without detection. The weekend events have done little to alter the impression that landings are still imminent. The inner cabinet will review negotiations at the United Nations involving the secretary general Mr Javier Perez de Cuellar, who had separate talks with the Argentines and Britain's ambassador Sir Anthony Parsons.

ARGENTINE DEFENSE MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON ITV

LD091332 London ITV Television Network in English 1100 GMT 9 May 82

[Interview with Argentine Defense Minister Amadeo Frugoli, conducted in Buenos Aires on 8 May by Cresta Norris and carried on the "Weekend World" program -- recorded; Frugoli replies in Spanish with superimposed English translation]

[Text] [Question] How does the Argentinian Government react to the cease-fire proposal?

[Answer] The Argentine Government responded affirmatively to the UN secretary general's proposal to initiate friendly discussions in order to try to find a peaceful solution to the dispute existing with Great Britain. It was pointed out that for these negotiations to take place there would have to be a cease-fire.

[Question] Would you withdraw your troops immediately a cease-fire was announced?

[Answer] The cease-fire means specifically that no military operation should be carried out but it does not imply a withdrawal of troops.

[Question] The British have always insisted during negotiations that the islanders should be able to choose for themselves which country has sovereignty over them. How do you react to that?

[Answer] Argentina has never accepted the argument of self-determination for the inhabitants of the Malvinas Islands, because that argument has no justification since what is involved is a population which was transported there by a colonial power, in this case Britain, which took over the Malvinas Islands by force in 1833.

[Question] How much consultation would you allow the islanders?

[Answer] I repeat that the argument of self-determination does not apply to the Malvinas because it is not a population which has always been settled there. It was, I repeat, taken there by a colonial power, Great Britain, when they took the Malvinas by force in 1833.

[Question] Turning now to the United Nations peace proposals, the main stumbling block from the British Government's point of view seems to be the insistence so far of the Argentine Government that Argentine sovereignty over the islands be guaranteed before any negotiations.

Is there any change under any circumstances that the Argentine Government might change its position on this?

[Answer] It is quite clear that the acknowledgement of the unquestionable rights to sovereignty of the government and the people of Argentina to the Malvinas Islands can in no way be disregarded by Great Britain. This is an essential point which marks a limit in the negotiations.

[Question] Would you accept the UN plan if it left the question of sovereignty of the islands to be decided when the trusteeship was concluded?

[Answer] This depends on the circumstances. What I want to make perfectly clear is that the Republic of Argentina will never relinquish its rights of sovereignty to the Malvinas Islands. But whether during the diplomatic negotiations we can establish a particular sequence to deal with the problems is a different matter which will depend on how the diplomatic talks develop. But the principle of the recognition of sovereignty over the Malvinas Islands is unchanged. But this does not mean we do not take into account the interests of the Malvinas inhabitants, and we are prepared to acknowledge their rights to own property, to compensation or other arrangements of an economic nature, which may result from the possession of the islands by the Argentine Government. Moreover, the Argentine Government has stressed on numerous occasions that it does not intend to adopt any measures which would involve an abrupt change in the lifestyle of the islanders, and those who wish to leave the islands because they do not feel happy have every opportunity to do so and this has applied from the very beginning.

[Question] Has the sinking of the General Belgrano and the loss of lives made the government more or less flexible?

[Answer] The sinking of the cruiser General Belgrano by the British submarine Conqueror outside the exclusion zone established by the Government of Great Britian has meant the loss of human lives. This painful event has only strengthened the spirit of the Argentine people who are now more determined than ever to defend their legitimate rights.

[Question] And any military action taken by Britain will not make the government here more prepared to discuss the issue?

[Answer] I repeat that the Republic of Argentina will never under any circumstances relinquish its legitimate rights of sovereignty over the Malvinas Islands.

[Question] If the British continue with an air and naval blockade around the islands, would you breach it?

[Answer] The Argentine Government did not heed the blockade originally established in the 200-mile area around the Malvinas. The British Government has now extended the blockade up to 12 miles from the coast of the Argentine mainland. This act undoubtedly constitutes a further aggression and a positive threat to intensify and extend the scope of military operations. And this happens at a time when Britain claims to be fully prepared to start diplomatic negotiations. Really it is impossible to understand how, on the one hand, they can state their desire to seek a diplomatic settlement, while on the other hand they extend the exclusion zone to the limits which I have just stated.

[Question] If the British were to bomb people and places on the Argentine mainland, how would the Argentine Government and people react?

[Answer] The reaction will be to respond to the attack with all our operational capabilities.

[Question] What would be your response to an invasion of the islands by Britain?

[Answer] My response is the response which will undboutedly be given by the Argentine forces deployed on the Malvinas Islands who will use their full operational capabilities to defend our legitimate rights.

[Question] So do you think that the fighting will get more intense or that a settlement will be reached?

[Answer] Argentina has, from the very outset, been ready to seek a peaceful settlement to this dispute. And in this she only continues a long and honorable tradition of respect for international relations and peaceful solutions of disputes between countries. But she certainly cannot accept willy-nilly without defending herself from the aggression to which Great Britain has subjected her for so many years. The Government of Great Britain has not shown willingness to negotiate and find a solution to the problem. For 149 years she has maintained an illegitimate hold over the islands despite the repeated and permanent claims which have been made since then by all the Argentine governments. And for the past 17 years we have negotiated in the framework of the UN based on resolutions adopted by the General Assembly, but no specific results have been obtained.

TASK FORCE INVOLVED IN 'ACTIVITY' AROUND ISLANDS

LD091402 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1357 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] The British task force is engaged in "activity" around the Falkland Islands, the Ministry of Defense confirmed today. But Spokesman Mr Ian McDonald could give no more details. In a brief statement he said: "As we announced earlier today, and contrary to Argentine claims, our task force has not launched an invasion to recover the Falkland Islands.

"There is, however, continuing task force activity to maintain the total exclusion zone around the Falklands, and to keep up the pressure on the Argentine forces on the islands. I have at present no further details of today's activities." Mr McDonald said he could not comment on Argentine claims that the task force today attacked airstrips on the Falklands. He also could not comment on an Argentine claim that an Argentine fishing vessel had been sunk by a British Harrier in the Falklands area.

OPPOSITION LEADER ARGUES AGAINST INVASION

LD091404 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1253 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] An invasion of the Falkland Islands would be a "monstrous gamble," opposition leader Michael Foot said today. Such a move "would involve very great possibilities of the loss of human life." He added that an invasion "could conceivably injure very greatly the support we get from many other countries."

Mr Foot, speaking on BBC Radio Four's "World This Weekend" programme, said that he was not excluding the possibility of further military action, but emphasized that bombing the Argentine mainland would "destroy other countries' support for Britain." Mr Foot went on: "If you come to the direct question of a major frontal invasion I think in those circumstances... that would be a monstrous gamble." He added: "I still believe it's possible to get a peaceful settlement and the best way of getting it is through the United Nations. We have got to do everything conceivable to try to make these diplomatic discussions succeed at the UN."

Asked if he disowned the views put forward by Mr Tony Benn, Mr Foot replied: "I disown the view put forward by some people that you can solve this problem just by a cease-fire and nothing else. That isn't a solution to the problem. It merely means that the Argentinians would get away with everything they've proposed."

And, referring to opinion polls which showed a majority opposed to Labour's views on the crisis, Mr Foot said: "I would not be greatly weighed by the polls one way or another. I believe that the polls would change very greatly if, indeed, the appalling tragedy of very serious loss of life were to occur."

NOTT CONSIDERS OPTIONS IN ITV INTERVIEW

LD091450 London ITV Television Network in English 1100 GMT 9 May 82

[Interview with UK Defense Secretary John Nott by Brian Walden on the "Weekend World" program -- live]

[Text] [Question] First of all Mr Nott, as you know there have been a series of reports that we have been getting all morning, and all the other news agencies from Buenos Aires, that we have invaded the Falkland Islands. Now our Ministry of Defense -- your Ministry of Defense -- has officially denied this. Can you confirm that denial?

[Answer] Yes. We've not invaded the Falkland Islands, although we are of course continuing to enforce the total exclusion zone around the islands.

[Question] Is anything going on down there that could give any sort of credence to these Argentine reports?

[Answer] Well, we have not launched a full-scale invasion. The activity down there is normally reported to us rather later in the day, but we are certainly ensuring that no supplies of any kind can get into the islands. That has been successful so far and that it is our present policy, to totally isolate the occupying forces on the Falkland Islands.

[Question] I notice you used the words that we have not launched a full-scale invasion. Obviously I am going to be very careful, almost as careful as you will in answering me, not to probe into operational matters, but does not launching a full-scale invasion mean that we might have some people on the islands who in fact are not launching a full-scale invasion but are doing important work there?

[Answer] You are free to speculate as much as you want, Mr Walden.

[Question] And I take it that the speculation would not be entirely frivolous if in fact I did assume that we were taking preliminary steps to prepare for a possible invasion?

[Answer] I can't comment on that.

[Question] I understand. Let me ask about this possible invasion, let me first of all draw your attention to a report that appeared in THE OBSERVER newspaper this morning which suggested that in fact Britain had given Argentina an ultimatum, namely 24 hours, to get out -- if you don't get out we'll throw you out. Is that true? Has the British Government given such an ultimatum?

[Answer] No, we've given no such ultimatum. We did originally enforce the maritime exclusion zone successfully, no ships got through, we are now enforcing a total blockade and that so far has been successful. Two days ago, as you know, we announced a different policy so far as the 12-mile zone from the shore was concerned, and that is to protect our reinforcement shipping and the very large number of ships which are coming, protected of course by the Royal Navy to join the task force. I think the British public understand that it is possible to move from the Argentinian shore into a threatening position against our task force and our reinforcement shipping in bad weather very quickly, and this is something we must protect our fleet against, and we will not hold back in anything at all in the protection of our own ships and men pursuing their task in the South Atlantic.

[Question] I want to come back to your statement that we will not hold back from anything at all to protect the ships in the task force. Can I however ask you, because you well remember the last time you talked to me and indeed things that you have said subsequently, can I take it that of course there is every likelihood of an invasion of the Falkland Islands to recapture them for our sovereignty if the Argentinian Government maintains its present position?

[Answer] Well, I see my task and the task of the chief of staff to provide to the cabinet a range of military options at every stage. It is our job to so place our fleets and their supporting troops in a position that they are able to take a range of options. The cabinet under the prime minister will then decide what we do. So that is our policy in the Ministry of Defense, to provide a wide range of options, a wide range of choices of a military nature, should they be required.

[Question] So if I were the prime minister and I summoned presumably first the war cabinet, subsequently the full cabinet, and talked to the chiefs of staff, and decided tomorrow that further diplomatic efforts were quite hopeless -- advised by Mr Pym perhaps that we weren't going to get anywhere and that the Argentianians were simply doing this deliberately to weaken the strength of our task force -- and she then turned to you and said: Well, I think I want to go for an invasion, you have given her the means to do that, have you?

[Answer] We are quite confident that if we have no other choice that we will be able at the appropriate time to repossess the Falkland Islands by military means.

[Question] All right. Now I must ask you about some of the worries that have been expressed about that -- again of course one does not want to know any operational details -- I am talking about the general strategy. Some people say that we haven't got enough men there and we'll never get enough men there to be able to overcome the Argentinian defenders. How do you accept that?

[Answer] Well I think you ought to look first at quality of our men and their equipment. As I said to you when I was last on this program, the Royal Marines, for instances, are an all-volunteer body of professional soldiers who spend much of their time training in Arctic warfare. They have all the equipment for it. This is quite different from the troops, the Argentinian troops in the islands. They are not properly equipped, they are not used to fighting in these conditions, they are isolated from their friends, from supply, and the morale of the troops in the islands is going to be in a very different state from that of our own professional soldiers who can't be having a very pleasant time, tossing around in the South Atlantic, but they are warm and they are properly equipped. It is the quality of our mean and equipment which I think will be the key issue if the time comes.

[Question] How do you know that the Argentinian troops on the Falklands are not properly equipped?

[Answer] Well, from every report that we receive it is clear that the morale of those troops, young conscripts, is already low.

[Question] I noticed you said if the time comes, is that time likely to come sooner or later?

[Answer] No, I said that my task is to provide to the prime minister and the cabinet a range of options. Of course what we would like is Resolution 502 of the United Nations to be accepted by the Argentinians. I saw the very hard line in an intrasigent interview by the Argentine minister of defense. He talked about a peaceful solution, but the United Nations has already declared a mandatory resolution requiring the Argentine occupying forces to withdraw, and that he did not refer to.

[Question] I think I must ask you at this point, I want to ask in a moment about air cover for possible invasion of the Falklands by our boys. But I think I must ask you at this point because you said it yourself and I think everybody would agree with you, we too would like to have a negotiated settlement...

[Answer] Yes.
[Question] So that no more blood must be spilled...
[Answer] Yes.
[Question] But you saw what their minister of defense said...
[Answer] Yes.
[Question] Does that mean, if that in any sense represents the view of the Argentinian Government, and it must to a considerable extent, does that mean that diplomatically it's now quite hopeless?

[Answer] Well I think we've always expected that the junta might seek to play for time. We always expected that if they could they would take this into the United Nations with the idea of playing it along diplomatically. And I can say quite emphatically that given that was a possibility and that they were not serious about giving up their spoils, giving up their aggression, being in possession of the islands they were not going to give them up, we have always throughout this thing continued to move forward remorselessly. So if we are forced and have no other choice but to repossess the islands, that will be open to us and we have not up to now, in these past few weeks held back in any way at all in placing ourselves in the position to make that ultimate choice should it become necessary.

[Question] I wonder if I could ask you on, further on that point, it isn't a matter here of military strategy but you are a very important member of the war cabinet. The Argentinian junta doesn't appear to have moved 1 inch. Is there really any substantial diplomatic hope left at all?

[Answer] Yes I believe there is. I think that the proposals, the outlined proposals which have been put forward by the secretary general do not differ in a very major way from the proposals put forward by the Peruvian president and which we accepted last week, you mentioned them at the beginning of your program, and no one could suggest we have been intransigent. There have now been seven or eight different forms of peace proposals, where we have not...where we have been reasonably flexible. We have always said that the precondition is that they obey the mandatory resolution of the United Nations and withdraw. But once they have withdrawn we are prepared to sit down and discuss the long-term future of the islands. But you are quite right, every single attempt by us or by the Americans and latterly the Peruvians, to get them to withdraw has been rejected, and so we could conceivably be faced with the military option in due course.

[Question] How long is due course?

[Answer] Well that is to some extent constrained by the problems of operating at very long distances from the United Kingdom and of course the incoming winter. I must say that the incoming winter is going to cause horrendous problems for the Argentine occupying forces on the islands and our troops and our men are relatively well looked after and provisioned in ships. I am not saying there is any pleasure about being in a ship in those waters, clearly not. We also now have a reasonably sheltered anchorage if we need it in South Georgia, not far away, outside the range of their land-based air cover. So we do have a range of options and we could extend the blockade for far longer if we wished to and the amount of supplies that they have available to their forces on the islands. [sentence as heard]

[Question] That is also interesting. I see what you mean now by range of options available. Coming back to the possibility of the invasion option which the British people plainly would now support and a lot of today's newspapers are suggesting it's very much on the agenda and switching to the Argentinian Air Force which most military strategists seem to think is the real problem as you saw in our program. One way you could cope with that of course would be by bombing the Argentinian airfields. Now there are reports in one of today's papers that the cabinet considered this but ruled it out. Has the cabinet ruled out an attack on Argentinian airfields?

[Answer] Well can I say for myself. I do not rule out any option, but there are no plans at present to attack mainland Argentina. There are no such plans at present. What we have been seeking to do from the outset of this affair is to move forward step by step, using no more force than is necessary in our tremendous efforts to get a peaceful solution to the problem. No, there are no plans at present to bomb the Argentinian mainland but I am not ruling out any option in the last resort.

[Question] Well that raises certain problems. If we are not going to bomb the Argentinian mainland, and one can quite understand why we wouldn't because I imagine our own allies would not take that too well, nevertheless it does raise the whole problem of our air support over the Falklands itself, and it also raises a difficulty with regard to the statement that you made to me earlier in this interview.

You said we would take all possible measures to defend our task force. Now it may be of course that all possible measures to defend our task force would involve bombing Argentinian airfields, isn't that so?

[Answer] Well I think that some of the experts rather exaggerate the value, the strength of the Argentinian Air Force. I don't wish to minimize its dangers. The Argentinian forces are some of the largest and most modern in South America, and by no means do I wish to suggest that this will not be a tough fight if it comes to that. But they only have five Super Etandard which were the aircraft that attacked the Sheffield. They have other Mirage aircraft. But they really are a decade behind the Harrier, they are 10 years behind the Harrier, and beyond that their other aircraft are not particularly modern. Some of them are very old. And the Harrier is a very effective aircraft, and we can in-flight refuel the Harrier. We can get down to the South Atlantic as many Harriers as we are likely to need, so that I think we must not exaggerate their air situation; it is certainly significant and we must watch, but we must not exaggerate.

[Question] Well all right. Now I must, however, put this to you because I think you would want me to put to you. Some people could have misunderstood you to have said as the result of this interview: Well, their troops on the Falklands, they are no good, their air force, well, that's widely out of date, that's no good; there is hardly a problem. Now it isn't that simple, is it, Mr Nott?

[Answer] No, no, I am saying, which is always I think what I said on this interview 3-4 weeks ago: In terms of quality of equipment and certainly quality of training and professionalism, our forces really do not compare. We are undoubtedly superior to them. But in war, if that is what it has to become, things go wrong and there is not a single person in my department, not a single service officer who does not understand that if we get into a conflict of this kind, some ships, some aircraft, some men may not be lost. [sentence as heard] That is the way that it happens, and it is deeply grievous if it does. But in spite of our superiority we cannot expect to emerge from this thing without losses, we will have losses.

[Question] All right, can I draw out what I think I have learned from what you had to tell me, namely that the position is that you as defense secretary have on Mrs Thatcher's desk a range of options from which she could choose. She could take the diplomatic option, but you are not very hopeful about it. But if there was a chance of a diplomatic settlement that could be done, we've done nothing yet to stop it. That she could take the invasion option, you have got in fact the capacity for that one. She could take the prolonged blockade option if she wanted to do that. Let me ask you this question now which the minority, and one must admit they are a minority, the minority of the British people don't support you on this, are asking all the time...

[Answer] Yes.
[Question] ...Mainly the question of proportion...
[Answer] Yes.
[Question] All right, all of these things, invasion, prolonged blockade might be able to be done, but how many casualties are proportionate to the righting of this particular wrong; is there any line that you would draw that you would not go beyond?

[Answer] Yes, well this is British territory and these are British people, and British sovereignty is a fact, it cannot be removed by aggression. But if they withdraw we are prepared to discuss the long-term future of the islands, that is a British question. But there is an international question at stake, and that is, that if we, the British, have to be a country which in support of democracy and freedom stands up against this kind of abuse, then so be it. And history will remember that it was the British people that stood firm against aggression, and that has much wider implications for the world than our little problem on the Falkland Islands. And I don't doubt that some support internationally could conceivably fall away from us if the going gets rough. But historians will look back and say well they, the British, they stood out against aggression. And there are hundreds of border disputes all over the world. The Russians have marched into Afghanistan, and let us remember that if we falter here because people shrink from taking action, then this will happen repeatedly all around the world, and the threat from the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact allies will grow.

[Question] That is a very controversial statement. Of course, that does not mean that it is right, it does not mean that it is wrong. It is very controversial and I want to press you on it. You seem to be saying that the principles involved here are so important that even if we were to lose some international support by pursuing what you take to be the right course, you would bear that loss even if we did have to sustain a considerable number of casualties, more than many people would wish; you would bear that loss too because the issue is so crucial?

[Answer] Well, let me say that we clearly are bending everything to place ourselves in a position that if that final conflict comes we have the minimum number of casualties; and that is why some of the intermediate steps that we are taking are taken in the knowledge that we may be forced in a few weeks' or a few months' time to take further military action. We must not shrink for a day now in moving forward, because if we do that might mean more casualties later in the process, although I hope that this weekend we will solve the thing. But, yes, there is a general principle at stake, and some people may fall away from us, but in 10 years' time and in 20 years' time the historians will look back and say, the British stood up against aggression; they showed the way; they showed that Western democratic principles must be supported.

[Question] It will be very cheering to have the historians on our side in the future, but I wonder if I could ask you about the practical difficulties of the present. Surely if we do go ahead in this particular way we could have grave problems, could we not?

[Answer] I think I wouldn't say that. I was in, with NATO last week and there was strong support for us among the NATO countries.

[Question] All right, I must stop there, Mr Nott. Thank you very much indeed for a most revealing interview. Thank you.

PORT STANLEY AIRFIELD, ARGENTINE VESSEL ATTACKED

LD091745 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1739 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] The British task force today launched a fresh attack on Port Stanley Airfield and opened fire on an Argentine fishing vessel in renewed fighting over the Falklands. The fishing vessel, thought to be syping on the British fleet, is said to have surrendered. It is not known if there are any casualties.

The details were given tonight by the Ministry of Defence in London, several hours after Argentina first announced this morning's attack on the airfield at Port Stanley. The military junta had claimed that the attack was beaten off.

Defence Ministry Spokesman Mr Ian McDonald said in a brief statement tonight: "The task group have today attacked military targets in the vicinity of Port Stanley Airfield. We have a report that an Argentine aircraft approached Port Stanley but turned away in the face of action by the task group." British planes have now launched a number of attacks on the airstrip at Port Stanley in a bid to stop use by Argentine planes.

The fishing vessel was attacked at 12.30 p.m. London time today by two Sea Harriers on patrol "well within" the total exclusion zone around the Falkland Islands. The vessel was named as the Narwal, and had been shadowing the task force for some days. "We have reason to believe that she was engaged in surveillance," said Mr McDonald tonight.

He reminded reporters of an earlier announcement about the exclusion zone in which the ministry had warned that any ship, military or civil, found within the area without due authority from the MOD in London would be regarded as hostile and liable to attack.

He went on: "Additionally, on May 7, her majesty's government made clear in a statement that all Argentinian vessels, including merchant vessels or fishing vessels apparently engaging in surveillance or intelligence-gathering activities against British forces in the South Atlantic, would also be regarded as hostile, and were liable to be dealt with accordingly," he said.

Mr McDonald said that two Sea Harriers had therefore opened fire on the fishing boat. "Indications are that the Argentine fishing vessel surrendered and is now awaiting a Royal Navy boarding party. We do not at present know whether the vessel was damaged, or if there are any Argentine casualties," he said.

The two Harriers were undamaged, and had now returned to their patrol duties, said the ministry. Today's attacks follow a lull in fighting in the South Atlantic following the destruction of the British destroyer HMS Sheffield last Tuesday. There is speculation that British troops are on the verge of invading the Falklands, but the Defence Ministry said earlier today no invasion had been launched.

The ministry would not comment on film of a British Harrier shot down over the Falklands last week, shown on television today. The film, taken by an Argentine crew on the Falklands, apparently shows wreckage of the aircraft shot down over Goose Green on Tuesday. The pilot was killed, and has since been buried with military honours on the islands.

There was speculation that if the film had been flown out of the Falklands, vital military supplies might be getting through the British blockade. But a Defence Ministry spokesman would not comment on how the film was taken off the islands.

Details of Port Stanley Attack

LD092000 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1935 GMT 9 May 82

[By Peter Archer, PRESS ASSOCIATION correspondent aboard HMS Hermes]

[Excerpt] British forces launched an attack on Argentine military installations around the Falklands' capital, Port Stanley, early today. Officers commanding the naval task force say no troop landing was attempted.

In a separate incident inside the total exclusion zone, an Argentine trawler, believed to be a spy ship, was strafed by British jets.

Warships from the task force slipped in close to the shore to bombard Argentine military positions. Under cover of darkness, the British 4.5 inch naval guns pounded the enemy for an estimated 50 minutes. The aim of the mission was to further enforce a sea and air blockade of the occupied islands.

It was feared that some Argentine shipping and aircraft may have beaten the blockade, despite patrols by the task force, Britain's nuclear powered submarines and jet fighters. Yesterday and today, attempts by the Argentinians to resupply troops on the Falklands with air drops, were beaten back by British jets. Enemy Hercules transport planes, escorted by Argentine Mirage jet fighters, turned back after Sea Harriers from the task force were sent to intercept.

Fishing Vessel Taken

LD092038 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2029 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] The Ministry of Defence tonight strongly denied Argentine reports that British aircraft had strafed lifeboats after attacking the Argentine fishing vessel the Narwal. The spokesman said: "The Ministry of Defence deplores these allegations, which are of course completely without foundation. The vessel has not been sunk and there are no casualties among the prisoners."

He said the prisoners were now on "one of her majesty's ships." The spokesman said the Narwal was intercepted within the total exclusion zone. "The vessel was involved in surveillance and had been shadowing the task force for several days.

"I can now report some of the details of the engagement. The Narwal was located at 12.30 pm London time by two Sea Harriers. A small bomb was dropped alongside the vessel, and this was followed by a short warning burst of gunfire from the Harriers." The spokesman went on: "The crew then surrendered and abandoned ship. Those who abandoned ship have been recovered by Royal Navy helicopter and are now prisoners on one of her majesty's ships.

"There are no casualties among the prisoners and our task force sustained no casualties either. The Narwal is now in the custody of the Royal Navy. We have noted the allegations made by the Argentine news agency, TELAM, that the British aircraft involved had strafed the lifeboats.

"The Ministry of Defence deplores these allegations, which are of course completely without foundation. The vessel has not been sunk and there are no casualties among the prisoners." The spokesman said he did not know if the entire crew of the Narwal had escaped, but all those who abandoned ship were picked up. The vessel was in British custody, but he could not say if anyone from the British fleet had gone onboard.

Argentine Casualties

PY100102 Paris AFP in Spanish 2340 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] London, 10 May (AFP) -- The British Defense Ministry reported today a little after 2300 that a member of the crew of the Argentine fishing boat Narwal died, one is seriously wounded and that 12 were slightly wounded.

A British Defense Ministry spokesman said that according to reports supplied by the Argentine prisoners, 25 persons were aboard the Narwal when it was attacked by British Sea Harriers. The spokesman added that the 13 wounded and the 11 uninjured persons were transferred to ships of the British fleet. He said that the Narwal "was following the fleet and that first indications lead to the conclusion that it was a spy ship."

Enemy Helicopter Downed

[Excerpt] British warships today bombarded military installations around the Falklands capital, Port Stanley. An Argentine Puma helicopter was reported shot down, and in a separate incident inside the total exclusion zone an Argentine trawler believed to be a spy ship was strafed by British jets.

Troops were tonight being flown by helicopter from HMS Hermes to take command of the vessel. Task force commander Rear Admiral Sandy Woodward was at the same time deciding whether to sink the captured ship, or take her in tow.

Meanwhile it was learned that the smouldering hulk of the destroyer HMS Sheffield, the ship which refuses to die, is under tow in safe water outside the total exclusion zone.

DIALOGUE AT UN REACHING 'CRITICAL STAGE'

PY092122 Paris AFP in Spanish 2113 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] New York, 9 May (AFP) -- The British representative to the UN, Sir Anthony Parsons stated today that I have just handed to the UN secretary general another very important note from my government regarding the basics (of the Malvinas conflict).

Parsons said that he will again meet today with the secretary general, Javier Perez de Cuellar. The secretary general is now waiting for the Argentine under secretary for foreign affairs, Enrique Ros.

The impression is prevailing tonight in the UN that the Argentine-British dialogue regarding the Malvinas conflict has reached a critical stage.

'Considerable Progress'

LD100346 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0340 GMT 10 May 82

[Text] A ray of hope shines on Falklands peace talks, which continue at the United Nations today in the wake of the latest military clashes in the South Atlantic. According to Britain's UN representative, Sir Anthony Parsons "a considerable amount of progress" was made on "a number of points" at talks in New York last night.

Meanwhile, Britain's task force attacked an Argentine trawler suspected of being a spy ship yesterday, killing one of the crew and injuring 13 others. An Argentine helicopter was also shot down, and British warships bombarded military positions around the Falklands capital of Port Stanley.

In New York REUTERS quoted Sir Anthony as saying last night after two meetings with UN Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar: "There are still some very important issues to be resolved. We shall meet again tomorrow."

Neither he nor UN officials would discuss the substance of the talks. Before his latest talks, Sir Anthony said he had handed "another very substantive communication" from the British Government to the secretary general.

Mr Perez de Cuellar, who had separate talks with Argentine Deputy Foreign Minister Enrique Ros, is known to be trying to bring about a cease-fire, an Argentine withdrawal from the islands, and the installation of an independent interim administration. He also hopes for negotiations aimed at a long-term settlement of the dispute.

The latest fighting came as Britain sought to establish air superiority yesterday. Sea Harrier patrol jets spotted the ocean-going Argentine fishing vessel, the Narwal, which has been shadowing the task force for several days inside the total exclusion zone around the islands. The order was given to attack, and the Harriers strafed the ship with cannon fire, stopping the vessel in its tracks.

The Ministry of Defence said that according to reports, one of the 25 people on board the Narwal had been killed, one seriously hurt and 12 suffered minor injuries. The crew, including Argentine naval Lt Cmdr Gonzales Llanos, surrendered, abandoned ship, and were picked up by Royal Navy helicopters and taken prisoner. A boarding party was put on the Narwal, and first indications were that it was fitted out for surveillance tasks, said the ministry.

Argentina claimed that British aircraft strafed lifeboats lauched after the Narwal was crippled but the ministry strongly denied this.

The latest action started early yesterday, when British warships slipped in under cover of darkness to pound Argentine positions with 4.5 inch guns. Harriers also turned away a Hercules supply plane escorted by Mirage fighters. And a Puma helicopter, which usually carries about 20 men, is understood to have been brought down by a missile fired from an RN ship.

This appears to have taken place as Harriers mounted an air patrol over the East Falklands. The Hercules's effort to resupply Argentina's Falklands troops was beaten back for the second day running.

Back in London, Mrs Thatcher last night declined to comment on how an inner cabinet meeting at Chequers had gone. The meeting, lasting for almost two hours, was said to have devoted much time to the progress of UN negotiations amid a growing feeling that a climax was near.

The UN talks were described in Whitehall as "extremely valuable," and the only remaining channel for contact between the two sides.

Paper Questions Value

PM101053 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 10 May 82 p 14

[Editorial: "The Eleventh Hour"]

[Text] As the events of yesterday and the remarks of Mr Nott made clear, the last-minute attempts to find a way out of fighting over the Falkland Islands have not prevented Britain from securing her military position. As far as possible, diplomacy has not been allowed, as the Argentines would have liked, to undermine the task force's capacity to act. Indeed yesterday's alarums and excursions seem to have had precisely the desired effect of getting on Argentine nerves. But with every day that passes, Britain risks more. In view of this, one needs to consider what the negotiations being conducted through the United Nations are capable of producing.

No settlement at this stage could come to a final position about the status of the Falkland Islands, so all negotiations are about an interim. Since Argentina would not accept an interim guaranteed by America, the only guarantor apparently available is the United Nations, and the method of guarantee under discussion is a United Nations trusteeship. Whatever the interim, one cannot pretend that it will be merely for a matter of months. The fundamental question whose settlement the interim is supposed eventually to ensure is sovereignty. Since this issue has been either in dormant or active dispute almost since the Falkands were first discovered, it is difficult to how it would be settled quickly. An interim administration might last for more than one generation. Would it, through all that time, guarantee Falklanders' rights and respect their wishes?

The history of the UN trusteeship is not encouraging. In West Irian, where it held the ropes between Holland and Indonesia, it passed the country over to Indonesia in six months. The wishes of the local people were never satisfactorily obtained. Besides, the main purpose of the trusteeship is to ease the process of decolonisation -- hence its use in some parts of Africa -- so it is designed to prepare the way for self-government or independence. Until they were invaded, the Falklanders had as much self-government as they wanted; as for independence, it is neither wanted by the people, nor practical for such a small and vulnerable country. Trusteeship was not invented for colonies who want to keep their colonial rulers.

So even an apparently honourable United Nations agreement is fraught with perils. There is no knowing what an international body comprising such fierce divisions might not be persuaded to do in years ahead; and there is, on the other hand, the virtual certainty that Argentina, united only on the question of the Falklands, will keep up pressure when Britain has turned her attention to problems nearer home. Against these difficulties is the oft-stated importance of maintaining moral advantage in the eyes of the world. This was very important when the task force was in transit, but it matters less, and becomes very hard to maintain, now that it is ready to act. If Britain is now in a position to retake the islands, she should not expect and does not need more than the tacit acquiescence of her allies, who after all, see certain practical advangages in trying to exert influence over Britain. High principles struggle with EEC farm prices in the breast of most continentals and do not conspicuously win. In the process of seeking support, Britain risks losing valuable time, and condeding principles to the extent that the justification for sending the task force is weakened.

If the diplomacy of Senor de Cuellar is not succeeding, this should surely be the positively last appearance of all such initiatives.

Amid the incessant flying, trying and talking of recent weeks it has been easy to forget that the process has never produced a substantial change of position from Argentina, though it has encouraged Britain to stretch reasonableness almost to the point of weakness. Argentina has been deliberately ambigious in order to confuse and delay Britain. Those who call most loudly for incessant negotiation do not consider that a nation capable of an unprovoked aggression is not the sort that has great respect for the conference table. They are also vague where they should be extremely clear about what negotiated settlement would be appropriate. Dragged out in these circumstances, diplomacy becomes not a course of statesmanship, but a substitute for what has to be done.

'POW'S' TO BE REPATRIATED FROM ASCENSION ISLAND

LD100722 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0702 GMT 10 May 82

[Text] Arrangements are underway for the repatriation of Argentine prisoners taken during the counterinvasion of South Georgia. The Ministry of Defense [MOD] said yesterday that the captured men were being taken by ship to Ascension Island, where they would be transferred to an aircraft under the supervision of the International Red Cross.

MOD spokesman, Mr Ian McDonald, said: "Representatives of the International Red Cross, including a doctor, are now en route to Ascension Island, and will supervise the repatriation arrangements." For the first time, Mr McDonald referred to the captives as "prisoners of war."

The MOD had issued a statement two weeks ago specifically saying the men were not prisoners of war. Mr McDonald said his statement had been vetted by Defense Ministry experts before being made public. "I am told that under the Geneva Convention, there can be prisoners of war without war being declared," he added.

GOVERNMENT RAPS OPPOSITION OVER ATHENS RELATIONS

NC081207 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 8 May 82

[Text] The government spokesman made the following statement today: Despite what I have repeatedly stated to point up the necessity for soberness and responsibility in handling the issue that arose between the Greek and Cyprus governments, the opposition press continues in the very same provocative and harmful manner. Distortion, unfounded allegations and slandering of the president of the republic have become a daily occurrence. Undermining of relations between the Greek prime minister and the president of the republic has become a continuous attempt. The motives are petty party motives or due to malevolence. None of the critics consider the national interest. They exploit everything in an effort to exacerbate the situation through false reports and in a sly manner.

The president of the republic, the spokesman continued -- who sincerely wishes a harmonious cooperation between the Greek and Cypriot governments -- will continue to deal with things with calm and in full appreciation of his responsibilities.

Concluding, the government spokesman asked: Would it be in vain for one to expect that some sense of responsibility will be at long last demonstrated by the Democratic Rally, the DISI-EDEK duo and the others who want to pretend to be the savior of Cyprus but recently united in a joint effort to strike at the president of the republic and his authority, and who -- for their own private interests -- fight desparately to exacerbate Athens-Nicosia relations?

A Democratic Rally [DISI] statement related to today's statement by the government spokesman mentions that the government spokesman's recommendaton that soberness and responsibility are needed in handling the issue that arose between the Greek and Cypriot governments, lacks in itself such soberness. The DISI statement adds that relations between the two governments were disturbed by the minimum program and, as the statement mentions, the coupling of AKEL and Kiprianou and were exacerbated as a result of the abusive policy of the leaders of AKEL toward the Greek Government. The statement says the DISI establishes this fact and points out to Kiprianou the correct way to restore these relations. If, the DISI statement concludes, Kiprianou does not dare -- as a result of petty party and personal motives -- to risk the displeasure of the leaders of AKEL, then the responsibility rests with him alone.

Foreign and Defence Minister Kenan Atakol of the Turkish Federated State announced Friday his government was requesting British authorities to extradite the fugitive.

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ON CEAUSESCU VISIT REPORTED

NC072225 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1800 GMT 7 May 82

[Text] The communique issued on the Greek-Romanian talks stressed, as both parties have established, that cooperation between the two countries constitutes an example of good neighborliness, and that the desire was expressed to further develop trade exchanges on a balanced basis. The communique also expressed the will of both parties to encourage the establishment of mixed enterprises within a bilateral framework and in (?third) markets. At this point, the communique also mentioned the draft agreement signed by President Ceausescu and Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou for economic, industrial, scientific and technological cooperation.

On the Cyprus issue, the communique expressed the concern of both parties because the crisis on the island has not as yet been resolved, a fact that constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region. Both sides stood in favor of the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Cyprus in accordance with the relevant UN resolutions and in favor of the independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and unity of the republic of Cyprus.

Moreover, the two sides (?expressed their concern) over the maintenance of sources of tension and (?crisis) in the world and reaffirmed their desire to do whatever is possible to put an end to the deterioration in the existing international climate. Specifically, they demanded that an end be put to the arms race; they also demanded general disarmament -- conventional and nuclear. Special emphasis was also given to security and cooperation in Europe, and they sided in favor of the full implementation of the Helsinki final accord.

In conclusion, on the Balkans both sides agreed to work with the other Balkan countries for the convocation of a summit conference of the region's countries with the goal of exploring the practical ways and methods to consolidate trust, cooperation and peace in the Balkans.

President Karamanlis and Prime Minister Papandreou have accepted invitations from Mr Ceausescu to visit Romania. The dates for the visits will be fixed later through diplomatic channels.

SPOKESMAN ON USSR FINANCING OF ATHENS DAILY

NC071625 Athens NEWS in English 7 May 82 p 12

[Text] A government spokesman yesterday described as "most serious" an allegation that the pro-government evening daily ETHNOS is being financed by Soviet capital. A report, carried in the 29 April issue of the British bulletin FOREIGN REPORT, and reprinted yesterday by the opposition evening daily MESIMVRINI, alleged that ETHNOS had received a loan in the neighborhood of 150 million drachmas from the Soviet Union.

The government spokesman said the government would wait for the paper's position on the report to be made public before taking any action. He said, however, answering a reporter's question, that the government did not, at that time, consider ordering an audit of Greek newspapers' sources of finance. A spokesman for MESIMVRINI had stated earlier that his paper would not be opposed to such a government measure.

A representative of ETHNOS stated that the government had been briefed on the contents of the report when it first appeared in FOREIGN REPORT, but the government spokesman Mr Dhimitrios Maroudhas, deputy minister to the prime minister in charge of press affairs, said he had no knowledge of the case until yesterday.

JORGENSEN WARNS COALITION PARTNERS ON DISUNITY

PM071555 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 2 May 82 p 2

[Lisbeth Knudsen report]

[Excerpt] If in the next few weeks the Socialist People's Party [SF] and the Radical Liberals continue to attack the Social Democrats from either side with the result that the government's proposed legislation cannot be implemented, the result would be a nonsocialist government.

This was the recurrent theme in all the Socialist Democratic 1 May speeches throughout Denmark yesterday. At a meeting in Copenhagen, Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen himself said that it is the SF and the Radical Liberals who must help to carry through the government's policies. "The two parties must come to their senses, otherwise we will find ourselves in a very difficult situation. If we are to succeed in implementing our policies, we must appeal to the SF and the Radical Liberals to stop pulling so vehemently, for we are running the risk of our policy's being pulled to pieces, and the alternative would be a nonsocialist government. We have to remind the SF in particular that we still have a nonsocialist majority in Denmark," Jorgensen said.

NAVY TO BE EQUIPPED WITH ANTI-MISSILE-MISSILES

NC071353 Paris AFP in English 1346 GMT 7 May 82

[Text] The Hague, 7 May (AFP) -- The Dutch Navy will soon be equipped with a locally built anti-missile-missile called the Goalkeeper which "would have made short work" of the Exocet missile Argentina used to knock out the British destroyer in the South Atlantic last Tuesday.

A Dutch Navy expert told the daily DE TELEGRAAF that the missile would function like a football goalkeeper -- hence its name. It would fire some 70 grenades a second to destroy "fire-and-forget" missiles such as the French-built Exocet shortly before they hit the target, he said.

The Navy Ministry here confirmed the TELEGRAAF story, which said the Goalkeeper was built by the Hollandse Signaal Apparaat Company, an affiliate of the Phillips Group, where 200 members of the Argentine armed forces are currently being trained.

EXTENSION OF SANCTIONS TO BE DISCUSSED 15 MAY

LD110355 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0330 GMT 11 May 82

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Brussels]

[Excerpt] The future of EEC trade sanctions against Argentina will be decided in Brussels next Saturday. Senior Foreign Office officials and Britain's ambassador to the EEC, Sir Michael Butler, will meet their Common Market counterparts from the Community in an urgent bid to agree the renewal of the total ban for at least another month.

The ban, which has cost Argentina its largest single export market, has barely begun to bite, but the government considers it vital as a demonstration of European support. The sanctions are due to end next Monday.

Britain: 'No Trade-Off'

LD101924 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1825 GMT 10 May 82

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Brussels]

[Text] Agriculture Minister Mr Peter Walker tonight firmly ruled out a trade off between Britain and her EEC partners over the Falklands crisis. He said bartering settlement of the Community's budget and agriculture problems, in exchange for renewed EEC support for Britain's stand, would be a "terrible reflection" on Europe.

He told a press conference in Brussels that he saw no connection between talks on EEC farm prices and the UK's budget problem, and EEC solidarity over the Falklands. "I see no link between the price fixing and the budget, and what foreign ministers decide is a sensible and correct foreign policy, in the interests of Europe and the free world.

"It would be very damaging to the whole reputation of Europe abroad, as well as domestically, if the world saw us discussing our foreign policy in terms of what we get from a particular farm price fixing," he said. He said no EEC minister to his knowledge had suggested there was any link. Mr Walker was speaking after the first day of a two-day meeting of EEC farm ministers, designed to resolve the row over this year's farm price rises. Britain is threatening to veto agreement for an average 11 percent rise, until her partners concede substantial long-term rebates for the UK, to reduce Britain's share of the budget.

But he said there was no question of Britain having to give way on the farm and budget issues, in return for agreement over vital support for trade sanctions, which expire on May 17. Britain owed no "debt of gratitude" to the Community, he said. The EEC had backed Britain over the Falklands crisis because they completely agreed with what she was doing. "The cost of withstanding this military pressure is on the UK, so the Community should be pleased with the actions we are taking," he added.

Mr Walker's uncompromising position over farm prices indicates some tough talking when negotiations resume tomorrow. This afternoon he told he colleagues that Britain considered that farm price rises could not be divorced from the question of reducing Britain's budget contributions. Any attempts by EEC members to support their farmers, because agreement on price rises was overdue, would be wrong and very dangerous, he added. Tonight he was meeting other EEC agriculture ministers individually, to try to hammer out a solution. But EEC officials see no hope of agreement without major progress on the budget.

CSSR'S FOREIGN MINISTER HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE

AU101122 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 8-9 May 82 p 1

[Report by "GWO"]

[Excerpts] In a talk with journalists in Vienna on Thursday, Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Bohuslav Chnoupek struck an entirely favorable note on his visit to Austria. He declared that the identical views on key problems constitute a favorable prerequisite for the forthcoming visit to Austria of state and party chief Gustav Husak.

As regards the direct results of his talks, the foreign minister declared that the measures to facilitate tourist traffic at the Austrian-Czechoslovak border, which have been worked out by a joint border commission, will be put into practice within the next few weeks. These measures provide among other things for a quicker clearance for tourists. Chnoupek added that the CSSR is also ready to sign an agreement on mutual security and alarm measures regarding nuclear powerplants in the vicinity of the border.

Asked about the fate of civil rights activist Rudolf Battek, who has been sentenced to 7 and 1/2 years of imprisonment, Chnoupek declared that Battek's emigration to a Western country could only be considered after he himself signs and submits a petition for clemency. Under the provision of the Czechoslovak constitution, petitions by Battek's dependents could not be considered, Chnoupek said.

KREISKY NOT TO ATTEND UN DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

AU101154 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 8-9 May 82 p 2

[Text] Vienna -- Chancellor Kreisky will not participate in the UN disarmament conference scheduled for June in New York. This was stated yesterday, Friday, by a chancellery source after DIE PRESSE had published a background report by its Washington correspondent claiming that the U.S. State Department is not too keen on more Austrian visits at present, and that there are hardly any chances for an official invitation to the Austrian Government chief.

This last statement was noted at the chancellery with a certain astonishment, according to the chancellery source. It was pointed out that Kreisky had a "standing invitation" to Washington which was conveyed to him by U.S. Ambassador Cummings (who has since died). The chancellor himself never attempted to fix a date for a visit, but in connection with the "standing invitation," a luncheon with President Reagan was also mentioned.

According to the chancellery source, Kreisky was interviewed by NEWSWEEK magazine and has also been invited to write an article for TIME magazine. All this proves that both the chancellor's personal relations with the Americans as well as bilateral relations in general are good. The fact that Kreisky will not attend the disarmament conference is due to different reasons. The chancellor himself believes that he cannot make any essential contribution to these talks, the chancellery source declared.

3-POINT STATEMENT APPLAUDS REAGAN PROPOSALS

LD101530 Hamburg DPA in German 1356 GMT 10 May 82

[Text] Bonn, 10 May (DPA) -- In Bonn today the Federal Government issued a detailed 3-point statement approving U.S. President Ronald Reagan's speech and supporting the disarmament proposals made in it. Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling left no doubt that Bonn views the Reagan proposals as the Western line of approach for the forthcoming large-scale summit conferences and expects a "constructive reaction" from Moscow.

In initial comment Sunday the Federal Government welcomed the Reagan speech. This morning Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher emphasized the "positive effects" of the American disarmament offer. The speech was "a substantial contribution to preparations for the Western summit meetings in the first half of June and to the constructive continuation of West-East relations," said Boelling, summing up these reactions. The Federal Government also believes "that the unity of the West is of fundamental importance for the East-West relationship."

The Bonn statement emphasizes in particular the fact that the speech also expressed a "policy of steadfastness and willingness to negotiate." These two elements also determine German policy. American readiness to begin negotiations on intercontinental missiles (START) is seen by the Federal Government as "renewed expression of the determination of the American President not to let up in his efforts for arms control and disarmament." The offer of an agreement on substantial reductions in both sides' stock of intercontinental missiles is also important. Boelling stressed that a constructive reply from Moscow is expected and an early start to negotiations is hoped for.

The opposition also backed the Reagan proposals. They are to be welcomed in every respect, stressed Manfred Woerner, deputy chairman of the CDU/CSU Bundestag Parliamentary Group, today. They also show that mistrust of American willingness to negotiate is unjustified.

Reagan's speech and the Federal Government's reaction to it show that Bonn has no thought of moving to a policy of confrontation with Washington. Confidential planning studies by the federal chancellory, excerpts of which were published by DER SPIEGEL and which recommended that a stand should be taken against U.S. neoconservatism, do not form the basis of "operative policy," stressed Boelling. The government spokesman tried to play down the importance of the document, referring to its nonbinding nature. It is the task of every planning department to set out considerations of this sort but it is for the head of government to decide whether to adopt them in his policy.

The published exerpt is in total contradiction to a plan study by the Foreign Ministry, also published in SPIEGEL several months ago which, in contrast, recommended stronger support of Washington's ideas and advised restricting the policy of detente. Boelling warned against "dramatizing splendid conflicts" from the now published excerpts of the two planning documents.

POLISH DEPUTY PREMIER CONTINUES BONN VISIT

LD101730 Hamburg DPA in German 1644 GMT 10 May 82

[Text] Bonn, 10 May (DPA) -- FDP Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher today received Edward Kowalczyk, chairman of the Central Committee of the Polish Democratic Party and Polish deputy premier, for the first exchange of views since the imposition of martial law in Poland. Genscher had invited Kowalczyk as long ago as March 1981. This Polish party is considered middle-class but -- like the party spectrum in the GDR -- is in line with the Communist Party.

An FDP spokesman refused to give details about the discussion in which Kowalczyk described the situation in Poland and Genscher analyzed German-Polish relations. The two chairmen also discussed relations between their two parties.

Earlier Kowalczyk had a meeting with FDP Parliamentary Group Leader Wolfgang Mischnick. During this meeting Mischnick stressed the concern that relaxations in Poland would be rescinded again in light of recent disturbances. All political forces in Poland must be given equal chances for cooperation. The two politicians declared their readiness to continue cooperation.

During the next few days, Kowalczyk will meet Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff and the minister of State attached to the federal chancellor, Hans-Juergen Wischnewski (SPD) and pay a visit to the Baden-Wuerttemberg party group in Stuttgart.

GDR PLANS TO RAISE EXCHANGE LEVY CRITICIZED

LD101652 Hamburg DPA in German 1341 GMT 10 May 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 10 May (DPA) -- The Federal Government has opposed alleged GDR plans to raise further the compulsory minimum exchange levy for Western visitors and has strongly emphasized its demand for a reduction of this amount. "We demand a substantial correction in the minimum exchange levy," said FRG Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling. The Federal Government will not backtrack from this clear position. The GDR leadership knows that it is the firm view of the Federal Government that an increase in the minimum exchange levy cannot be cured [as received] by the passage of time. "The FRG Government urgently demands that there be no change in the compulsory exchange levy."

Bonn government circles rejected as unacceptable alleged plans on the part of the East Berlin Foreign Ministry, as quoted in DER SPIEGEL, to raise further the minimum exchange rate in some cases. According to this report, the GDR plans to completely exclude children under 16, pensioners and disabled people from the compulsory exchange while increasing the exchange amount for all other visitors to the GDR from DM25 to DM35 per day for the first 3 days and after that to DM45 per day.

MINISTER RETURNS FROM COSTA RICA; REVIEWS TALKS

LD091540 Hamburg DPA in German 1407 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] Bonn, 9 May (DPA) -- According to Rainer Offergeld, federal minister for economic cooperation, there is the great danger that the Falkland conflict between Great Britain and Argentina will have consequences "far beyond the actual object of the dispute." After his return from a 3-day visit to Costa Rica, where he had talks with numerous representatives of Latin American countries, Offergeld told DPA on Sunday of the "quite clear solidarity of all Latin American states with Argentina." It cannot be ignored that "old grudges" against the United States are emerging again in Latin America and that there is a danger that the U.S. role in Latin America is being weakened.

Offergeld, who was in the Central American republic as representative of the Federal Government at the inauguration of the new Costa Rican President, Luis Alberto Monge, met with the Argentine interior minister, among others. Offergeld said there are strained relations between the Latin American states and the industrialized countries. The complex role of the FRG in this conflict is recognized, however. The latest statement of the Federal Cabinet, in which Bonn calls for a peaceful solution to the Falkland conflict, has been carefully noted.

Offergeld described the main aims of the Federal Government as supporting all mediation efforts toward a peaceful solution. In military conflicts in Latin America, the danger of a psychological escalation is "quite enormous." The conflict is "stirring up" people, because they see in it a "resurgence of colonialism and imperialism." The Federal Government certainly cannot act as mediator in this conflict, but its opinion is being noted.

NICARAGUAN OFFICIALS VISIT; MEET PRESS

PA071608 Managua Sistema Sandinista Television Network in Spanish 0200 GMT 5 May 82

[Text] During his recent visit to Madrid, Spain, government junta member Sergio Ramirez Mercado held a news conference for Spanish and foreign newsmen. At the news conference Sergio Ramirez; Nora Astorga, Nicaraguan deputy foreign minister; and Companero Orlando Castillo, Nicaraguan ambassador in Spain, informed local and foreign newsmen about Nicaragua's position regarding the Malvinas conflict.

Asked about Nicaragua's relations with Mexico and France, Ramirez said they are sincere and, as proof of this, added that the first French-Nicaraguan mixed meeting to discuss cooperation will be held on 16 May. Ramirez, a Sandinist assembly member, also mentioned the various attacks against Nicaragua by counterrevolutionary groups, [words indistinct] the enemies of our process.

Regarding the talks between the Nicaraguan delegation and the Spanish Government, he said: [Begin recording] We have held serious talks with the Spanish Government about the present situation in Central America, particularly about the relations between Nicaragua and the United States, as these relations are a determining factor to improve the moral framework of the crisis in Central America. We discussed the peace proposal made by Mexican President Lopez Portillo, but above all, we discussed our own personal, encompassing 13 points which our ambassador in Washington has presented to the U.S. Government as the basis for initiating talks, which we hope will begin as soon as possible. We have proposed that the meeting be held in Mexico, with a Mexican Government representative present as a qualified witness of the talks. [end recording]

Last, the two delegations expressed the need to continue contacts and exchanges of views between the two parties.

MORE SHIPS, HARRIERS REINFORCE TASK FORCE

PM101227 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 10 May 82 p 24

[G.S. Cooper and Desmond Wettern report: "Strength of Task Force Rises"]

[Text] The Royal Navy task force off the Falkland Islands has already been reinforced with warships, with more on the way, and is likely to have its lost Harrier fighters replaced soon.

The record-breaking direct flight of Harrier fighters to Ascension Island has relieved concern that aircraft losses might gravely weaken the task force's air cover before reinforcements could arrive. Refuelled in the air by Victor tankers, the Harriers took nine hours to complete the flight of over 3,000 miles. They may now fly direct to the task force or continue on the container ship Atlantic Conveyor.

Speculation that three Harriers have already been flown direct to the task force were not confirmed by the Defence Ministry. However it is probable that Hermes and Invincible will not have to wait for their arrival by sea.

In all, about 20 Harriers are on their way to the South Atlantic. Among the five warships which have joined the task force are believed to be the Type 42 Sea Dart missile destroyer Exeter, 4,100 tons, a sister ship of the Sheffield destroyed by an Argentine missile attack last week; and probably the Sea Wolf missile armed frigate Battleaxe, 4,800 tons.

The Exeter has a more modern air-search radar than the Sheffield but her armament is the same: A twin launcher for the Sea Dart missiles, a Lynx anti-submarine helicopter and a 4.5 inch gun. Unlike the Sheffield, she carries anti-submarine torpedoes.

The Exeter has previously been serving as guardship off Belize and in the light of fears that Guatemala might seek to take advantage of the situation in the South Atlantic to threaten Belize it is probable that she has been replaced by another ship.

Sea Wolf missiles in the Battleaxe, which joins her sister ships Broadsword and Brilliant, do not provide defence against sea skimming missiles like the A.M. 39 Exocet which hit the Sheffield. But they do provide defence against missiles approaching at altitudes well below 1,000 feet.

Neither the Battleaxe nor her sister ships could have provided any defence for the Sheffield since Sea Wolf is designed only to protect the ship carrying it.

SOUTH ATLANTIC WEATHER INFORMATION RESTRICTED

[Text] Weather in the South Atlantic has become an official secret. The meteorological office has placed a restriction on information available from its forecasting office at Bracknell, Berkshire.

A forecaster at Bracknell said last night: "I am under instructions not to tell anything about the weather except what I glean from satellite pictures to which everyone has access." The daily pictures from weather satellites are available to everyone with the equipment to receive them.

The meteorological office is not giving out information received from weather stations in the Antarctic or other sources. Yesterday's satellite pictures showed the Falkland Islands and South Georgia covered with thick cloud with suggestions of rain.

DEFENSE AGAINST SEA-SKIMMING MISSILES CITED

[Desmond Wettern report: "Jamming Detonated One Missile"]

[Text] In the Argentine missile attack on the Falklands task force last Tuesday one missile was destroyed, probably by electronic means, before it reached its target. Although one missile destroyed the destroyer Sheffield, 4,100 tons, the second was either detonated prematurely or else was made to dive into the sea by the electronic countermeasures in either the carrier Invincible, 19,500 tons, or the 28,500-ton Hermes.

Such a method of defence against sea-skimming missiles requires considerable skill, since the missile's flight time was no more than 60 seconds. It is necessary for the jamming system to operate at the same frequency as the radar controlling the missile. It must be assumed that the French manufacturers of the air-launched version of Exocet have made the operating frequency known to France's Western allies.

But use of electronic defences against sea-skimming missiles is not only in which long-term confidence can be placed as the ability of the latest radars to switch frequencies at random will make it increasingly difficult to jam them.

In his remarks on Wednesday that the Sheffield's destruction did not raise doubts over the future of large surface war-ships such as nuclear-powered aircraft carrier, Mr John Lehman, the American secretary of the navy, overlooked the very considerable threat posed by submarines such as the Russian "Charlie" class which can launch sea-skimming missiles while submerged.

None of the NATO navies, not least the Americans, yet has an answer to this threat, particularly if a missile submarine stays on the bottom and waits till the escorts have passed before moving in to attack a carrier. To counter such a threat only the new lightweight version of the Royal Navy's Sea Wolf with a much-improved radar tracker system provides an answer though it will be another two or three years before it is operational.

A further lesson learnt from the attack on the Sheffield is that it vindicates the naval design staff's insistence to build her superstructure in steel. Had aluminium been used, as many critics of the Sheffield design urged when it was under development in the late 1960s, the fire would have spread far more rapidly and the casualty toll would certainly have been far higher. The fire became uncontrollable because white-hot splinters penetrated the ship's diesel fuel tanks.

9 MAY ATTACKS CAUSE CONSIDERABLE DAMAGE

LD101452 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1434 GMT 10 May 82

[By Robert Hutchinson and Alan Jones, PA defence staff]

[Text] The attack by Britain's task force on Argentine military targets on the Falklands caused "considerable damage," the Ministry of Defence said today. British warships bombarded targets around the air strip at Port Stanley early on Sunday.

Ministry of Defense [MOD] Spokesman Mr Ian McDonald said today: "While we cannot be sure of the extent of the damage, indications -- including smoke and flashes -- might suggest that the attack caused considerable damage. There would also be a psychological effect on the Argentine troops on the island."

The MOD also disclosed that HMS Sheffield -- holed by a missile six days ago -- sank today while being towed by a British tug in heavy weather in the South Atlantic.

Mr McDonald said Sunday was a "busy operational day," and the attacks involved ships from the task force as well as Sea Harriers.

He confirmed reports from reporters aboard task force ships that an Argentine helicopter was shot down during the action. Mr McDonald said the attack was within the exclusion zone, but he had no details of any Argentine casualties. The helicopter, a Puma, which normally carries 20 troops, was shot down by a ship from the British fleet.

Mr McDonald also said documents had been recovered from the Argentine vessel, the Narwal, which was also attacked by Harriers on Sunday. He said the documents, which had been prepared for disposal "show that the Narwal was working under Argentine naval instructions to give information about the location and movement of the task force." Surveillance and other equipment had also been found on the vessel.

One Argentine crew member was killed during the attack on the Narwal, another was seriously injured, and 12 others received minor injuries. The crew were now onboard a number of British ships, and the injured were receiving medical attention.

Mr McDonald added there had been no reports of fighting in the South Atlantic today. "Our task force continues its patrols to maintain the total exclusion zone around the Falkland Islands," he added.

'CONTROLLED AIRSPACE' DECLARED OVER ASCENSION

LD101538 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1518 GMT 10 May 82

[By Alan Jones, PA defence staff]

[Text] Britain has set up an area of "controlled air space" over Ascension Island in the South Atlantic for safety reasons, the minister of defence announced today. The move follows a huge increase in the number of flights to and from the island, which has become an important staging and supply post for the British task force.

The controlled air space extends from sea level to an unlimited height, and covers a 100-mile radius of the island's Wideawake Airfield.

The ministry statement said: "The normal rules of the International Civil Aviation Organization, as applied by the United Kingdom, governing the operation and control of flights from a busy airfield will be in force. Control of this area, if air space, will be exercised by the senior RAF officer on Ascension Island." Ministry spokesman Mr Ian McDonald added "This controlled area has been set up for safety reasons. It means that most aircraft will avoid the area if they can. If they cannot, a flight plan will have to be filed."

ARGENTINE 'SPY SHIP' SINKS IN BAD WEATHER

LD101610 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1542 GMT 10 May 82

[By Peter Archer, PA staff reporter onboard HMS Hermes]

[Text] The Argentine spy ship captured by the Royal Navy sank early today. It has now been disclosed that the Narwal went down in deteriorating weather south east of the Falklands some time after midnight. The sinking was not deliberate.

The ocean-going trawler, used by the Argentines to gather intelligence on the naval task force, had been holed during Sunday's attack by British jets. The Argentine crew and British commando boarding party were all evacuated before she went down.

There were 14 Argentine casualties from the British attack, including one crewman who subsequently died. Eleven others were not hurt. Prisoners have been taken to the aircraft carrier HMS Invincible on which Prince Andrew is a helicopter co-pilot. The Narwal was abandoned at midnight British time after she developed a starboard list.

The British boarding party reported that the vessel had been hit by 30-millimetre cannon file, loosed off by Sea Harrier jet fighters at 20 rounds a second. Also, a bomb dropped by a Harrier holed the forecastle, but did not detonate.

ROYAL NAVY STEPS UP 'SIEGE' ON FALKLANDS

LD101744 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1721 GMT 10 May 82

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defense correspondent]

[Text] The Royal Navy battle fleet tonight stepped up its siege of the Falklands. Frigates and destroyers armed with anti-aircraft missiles closed within sight of the Argentine occupation forces.

The move -- seen as a grave risk in the wake of the devastating attack on HMS Sheffield -- is an attempt to finally win local air superiority. It follows recent encounters in which Mirage fighters, escorting an Argentine C-130 transport plane which tried to drop supplies to the beleaguered garrison, were engaged by Sea Harrier fighters, and turned back.

A Puma troop-carrying helicopter was also shot down by a Sea Cat missile fired from a Royal Navy frigate as it tried to keep contact between East and West Falklands. Clearly, light aircraft are getting through from the Argentine mainland, although their re-supply capability must be limited.

Defence Ministry spokesman Mr Ian McDonald acknowledged today: "We have no evidence which would suggest that anything other than light aircraft are using Port Stanley Airfield. We have no reports of any breach of the exclusion zone." But he said that with low cloud and bad weather, light aircraft could possibly use grass landing strips on the Falklands, or "perhaps one of the airfields we have bombed."

It is known that before the latest bombing raids, a 15-metre wide strip of the runway at Port Stanley was still useable by light aircraft.

Meanwhile a subtle switch concerning the new 12-mile exclusion zone off mainland Argentina was disclosed by Mr McDonald. Previously it was believed that any Argentine ship or plane which came within range of British forces outside this limit would be regarded as hostile "and treated accordingly."

Today the spokesman indicated that the Argentines "must present a threat to the mission of the task force" to risk action against them. Mr McDonald refused to disclose the position of the Argentine fleet. But he added: "Some of them at least are in our sights," then corrected himself by saying: "Some of them at least are...we know where they are."

He said the 2,000-ton unarmed Argentine trawler the Narwal, which sank today after Sunday's bombing and strafing attack by Sea Harriers, had posed "a significant threat" to the task force, for she was on a surveillance and intelligence-gathering mission. "This was a significant threat as if she was bristling with arms," said Mr McDonald.

The Defence Ministry disclosed tonight that civilians taken off South Georgia, along with the 151 Argentine prisoners, included nationalities other than Argentine. The 29 civilians included two Chileans, two Uruguayans and one Spanish.

"They, like the Argentine civilians, are not prisoners," said a spokesman. "The Brazilian Embassy has been told of the names of the Argentine people, and the Swiss Government told of the others' nationalities to pass on to their respective governments." The group, now on a Royal Navy ship en route to Ascension Island, will be repatriated as soon as possible.

Argentine Targets 'Bombarded'

LD101752 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1744 GMT 10 May 82

[By Peter Archer, onboard HMS Hermes, and Robert Hutchinson, PA defense correspondent]

[Excerpt] British warships again bombarded Argentine military targets around Port Stanley early today.

It was the second successive night attack by frigates and destroyers of the Falklands task force. They pounded military installations around the island's capital with a barrage of 4.5 inch gunfire. The mission is seen as a softening-up process before an eventual landing by British troops on the occupied islands.

At the same time the task force action is further enforcing its air and sea blockade. It is essential that the British forces sever any supply links between the Falklands and mainland Argentina. So far today no Argentine activity has been reported.

Enemy Vessel Shelled

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] A Royal Navy frigate "in company with other ships" last night shelled a surface vessel inside the Falkland Sound -- the stretch of water separating the two main disputed islands, it was understood today. Whitehall sources said that the 2,015-ton frigate, using her 4.5-inch automatic gun, opened fire on the vessel and within minutes a large explosion in the area of the target was seen.

The sources could not give any details of the identity of the target vessel although it is known that several Argentine patrol craft were trapped in Port Stanley harbour when the 200-mile exclusion zone was declared. This is the closest that any naval engagement has occurred to the Falklands and is proof that the task force is pressing ever closer to the shores and Argentine positions.

Officially, the Defence Ministry would go no further than its statement issued at 0456 this morning which said: "A report has been received from the task force that during the night a surface vessel has been engaged with gunfire by one of HM ships close to the Falkland Islands, within the total exclusion zone. "Following the engagement a loud explosion was reported in the vicinity of the target."

The Argentine occupation forces appear to be trying to maintain contact between their garrisons on East and West Falkland. On West Falkland there are 1,000 Argentine troops, on East Falkland 1,000 are based near Darwin, and a further 4,000 of the better-trained forces around Port Stanley.

At the weekend a Puma troop-carrying helicopter trying to maintain contact was shot down over the islands by an anti-aircraft missile fired by a Royal Navy warship.

The Ministry of Defence later confirmed that the shelling of a surface vessel took place between West and East Falkland, in the Falkland Sound area. Ministry Spokesman Mr Ian McDonald told a news conference there was no evidence that the vessel fired on by a British ship was hit or sunk, although "we have reports of a large explosion."

He added: "You will agree that the incident and its location shows how tight our grip is on the islands." Mr McDonald said the weather around the Falklands was deteriorating. "The wind strength is increasing and there is full cloud cover," he said.

PESSIMISM TOWARD NEGOTATED SETTLEMENT REMAINS

LD111140 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1114 GMT 11 May 82

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] While details of the latest engagement were coming in, Mrs Thatcher was chairing a special meeting of the cabinet devoted exclusively to the crisis.

It followed on immediately from the now daily session of the so-called "war cabinet" at Downing Street.

Ministers were assessing latest reports of diplomatic and military developments. In New York, the talking was still going on to try to find a diplomatic settlement. But there is continuing pessimism in Whitehall about the prospects for reaching a negotiated settlement to the latest -- the third -- round of talks.

The word from New York is that the talks are now going further into detail of the proposals sponsored by the UN secretary general Senor Perez de Cuellar but there is still a lot of ground to be covered. Although officials are saying it is too soon to predict whether the talks will bring success they are making clear that there is no sign at the moment of a breakthrough -- but at the same time neither have they reached deadlock.

British sources in New York say that the situation is now critical and they are moving with the greatest possible urgency, although no substantial moves forward were made yesterday. The stumbling block remains getting the agreement of Argentina to remove its troops from the islands without any prejudgment of the issue of sovereignty.

British officials are complaining again of conflicting statements from the Argentine rulers which is making it difficult to assess their latest position.

It is being stressed in Whitehall that any major military development will not be directly linked to the lack of progress or even breakdown of this round of negotiations in New York. The point is being made that it would be too "unsubtle" for a major military development to follow immediately on the final breakdown of the talks if that should come.

Meanwhile, the sources in Whitehall are damping down the burst of criticism levelled mainly against the BBC for their coverage of the crisis. The latest attacks on the BBC came after last night's "Panorama" programme, which many Tory MP's thought was too one-sided and gave undue emphasis to critics of the government.

Mrs Thatcher watched the programme and was said to be "not impressed" with it. Several protest calls from viewers were received at No 10 after the programme. But officials said the government had no serious complaints about any of the British media coverage of the crisis and they accepted that emotions were bound to run high at a time when British servicemen were at risk in the South Atlantic.

The officials hope that new film and pictures will reach London soon, possibly today, from the task force operations in the Falklands.

NC091803 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 9 May 82

[Text] Frigyes Puja, foreign minister of the People's Republic of Hungary, arrived this afternoon on an official visit. He was welcomed at Larnaca Airport by Foreign Minister Rolandhis and the ambassador of Cyprus to Budapest and the Hungarian ambassador in Nicosia. In welcoming his Hungarian counterpart, Mr Rolandhis expressed gratitude for Hungary's support in Cyprus' struggle for freedom, independence and justice. Mr Rolandhis recalled President Kiprianou's visit to Budapest last year as well as his talks that he had earlier there with Mr Puja and stressed that during the talks Hungary's support for the Cyprus issue was strong and immutable. Mr Rolandhis said that the main subject of his talks with Mr Puja will again be the Cyprus issue.

In his reply, Mr Puja said that the aim of his visit is to review with Mr Rolandhis bilateral relations and the international situation. Regarding the Cyprus issue, he said that the Hungarian Government's position is known: it advocates that Cyprus must be independent, sovereign and nonaligned.

IOANNIDHIS ANNOUNCES PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDACY

NC101250 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 10 May 82

[Excerpt] Mr Yeoryios Ioannidhis today announced that he will submit his candidacy for the next presidential election. In a statement, Mr Ioannidhis said that he has reached the conclusion that, if normality is to prevail and unity is to be restored among the people, it is necessary that the office of the president be entrusted to a person free from partisan bindings and expediencies. Mr Ioannidhis referred to the factionalizing of state authority and rule, which deals an irreparable blow to the state and undermines the foundations of Cyprus' state structure and struggle. He also said that polarization appears a threat and fanaticism drives away moderation, tolerance and wisdom. Mr Ioannidhis said the serious problems facing the country -- the basic and primary issue being the need to find a just and viable Cyprus solution within the next 5 years that would safeguard our independence and our people's national and physical survival -- can only be successfully confronted by an ecumenical government that would express the people's unity within a climate of fraternity, unanimity, collectivism, cooperation, calmness and responsible planning and through a democratic and constructive dialogue as well as in a spirit of patriotism and unselfishness.

LATIN DIPLOMATS TO PROTEST UK, EEC EMBARGOES

NC101225 Paris AFP in English 1156 GMT 10 May 82

[Text] Helsinki, 10 May (AFP) -- Latin American countries will [word indistinct] international monetary meetings here this week that Britain's freezing of Argentine public and private assets could jeopardize the world financial system, Latin American diplomats said here today. They said a Latin American minister was expected to raise the issue on behalf of the group in the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the joint IMF World Bank Development Committee, which are meeting here from Wednesday to Friday. The group's spokesman would also make it clear that the trade embargo imposed against Argentina by the European Economic Community was contrary to international law and agreements.

Argentine diplomats, meanwhile, said that Argentina's Economy Minister Roberto Alemann was expected to hold private consultations tonight with ministers from Asian, African and Latin American countries due to arrive in Helsinki during the day. They are to attend a ministerial meeting here tomorrow of the "Group of 24," the developing nations' caucus in the IMF and the World Bank.

MINISTRY WELCOMES REAGAN ARMS REDUCTION PROPOSAL

NC110834 Paris AFP in English 0822 GMT 11 May 82

[Text] Brussels, 11 May (AFP) -- U.S. President Ronald Reagan's latest disarmament proposals should "create a favorable climate for progress in the present negotiations in Geneva," a Belgian Foreign Ministry spokesman said today. The spokesman was responding to Mr Reagan's call Sunday at Eureka College in Eureka, Illinois, for a reduction of one-third in both Soviet and U.S. nuclear arsenals.

"We hope that the USSR will not reject this initiative straight away," the spokesman said. "We believe it is an important step in the search for peace." The spokesman added that the offer took into account the number of nuclear warheads, and therefore could mean a "real and substantial reduction in intercontinental armaments."

So far, the Soviet Union has not reacted specifically to Mr Reagan's proposal, made during a speech to graduates of Eureka College, the U.S. President's old college.

SOURCES 'RELATIVELY OPTIMISTIC' ON U.S. TALKS

NC101654 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 10 May 82 pp 1, 15

[Excerpts] The Papandreou-Stearns meeting that will take place at Kastri at 1100 today constitutes the introduction to the Greek-American high-level talks that the Greek prime minister will have with Secretary of State Haig in Athens on Saturday and with President Reagan in Bonn on 10 June to clear the questions of bases, bilateral issues and NATO.

Yesterday, government circles in Athens expressed "relative optimism" about the new round of Greek-American talks. This appraisal was based on the following: The recent NATO gesture to change the area for the recent allied exercises to meet the Greek view and, particularly, to practically accept the 10-mile airspace; the fact that Turkey has ceased its violations [of Greek national territory] and that some relaxation has been noted in Greek-Turkish relations; and to reports that NATO now agrees that the operational control limits in the Aegean be fixed prior to the establishment of the Larisa command -- a thing which is in agreement with the Greek side's goals.

GOVERNMENT TO PAY FOR DAMAGE TO U.S. CONSULATE

PM101343 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 7 May 82 p 3

[Text] The Hague -- The Damage done to the U.S. Consulate in Amsterdam by demonstrators will cost around 70,000 guilders to repair. The Netherlands will make good this damage. This was announced by Foreign Minister van der Stoel in the Second Chamber on Thursday [6 May] in response to a question. The minister took the view that the presence in front of the consulate of the five crosses commemorating the victims of the violence in El Salvador have played a role in connection with the damage. "Because of them, regular demonstrations are taking place at the consulate and, unfortunately, a minority of the demonstrators seem to be violent," Van der Stoel said. He considers that a permanent monument to the victims in El Salvador should be erected elsewhere in the city. In this connection the minister spoke of "the murder" of the four Dutch Ikon [Netherlands television company] journalists.

In his reply Prime Minister van Agt said that Interior Minister van Thijn has put forward a special surveillance plan for a number of diplomatic targets in Amsterdam. "A start has been made on putting this plan into action," the prime minister said.

Kreisky said afterward that he had gained the impression that Poland wants to overcome the isolation into which it had come. Rakowski talked about the attitude of the Polish church with a great sense of responsibility, Kreisky said.

PAHR DEPARTS FOR VISITS TO MONGOLIA, PRC

[Text] Foreign Minister Pahr has left today for a 2-week trip to Mongolia and China. Before his departure, Pahr declared that in his capacity as chairman of the International Kampuchea Conference he would also discuss in Beijing the situation in Souteast Asia. There are basic differences of opinion between the PRC and Austria regarding the Kampuchean issue: Austria refuses to recognize the Heng Samrin government because it was established through foreign intervention, but it does not want to accept the representation of Kampuchea in the United Nations by the overthrown Pol Pot government either. China, on the other hand, supports the Pol Pot regime. After his visit to the PRC, Pahr will accompany President Kirchschlaeger on his official visit to Moscow.

JEWISH WORLD CONGRESS CONFERENCE HELD IN VIENNA

[Special DIE PRESSE report by "GWO"]

[Excerpt] Vienna -- Edgar Bronfmann, president of the Jewish World Congress, arrived in Vienna on Monday to participate in the talks of the European section of the world congress. In the afternoon he was received by Chancellor Bruno Kreisky for a talk.

Some 80 delegates from West European countries, Hungary, Poland and Romania, as well as the delegation of the Cairo Jewish community which has only recently joined the congress, discussed questions of growing anti-Semitism in some countries and its economic and social causes at the conference, which was held in Austria for the first time since the 1938 "Anschluss." In his greetings address President Kirchschlaeger discussed the national-socialist past as will as anti-Semitism at the turn of the century in Vienna, and declared that the Jewish-intellectual force which then radiated from Vienna and produced far-reaching effects, is still deeply rooted here.

The Jewish World Congress decided to hold the conference in the Austrian capital as a token of affinity with the Vienna Jewish community. Thus the small Vienna community is to be helped to overcome the shock of the terrorist attack of last August, and at the same time tribute is to be paid to Vienna's and Austria's role as a place of transit for Jewish refugees from East Europe and the Soviet Union.
